ADDRESSES AT THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS

RESPONSE TO WELCOME

At the World's Parliament of Religions, Chicago, 11th September, 1893

Sisters and Brothers of America,

It fills my heart with joy unspeakable to rise in response to the warm and cordial welcome which you have given us. I thank you in the name of the most ancient order of monks in the world; I thank you in the name of the mother of religions; and I thank you in the name of millions and millions of Hindu people of all classes and sects.

My thanks, also, to some of the speakers on this platform who, referring to the delegates from the Orient, have told you that these men from far-off nations may well claim the honour of bearing to different lands the idea of toleration. I am proud to belong to a religion which has taught the world both tolerance and universal acceptance. We believe not only in universal toleration, but we accept all religions as true. I am proud to belong to a nation which has sheltered the persecuted and the refugees of all religions and all nations of the earth. I am proud to tell you that we have gathered in our bosom the purest remnant of the Israelites, who came to Southern India and took refuge with us in the very year in which their holy temple was shattered to pieces by Roman tyranny. I am proud to belong to the religion which has sheltered and is still fostering the remnant of the grand Zoroastrian nation. I will quote to you, brethren, a few lines from a hymn which I remember to have repeated from my earliest boyhood, which is every day repeated by millions of human beings: "As the different streams having their sources in different places all mingle their water in the sea, so, O Lord, the different paths which men take through different tendencies, various though they appear, crooked or straight, all lead to Thee."

The present convention, which is one of the most august assemblies ever held, is in itself a vindication, a declaration to the world of the wonderful doctrine preached in the Gita: "Whosoever comes to Me, through whatsoever form, I reach him; all men are struggling through paths which in the end lead to me." Sectarianism, bigotry, and its horrible descendant, fanaticism, have long possessed this beautiful earth. They have filled the earth with violence, drenched it often and often with human blood, destroyed civilisation and sent whole nations to despair. Had it not been for these horrible demons, human society would be far more advanced than it is now. But their time is come; and I fervently hope that the bell that tolled this morning in honour of this convention may be the death-knell of all fanaticism, of all persecutions with the sword or

1 with the pen, and of all uncharitable feelings between persons 2 wending their way to the same goal.

3 4 5 WHY WE DISAGREE

6 15th September, 1893

7 I will tell you a little story. You have heard the eloquent 8 speaker who has just finished say, "Let us cease from abusing each 9 other," and he was very sorry that there should be always so much 10 variance.

11 But I think I should tell you a story which would illustrate the 12 cause of this variance. A frog lived in a well. It had lived there for a 13 long time. It was born there and brought up there, and yet was a 14 little, small frog. Of course the evolutionists were not there then to 15 tell us whether the frog lost its eyes or not, but, for our story's sake, 16 we must take it for granted that it had its eyes, and that it every day 17 cleansed the water of all the worms and bacilli that lived in it with 18 an energy that would do credit to our modern bacteriologists. In 19 this way it went on and became a little sleek and fat. Well, one day 20 another frog that lived in the sea came and fell into the well.

21 "Where are you from?"

22 "I am from the sea."

23 "The sea! How big is that? Is it as big as my well?" and he 24 took a leap from one side of the well to the other.

25 "My friend," said the frog of the sea, "how do you compare 26 the sea with your little well?"

27 Then the frog took another leap and asked, "Is your sea so 28 big?"

29 "What nonsense you speak, to compare the sea with your 30 well!"

31 "Well, then," said the frog of the well, "nothing can be bigger 32 than my well; there can be nothing bigger than this; this fellow is a 33 liar, so turn him out."

34 That has been the difficulty all the while.

35 I am a Hindu. I am sitting in my own little well and thinking 36 that the whole world is my little well. The Christian sits in his little 37 well and thinks the whole world is his well. The Mohammedan sits 38 in his little well and thinks that is the whole world. I have to thank 39 you of America for the great attempt you are making to break down 40 the barriers of this little world of ours, and hope that, in the future, 41 the Lord will help you to accomplish your purpose.

PAPER ON HINDUISM

Read at the Parliament on 19th September, 1893

Three religions now stand in the world which have come down to us from time prehistoric--Hinduism, Zoroastrianism and Judaism. They have all received tremendous shocks and all of them prove by their survival their internal strength. But while Judaism failed to absorb Christianity and was driven out of its place of birth by its all-conquering daughter, and a handful of Parsees is all that remains to tell the tale of their grand religion, sect after sect arose in India and seemed to shake the religion of the Vedas to its very foundations, but like the waters of the seashore in a tremendous earthquake it receded only for a while, only to return in an all-absorbing flood, a thousand times more vigorous, and when the tumult of the rush was over, these sects were all sucked in, absorbed, and assimilated into the immense body of the mother faith.

From the high spiritual flights of the Vedanta philosophy, of which the latest discoveries of science seem like echoes, to the low ideas of idolatry with its multifarious mythology, the agnosticism of the Buddhists, and the atheism of the Jains, each and all have a place in the Hindu's religion.

Where then, the question arises, where is the common centre to which all these widely diverging radii converge? Where is the common basis upon which all these seemingly hopeless contradictions rest? And this is the question I shall attempt to answer.

The Hindus have received their religion through revelation, the Vedas. They hold that the Vedas are without beginning and without end. It may sound ludicrous to this audience, how a book can be without beginning or end. But by the Vedas no books are meant. They mean the accumulated treasury of spiritual laws discovered by different persons in different times. Just as the law of gravitation existed before its discovery, and would exist if all humanity forgot it, so is it with the laws that govern the spiritual world. The moral, ethical, and spiritual relations between soul and soul and between individual spirits and the Father of all spirits, were there before their discovery, and would remain even if we forgot them.

The discoverers of these laws are called Rishis, and we honour them as perfected beings. I am glad to tell this audience that some of the very greatest of them were women. Here it may be said that these laws as laws may be without end, but they must have had a beginning. The Vedas teach us that creation is without beginning or end. Science is said to have proved that the sum total of cosmic energy is always the same. Then, if there was a time when nothing existed, where was all this manifested energy? Some say it was in a potential form in God. In that case God is sometimes potential and sometimes kinetic, which would make Him mutable. Everything mutable is a compound, and everything compound must undergo that change which is called destruction. So God would die,

1 which is absurd. Therefore there never was a time when there was 2 no creation.

3 If I may be allowed to use a simile, creation and creator are 4 two lines, without beginning and without end, running parallel to 5 each other. God is the ever active providence, by whose power 6 systems after systems are being evolved out of chaos, made to run 7 for a time and again destroyed. This is what the Brahmin boy 8 repeats every day: "The sun and the moon, the Lord created like the 9 suns and moons of previous cycles." And this agrees with modern 10 science.

11 Here I stand and if I shut my eyes, and try to conceive my 12 existence, "I", "I", "I", what is the idea before me? The idea of a 13 body. Am I, then, nothing but a combination of material substances?
14 The Vedas declare, "No". I am a spirit living in a body. I am not the 15 body. The body will die, but I shall not die. Here am I in this body; it 16 will fall, but I shall go on living. I had also a past. The soul was not 17 created, for creation means a combination which means a certain 18 future dissolution. If then the soul was created, it must die. Some 19 are born happy, enjoy perfect health, with beautiful body, mental 20 vigour and all wants supplied. Others are born miserable, some are 21 without hands or feet, others again are idiots and only drag on a 22 wretched existence. Why, if they are all created, why does a just 23 and merciful God create one happy and another unhappy, why is He 24 so partial? Nor would it mend matters in the least to hold that those 25 who are miserable in this life will be happy in a future one. Why 26 should a man be miserable even here in the reign of a just and 27 merciful God?

28 In the second place, the idea of a creator God does not 29 explain the anomaly, but simply expresses the cruel fiat of an all-30 powerful being. There must have been causes, then, before his 31 birth, to make a man miserable or happy and those were his past 32 actions.

33 Are not all the tendencies of the mind and the body accounted 34 for by inherited aptitude? Here are two parallel lines of existence-- 35 one of the mind, the other of matter. If matter and its 36 transformations answer for all that we have, there is no necessity 37 for supposing the existence of a soul. But it cannot be proved that 38 thought has been evolved out of matter, and if a philosophical 39 monism is inevitable, spiritual monism is certainly logical and no 40 less desirable than a materialistic monism; but neither of these is 41 necessary here.

42 We cannot deny that bodies acquire certain tendencies from 43 heredity, but those tendencies only mean the physical configuration, 44 through which a peculiar mind alone can act in a peculiar way.
45 There are other tendencies peculiar to a soul caused by its past 46 actions. And a soul with a certain tendency would by the laws of 47 affinity take birth in a body which is the fittest instrument for the 48 display of that tendency. This is in accord with science, for science 49 wants to explain everything by habit, and habit is got through 50 repetitions. So repetitions are necessary to explain the natural 51 habits of a new-born soul. And since they were not obtained in this

1 present life, they must have come down from past lives.

2 There is another suggestion. Taking all these for granted, how 3 is it that I do not remember anything of my past life? This can be 4 easily explained. I am now speaking English. It is not my mother 5 tongue, in fact no words of my mother tongue are now present in 6 my consciousness; but let me try to bring them up, and they rush in.
7 That shows that consciousness is only the surface of the mental 8 ocean, and within its depths are stored up all our experiences. Try 9 and struggle, they would come up and you would be conscious even 10 of your past life.

11 This is direct and demonstrative evidence. Verification is the 12 perfect proof of a theory, and here is the challenge thrown to the 13 world by the Rishis. We have discovered the secret by which the 14 very depths of the ocean of memory can be stirred up--try it and you 15 would get a complete reminiscence of your past life.

16 So then the Hindu believes that he is a spirit. Him the sword 17 cannot pierce--him the fire cannot burn--him the water cannot 18 melt--him the air cannot dry. The Hindu believes that every soul is a 19 circle whose circumference is nowhere, but whose centre is located 20 in the body, and that death means the change of this centre from 21 body to body. Nor is the soul bound by the conditions of matter. In 22 its very essence it is free, unbounded, holy, pure, and perfect. But 23 somehow or other it finds itself tied down to matter, and thinks of 24 itself as matter.

25 Why should the free, perfect, and pure being be thus under 26 the thralldom of matter, is the next question. How can the perfect 27 soul be deluded into the belief that it is imperfect? We have been 28 told that the Hindus shirk the question and say that no such 29 question can be there. Some thinkers want to answer it by positing 30 one or more quasi-perfect beings, and use big scientific names to 31 fill up the gap. But naming is not explaining. The question remains 32 the same. How can the perfect become the quasi-perfect; how can 33 the pure, the absolute, change even a microscopic particle of its 34 nature? But the Hindu is sincere. He does not want to take shelter 35 under sophistry. He is brave enough to face the question in a manly 36 fashion; and his answer is: "I do not know. I do not know how the 37 perfect being, the soul, came to think of itself as imperfect, as 38 joined to and conditioned by matter." But the fact is a fact for all 39 that. It is a fact in everybody's consciousness that one thinks of 40 oneself as the body. The Hindu does not attempt to explain why one 41 thinks one is the body. The answer that it is the will of God is no 42 explanation. This is nothing more than what the Hindu says, "I do 43 not know."

44 Well, then, the human soul is eternal and immortal, perfect 45 and infinite, and death means only a change of centre from one 46 body to another. The present is determined by our past actions, and 47 the future by the present. The soul will go on evolving up or 48 reverting back from birth to birth and death to death. But here is 49 another question: Is man a tiny boat in a tempest, raised one 50 moment on the foamy crest of a billow and dashed down into a 51 yawning chasm the next, rolling to and fro at the mercy of good and

1 bad actions--a powerless, helpless wreck in an ever-raging, ever-2 rushing, uncompromising current of cause and effect; a little moth 3 placed under the wheel of causation which rolls on crushing 4 everything in its way and waits not for the widow's tears or the 5 orphan's cry? The heart sinks at the idea, yet this is the law of 6 Nature. Is there no hope? Is there no escape?--was the cry that 7 went up from the bottom of the heart of despair. It reached the 8 throne of mercy, and words of hope and consolation came down and 9 inspired a Vedic sage, and he stood up before the world and in 10 trumpet voice proclaimed the glad tidings: "Hear, ye children of 11 immortal bliss! even ye that reside in higher spheres! I have found 12 the Ancient One who is beyond all darkness, all delusion: knowing 13 Him alone you shall be saved from death over again." "Children of 14 immortal bliss" --what a sweet, what a hopeful name! Allow me to 15 call you, brethren, by that sweet name--heirs of immortal bliss--yea, 16 the Hindu refuses to call you sinners. Ye are the Children of God, 17 the sharers of immortal bliss, holy and perfect beings. Ye divinities 18 on earth--sinners! It is a sin to call a man so; it is a standing libel on 19 human nature. Come up, O lions, and shake off the delusion that 20 you are sheep; you are souls immortal, spirits free, blest and 21 eternal; ye are not matter, ye are not bodies; matter is your servant, 22 not you the servant of matter.

23 Thus it is that the Vedas proclaim not a dreadful combination 24 of unforgiving laws, not an endless prison of cause and effect, but 25 that at the head of all these laws, in and through every particle of 26 matter and force, stands One "by whose command the wind blows, 27 the fire burns, the clouds rain, and death stalks upon the earth."

28 And what is His nature?

29 He is everywhere, the pure and formless One, the Almighty 30 and the All-merciful. "Thou art our father, Thou art our mother, 31 Thou art our beloved friend, Thou art the source of all strength; 32 give us strength. Thou art He that beareth the burdens of the 33 universe; help me bear the little burden of this life." Thus sang the 34 Rishis of the Vedas. And how to worship Him? Through love. "He is 35 to be worshipped as the one beloved, dearer than everything in this 36 and the next life."

37 This is the doctrine of love declared in the Vedas, and let us 38 see how it is fully developed and taught by Krishna, whom the 39 Hindus believe to have been God incarnate on earth.

40 He taught that a man ought to live in this world like a lotus 41 leaf, which grows in water but is never moistened by water; so a 42 man ought to live in the world--his heart to God and his hands to 43 work.

44 It is good to love God for hope of reward in this or the next 45 world, but it is better to love God for love's sake, and the prayer 46 goes: "Lord, I do not want wealth, nor children, nor learning. If it be 47 Thy will, I shall go from birth to birth, but grant me this, that I may 48 love Thee without the hope of reward--love unselfishly for love's 49 sake." One of the disciples of Krishna, the then Emperor of India, 50 was driven from his kingdom by his enemies and had to take shelter 51 with his queen in a forest in the Himalayas, and there one day the 1 queen asked him how it was that he, the most virtuous of men, 2 should suffer so much misery. Yudhishtira answered, "Behold, my 3 queen, the Himalayas, how grand and beautiful they are; I love 4 them. They do not give me anything, but my nature is to love the 5 grand, the beautiful, therefore I love them. Similarly, I love the 6 Lord. He is the source of all beauty, of all sublimity. He is the only 7 object to be loved; my nature is to love Him, and therefore I love. I 8 do not pray for anything; I do not ask for anything. Let Him place 9 me wherever He likes. I must love Him for love's sake. I cannot 10 trade love."

11 The Vedas teach that the soul is divine, only held in the 12 bondage of matter; perfection will be reached when this bond will 13 burst, and the word they use for it is therefore, Mukti--freedom, 14 freedom from the bonds of imperfection, freedom from death and 15 misery.

16 And this bondage can only fall off through the mercy of God, 17 and this mercy comes on the pure. So purity is the condition of His 18 mercy. How does that mercy act? He reveals Himself to the pure 19 heart; the pure and the stainless see God, yea, even in this life; then 20 and then only all the crookedness of the heart is made straight.
21 Then all doubt ceases. He is no more the freak of a terrible law of 22 causation. This is the very centre, the very vital conception of 23 Hinduism. The Hindu does not want to live upon words and 24 theories. If there are existences beyond the ordinary sensuous
25 existence, he wants to come face to face with them. If there is a 26 soul in him which is not matter, if there is an all-merciful universal 27 Soul, he will go to Him direct. He must see Him, and that alone can 28 destroy all doubts. So the best proof a Hindu sage gives about the 29 soul, about God, is: "I have seen the soul; I have seen God." And 30 that is the only condition of perfection. The Hindu religion does not 31 consist in struggles and attempts to believe a certain doctrine or 32 dogma, but in realising--not in believing, but in being and 33 becoming.

34 Thus the whole object of their system is by constant struggle 35 to become perfect, to become divine, to reach God and see God, 36 and this reaching God, seeing God, becoming perfect even as the 37 Father in Heaven is perfect, constitutes the religion of the Hindus.

38 And what becomes of a man when he attains perfection? He 39 lives a life of bliss infinite. He enjoys infinite and perfect bliss, 40 having obtained the only thing in which man ought to have 41 pleasure, namely God, and enjoys the bliss with God.

42 So far all the Hindus are agreed. This is the common religion 43 of all the sects of India; but, then, perfection is absolute, and the 44 absolute cannot be two or three. It cannot have any qualities. It 45 cannot be an individual. And so when a soul becomes perfect and 46 absolute, it must become one with Brahman, and it would only 47 realise the Lord as the perfection, the reality, of its own nature and 48 existence, the existence absolute, knowledge absolute, and bliss 49 absolute. We have often and often read this called the losing of 50 individuality and becoming a stock or a stone.

51 "He jests at scars that never felt a wound."

1 I tell you it is nothing of the kind. If it is happiness to enjoy 2 the consciousness of this small body, it must be greater happiness 3 to enjoy the consciousness of two bodies, the measure of happiness 4 increasing with the consciousness of an increasing number of 5 bodies, the aim, the ultimate of happiness being reached when it 6 would become a universal consciousness.

7 Therefore, to gain this infinite universal individuality, this 8 miserable little prison-individuality must go. Then alone can death 9 cease when I am one with life, then alone can misery cease when I
10 am one with happiness itself, then alone can all errors cease when I 11 am one with knowledge itself; and this is the necessary scientific 12 conclusion. Science has proved to me that physical individuality is a 13 delusion, that really my body is one little continuously changing 14 body in an unbroken ocean of matter; and Advaita (unity) is the 15 necessary conclusion with my other counterpart, soul.

16 Science is nothing but the finding of unity. As soon as science 17 would reach perfect unity, it would stop from further progress, 18 because it would reach the goal. Thus Chemistry could not progress 19 farther when it would discover one element out of which all others 20 could be made. Physics would stop when it would be able to fulfil its 21 services in discovering one energy of which all the others are but 22 manifestations, and the science of religion becomes perfect when it 23 would discover Him who is the one life in a universe of death, Him 24 who is the constant basis of an ever-changing world. One who is the 25 only Soul of which all souls are but delusive manifestations. Thus is 26 it, through multiplicity and duality, that the ultimate unity is 27 reached. Religion can go no farther. This is the goal of all science.

28 All science is bound to come to this conclusion in the long 29 run. Manifestation, and not creation, is the word of science today, 30 and the Hindu is only glad that what he has been cherishing in his 31 bosom for ages is going to be taught in more forcible language, and 32 with further light from the latest conclusions of science.

33 Descend we now from the aspirations of philosophy to the 34 religion of the ignorant. At the very outset, I may tell you that there 35 is no polytheism in India. In every temple, if one stands by and 36 listens, one will find the worshippers applying all the attributes of 37 God, including omnipresence, to the images. It is not polytheism, 38 nor would the name henotheism explain the situation. "The rose 39 called by any other name would smell as sweet." Names are not 40 explanations.

41 I remember, as a boy, hearing a Christian missionary preach
42 to a crowd in India. Among other sweet things he was telling them 43 was that if he gave a blow to their idol with his stick, what could it 44 do? One of his hearers sharply answered, "If I abuse your God, 45 what can He do?" "You would be punished," said the preacher, 46 "when you die." "So my idol will punish you when you die," retorted 47 the Hindu.

48 The tree is known by its fruits. When I have seen amongst 49 them that are called idolaters, men, the like of whom in morality
50 and spirituality and love I have never seen anywhere, I stop and ask 51 myself, "Can sin beget holiness?"

1 Superstition is a great enemy of man, but bigotry is worse.
2 Why does a Christian go to church? Why is the cross holy? Why is 3 the face turned toward the sky in prayer? Why are there so many 4 images in them Catholic Church? Why are there so many images in 5 the minds of Protestants when they pray? My brethren, we can no 6 more think about anything without a mental image than we can live 7 without breathing. By the law of association, the material image
8 calls up the mental idea and vice versa. This is why the Hindu uses 9 an external symbol when he worships. He will tell you, it helps to 10 keep his mind fixed on the Being to whom he prays. He knows as 11 well as you do that the image is not God, is not omnipresent. After 12 all, how much does omnipresence mean to almost the whole world?
13 It stands merely as a word, a symbol. Has God superficial area? If 14 not, when we repeat that word "omnipresent", we think of the 15 extended sky or of space, that is all.

16 As we find that somehow or other, by the laws of our mental 17 constitution, we have to associate our ideas of infinity with the 18 image of the blue sky, or of the sea, so we naturally connect our 19 idea of holiness with the image of a church, a mosque, or a cross.
20 The Hindus have associated the idea of holiness, purity, truth, 21 omnipresence, and such other ideas with different images and 22 forms. But with this difference that while some people devote their 23 whole lives to their idol of a church and never rise higher, because 24 with them religion means an intellectual assent to certain doctrines 25 and doing good to their fellows, the whole religion of the Hindu is 26 centred in realisation. Man is to become divine by realising the 27 divine. Idols or temples or churches or books are only the supports, 28 the helps, of his spiritual childhood: but on and on he must 29 progress.

30 He must not stop anywhere. "External worship, material 31 worship," say the scriptures, "is the lowest stage; struggling to rise 32 high, mental prayer is the next stage, but the highest stage is when 33 the Lord has been realised." Mark, the same earnest man who is 34 kneeling before the idol tells you, "Him the sun cannot express, nor 35 the moon, nor the stars, the lightning cannot express Him, nor what 36 we speak of as fire; through Him they shine." But he does not 37 abuse any one's idol or call its worship sin. He recognises in it a 38 necessary stage of life. "The child is father of the man." Would it be 39 right for an old man to say that childhood is a sin or youth a sin?

40 If a man can realise his divine nature with the help of an 41 image, would it be right to call that a sin? Nor even when he has 42 passed that stage, should he call it an error. To the Hindu, man is 43 not travelling from error to truth, but from truth to truth, from 44 lower to higher truth. To him all the religions, from the lowest 45 fetishism to the highest absolutism, mean so many attempts of the 46 human soul to grasp and realise the Infinite, each determined by 47 the conditions of its birth and association, and each of these marks 48 a stage of progress; and every soul is a young eagle soaring higher 49 and higher, gathering more and more strength, till it reaches the 50 Glorious Sun.

51 Unity in variety is the plan of nature, and the Hindu has 52 recognised it. Every other religion lays down certain fixed dogmas,

1 and tries to force society to adopt them. It places before society
2 only one coat which must fit Jack and John and Henry, all alike. If it 3 does not fit John or Henry, he must go without a coat to cover his 4 body. The Hindus have discovered that the absolute can only be 5 realised, or thought of, or stated, through the relative, and the 6 images, crosses, and crescents are simply so many symbols--so 7 many pegs to hang the spiritual ideas on. It is not that this help is 8 necessary for every one, but those that do not need it have no right 9 to say that it is wrong. Nor is it compulsory in Hinduism.

10 One thing I must tell you. Idolatry in India does not mean 11 anything horrible. It is not the mother of harlots. On the other hand, 12 it is the attempt of undeveloped minds to grasp high spiritual 13 truths. The Hindus have their faults, they sometimes have their 14 exceptions; but mark this, they are always for punishing their own 15 bodies, and never for cutting the throats of their neighbours. If the 16 Hindu fanatic burns himself on the pyre, he never lights the fire of 17 Inquisition. And even this cannot be laid at the door of his religion 18 any more than the burning of witches can be laid at the door of 19 Christianity.

20 To the Hindu, then, the whole world of religions is only a 21 travelling, a coming up, of different men and women, through 22 various conditions and circumstances, to the same goal. Every 23 religion is only evolving a God out of the material man, and the 24 same God is the inspirer of all of them. Why, then, are there so 25 many contradictions? They are only apparent, says the Hindu. The 26 contradictions come from the same truth adapting itself to the 27 varying circumstances of different natures.

28 It is the same light coming through glasses of different 29 colours. And these little variations are necessary for purposes of 30 adaptation. But in the heart of everything the same truth reigns.
31 The Lord has declared to the Hindu in His incarnation as Krishna, 32 "I am in every religion as the thread through a string of pearls.
33 Wherever thou seest extraordinary holiness and extraordinary
34 power raising and purifying humanity, know thou that I am there ."
35 And what has been the result? I challenge the world to find, 36 throughout the whole system of Sanskrit philosophy, any such 37 expression as that the Hindu alone will be saved and not others.
38 Says Vyasa, "We find perfect men even beyond the pale of our caste 39 and creed. " One thing more. How, then, can the Hindu, whose 40 whole fabric of thought centres in God, believe in Buddhism which 41 is agnostic, or in Jainism which is atheistic? The Buddhists or the 42 Jains do not depend upon God; but the whole force of their religion 43 is directed to the great central truth in every religion, to evolve a 44 God out of man. They have not seen the Father, but they have seen 45 the Son. And he that hath seen the Son hath seen the Father also.

46 This, brethren, is a short sketch of the religious ideas of the 47 Hindus. The Hindu may have failed to carry out all his plans, but if 48 there is ever to be a universal religion, it must be one which will 49 have no location in place or time; which will be infinite like the God 50 it will preach, and whose sun will shine upon the followers of 51 Krishna and of Christ, on saints and sinners alike; which will not be 52 Brahminic or Buddhistic, Christian or Mohammedan, but the sum

1 total of all these, and still have infinite space for development; 2 which in its catholicity will embrace in its infinite arms, and find a 3 place for, every human being, from the lowest grovelling savage not 4 far removed from the brute, to the highest man towering by the 5 virtues of his head and heart almost above humanity, making 6 society stand in awe of him and doubt his human nature. It will be a 7 religion which will have no place for persecution or intolerance in 8 its polity, which will recognise divinity in every man and woman, 9 and whose whole scope, whose whole force, will be created in 10 aiding humanity to realise its own true, divine nature.

11 Offer such a religion, and all the nations will follow you.
12 Asoka's council was a council of the Buddhist faith. Akbar's, though 13 more to the purpose, was only a parlour-meeting. It was reserved 14 for America to proclaim to all quarters of the globe that the Lord is 15 in every religion.

16 May He who is the Brahman of the Hindus, the Ahura-Mazda 17 of the Zoroastrians, the Buddha of the Buddhists, the Jehovah of the 18 Jews, the Father in Heaven of the Christians, give strength to you to 19 carry out your noble idea! The star arose in the East; it travelled 20 steadily towards the West, sometimes dimmed and sometimes 21 effulgent, till it made a circuit of the world; and now it is again 22 rising on the very horizon of the East, the borders of the Sanpo, a 23 thousandfold more effulgent than it ever was before.

24 Hail, Columbia, motherland of liberty! It has been given to 25 thee, who never dipped her hand in her neighbour's blood, who 26 never found out that the shortest way of becoming rich was by 27 robbing one's neighbours, it has been given to thee to march at the 28 vanguard of civilisation with the flag of harmony.

RELIGION NOT THE CRYING NEED OF INDIA

Christians must always be ready for good criticism, and I hardly think that you will mind if I make a little criticism. You Christians, who are so fond of sending out missionaries to save the soul of the heathen--why do you not try to save their bodies from starvation? In India, during the terrible famines, thousands died from hunger, yet you Christians did nothing. You erect churches all through India, but the crying evil in the East is not religion--they have religion enough--but it is bread that the suffering millions of burning India cry out for with parched throats. They ask us for bread, but we give them stones. It is an insult to a starving people to offer them religion; it is an insult to a starving man to teach him metaphysics. In India a priest that preached for money would lose caste and be spat upon by the people. I came here to seek aid for my impoverished people, and I fully realised how difficult it was to get help for heathens from Christians in a Christian land.

BUDDHISM, THE FULFILMENT OF HINDUISM

I am not a Buddhist, as you have heard, and yet I am. If China, or Japan, or Ceylon follow the teachings of the Great Master, India worships him as God incarnate on earth. You have just now heard that I am going to criticise Buddhism, but by that I wish you to understand only this. Far be it from me to criticise him whom I worship as God incarnate on earth. But our views about Buddha are that he was not understood properly by his disciples. The relation between Hinduism (by Hinduism, I mean the religion of the Vedas) and what is called Buddhism at the present day is nearly the same as between Judaism and Christianity. Jesus Christ was a Jew, and Shakya Muni was a Hindu. The Jews rejected Jesus Christ, nay, crucified him, and the Hindus have accepted Shakya Muni as God and worship him. But the real difference that we Hindus want to show between modern Buddhism and what we should understand as the teachings of Lord Buddha lies principally in this: Shakya Muni came to preach nothing new. He also, like Jesus, came to fulfil and not to destroy. Only, in the case of Jesus, it was the old people, the Jews, who did not understand him, while in the case of Buddha, it was his own followers who did not realise the import of this teachings. As the Jew did not understand the fulfilment of the Old Testament, so the Buddhist did not understand the fulfilment of the truths of the Hindu religion. Again, I repeat, Shakya Muni came not to destroy, but he was the fulfilment, the logical conclusion, the logical development of the religion of the Hindus.

The religion of the Hindus is divided into two parts: the ceremonial and the spiritual. The spiritual portion is specially studied by the monks. In that there is no caste. A man from the highest caste and a man from the lowest may become a monk in India, and the two castes become equal. In religion there is no caste; caste is simply a social institution. Shakya Muni himself was a monk, and it was his glory that he had the large-heartedness to bring out the truths from the hidden Vedas and throw them broadcast all over the world. He was the first being in the world who brought missionarising into practice--nay, he was the first to conceive the idea of proselytising.

The great glory of the Master lay in his wonderful sympathy for everybody, especially for the ignorant and the poor. Some of his disciples were Brahmins. When Buddha was teaching, Sanskrit was no more the spoken language in India. It was then only in the books of the learned. Some of Buddha's Brahmin disciples wanted to translate his teachings into Sanskrit, but he distinctly told them, "I am for the poor, for the people; let me speak in the tongue of the people." And so to this day the great bulk of his teachings are in the vernacular of that day in India.

Whatever may be the position of philosophy, whatever may be the position of metaphysics, so long as there is such a thing as death in the world, so long as there is such a thing as weakness in the human heart, so long as there is a cry going out of the heart of man in his very weakness, there shall be a faith in God.

On the philosophic side the disciples of the Great Master dashed themselves against the eternal rocks of the Vedas and could not crush them, and on the other side they took away from the nation that eternal God to which every one, man or woman, clings so fondly. And the result was that Buddhism had to die a natural death in India. At the present day there is not one who calls oneself a Buddhist in India, the land of its birth.

But at the same time, Brahminism lost something--that reforming zeal, that wonderful sympathy and charity for everybody, that wonderful leaven which Buddhism had brought to the masses and which had rendered Indian society so great that a Greek historian who wrote about India of that time was led to say that no Hindu was known to tell an untruth and no Hindu woman was known to be unchaste.

Hinduism cannot live without Buddhism, nor Buddhism without Hinduism. Then realise what the separation has shown to us, that the Buddhists cannot stand without the brain and philosophy of the Brahmins, nor the Brahmin without the heart of the Buddhist. This separation between the Buddhists and the Brahmins is the cause of the downfall of India. That is why India is populated by three hundred millions of beggars, and that is why India has been the slave of conquerors for the last thousand years. Let us then join the wonderful intellect of the Brahmins with the heart, the noble soul, the wonderful humanising power of the Great Master.

ADDRESS AT THE FINAL SESSION

The World's Parliament of Religions has become an accomplished fact, and the merciful Father has helped those who laboured to bring it into existence, and crowned with success their most unselfish labour.

My thanks to those noble souls whose large hearts and love of truth first dreamed this wonderful dream and then realised it. My thanks to the shower of liberal sentiments that has overflowed this platform. My thanks to this enlightened audience for their uniform kindness to me and for their appreciation of every thought that tends to smooth the friction of religions. A few jarring notes were heard from time to time in this harmony. My special thanks to them, for they have, by their striking contrast, made general harmony the sweeter.

Much has been said of the common ground of religious unity. I am not going just now to venture my own theory. But if any one here hopes that this unity will come by the triumph of any one of the religions and the destruction of the other, to him I say, "Brother, yours is an impossible hope." Do I wish that the Christian would become Hindu? God forbid. Do I wish that the Hindu or Buddhist would become Christian? God forbid.

The seed is put in the ground, and earth and air and water are placed around it. Does the seed become the earth, or the air, or the water? No. It becomes a plant, it develops after the law of its own growth, assimilates the air, the earth, and the water, converts them into plant substance, and grows into a plant.

Similar is the case with religion. The Christian is not to become a Hindu or a Buddhist, nor a Hindu or a Buddhist to become a Christian. But each must assimilate the spirit of the others and yet preserve his individuality and grow according to his own law of growth.

If the Parliament of Religions has shown anything to the world it is this: It has proved to the world that holiness, purity and charity are not the exclusive possessions of any church in the world, and that every system has produced men and women of the most exalted character. In the face of this evidence, if anybody dreams of the exclusive survival of his own religion and the destruction of the others, I pity him from the bottom of my heart, and point out to him that upon the banner of every religion will soon be written, in spite of resistance: "Help and not Fight," "Assimilation and not Destruction," "Harmony and Peace and not Dissension."

KARMA-YOGA

KARMA IN ITS EFFECT ON CHARACTER

The word Karma is derived from the Sanskrit Kri, to do; all action is Karma. Technically, this word also means the effects of actions. In connection with metaphysics, it sometimes means the effects, of which our past actions were the causes. But in Karma-Yoga we have simply to do with the word Karma as meaning work. The goal of mankind is knowledge. That is the one ideal placed before us by Eastern philosophy. Pleasure is not the goal of man, but knowledge. Pleasure and happiness come to an end. It is a mistake to suppose that pleasure is the goal. The cause of all the miseries we have in the world is that men foolishly think pleasure to be the ideal to strive for. After a time man finds that it is not happiness, but knowledge, towards which he is going, and that both pleasure and pain are great teachers, and that he learns as much from evil as from good. As pleasure and pain pass before his soul they have upon it different pictures, and the result of these combined impressions is what is called man's "character". If you take the character of any man, it really is but the aggregate of tendencies, the sum total of the bent of his mind; you will find that misery and happiness are equal factors in the formation of that character. Good and evil have an equal share in moulding character, and in some instances misery is a greater teacher than happiness. In studying the great characters the world has produced, I dare say, in the vast majority of cases, it would be found that it was misery that taught more than happiness, it was poverty that taught more than wealth, it was blows that brought out their inner fire more than praise.

Now this knowledge, again, is inherent in man. No knowledge comes from outside; it is all inside. What we say a man "knows", should, in strict psychological language, be what he "discovers" or "unveils"; what a man "learns" is really what he "discovers", by taking the cover off his own soul, which is a mine of infinite knowledge.

We say Newton discovered gravitation. Was it sitting anywhere in a corner waiting for him? It was in his own mind; the time came and he found it out. All knowledge that the world has ever received comes from the mind; the infinite library of the universe is in your own mind. The external world is simply the suggestion, the occasion, which sets you to study your own mind, but the object of your study is always your own mind. The falling of an apple gave the suggestion to Newton, and he studied his own mind. He rearranged all the previous links of thought in his mind and discovered a new link among them, which we call the law of gravitation. It was not in the apple nor in anything in the centre of the earth.

All knowledge, therefore, secular or spiritual, is in the human mind. In many cases it is not discovered, but remains covered, and

1 when the covering is being slowly taken off, we say, "We are 2 learning," and the advance of knowledge is made by the advance of 3 this process of uncovering. The man from whom this veil is being 4 lifted is the more knowing man, the man upon whom it lies thick is 5 ignorant, and the man from whom it has entirely gone is all-
6 knowing, omniscient. There have been omniscient men, and, I 7 believe, there will be yet; and that there will be myriads of them in 8 the cycles to come. Like fire in a piece of flint, knowledge exists in 9 the mind; suggestion is the friction which brings it out. So with all 10 our feelings and actions--our tears and our smiles, our joys and our 11 griefs, our weeping and our laughter, our curses and our blessings, 12 our praises and our blames--every one of these we may find, if we 13 calmly study our own selves, to have been brought out from within 14 ourselves by so many blows. The result is what we are. All these 15 blows taken together are called Karma--work, action. Every mental 16 and physical blow that is given to the soul, by which, as it were, fire 17 is struck from it, and by which its own power and knowledge are 18 discovered, is Karma, this word being used in its widest sense. Thus 19 we are all doing Karma all the time. I am talking to you: that is 20 Karma. You are listening: that is Karma. We breathe: that is Karma.
21 We walk: Karma. Everything we do, physical or mental, is Karma, 22 and it leaves its marks on us.

23 There are certain works which are, as it were, the aggregate, 24 the sum total, of a large number of smaller works. If we stand near 25 the seashore and hear the waves dashing against the shingle, we 26 think it is such a great noise, and yet we know that one wave is 27 really composed of millions and millions of minute waves. Each one 28 of these is making a noise, and yet we do not catch it; it is only 29 when they become the big aggregate that we hear. Similarly, every 30 pulsation of the heart is work. Certain kinds of work we feel and 31 they become tangible to us; they are, at the same time, the 32 aggregate of a number of small works. If you really want to judge of 33 the character of a man, look not at his great performances. Every 34 fool may become a hero at one time or another. Watch a man do his 35 most common actions; those are indeed the things which will tell 36 you the real character of a great man. Great occasions rouse even 37 the lowest of human beings to some kind of greatness, but he alone 38 is the really great man whose character is great always, the same 39 wherever he be.

40 Karma in its effect on character is the most tremendous 41 power than man has to deal with. Man is, as it were, a centre, and 42 is attracting all the powers of the universe towards himself, and in 43 this centre is fusing them all and again sending them off in a big 44 current. Such a centre is the real man--the almighty, the 45 omniscient--and he draws the whole universe towards him. Good 46 and bad, misery and happiness, all are running towards him and 47 clinging round him; and out of them he fashions the mighty stream 48 of tendency called character and throws it outwards. As he has the 49 power of drawing in anything, so has he the power of throwing it 50 out.

51 All the actions that we see in the world, all the movements in 52 human society, all the works that we have around us, are simply the 1 display of thought, the manifestation of the will of man. Machines 2 or instruments, cities, ships, or men-of-war, all these are simply the 3 manifestation of the will of man; and this will is caused by 4 character, and character is manufactured by Karma. As is Karma, 5 so is the manifestation of the will. The men of mighty will the world 6 has produced have all been tremendous workers--gigantic souls, 7 with wills powerful enough to overturn worlds, wills they got by 8 persistent work, through ages, and ages. Such a gigantic will as 9 that of a Buddha or a Jesus could not be obtained in one life, for we 10 know who their fathers were. It is not known that their fathers ever 11 spoke a word for the good of mankind. Millions and millions of 12 carpenters like Joseph had gone; millions are still living. Millions 13 and millions of petty kings like Buddha's father had been in the 14 world. If it was only a case of hereditary transmission, how do you 15 account for this petty prince, who was not, perhaps, obeyed by his 16 own servants, producing this son, whom half a world worships?

17 How do you explain the gulf between the carpenter and his son, 18 whom millions of human beings worship as God? It cannot be 19 solved by the theory of heredity. The gigantic will which Buddha 20 and Jesus threw over the world, whence did it come? Whence came 21 this accumulation of power? It must have been there through ages 22 and ages, continually growing bigger and bigger, until it burst on 23 society in a Buddha or a Jesus, even rolling down to the present day.

24 All this is determined by Karma, work. No one can get 25 anything unless he earns it. This is an eternal law. We may 26 sometimes think it is not so, but in the long run we become 27 convinced of it. A man may struggle all his life for riches; he may 28 cheat thousands, but he finds at last that he did not deserve to 29 become rich, and his life becomes a trouble and a nuisance to him.
30 We may go on accumulating things for our physical enjoyment, but 31 only what we earn is really ours. A fool may buy all the books in the 32 world, and they will be in his library; but he will be able to read 33 only those that he deserves to; and this deserving is produced by 34 Karma. Our Karma determines what we deserve and what we can 35 assimilate. We are responsible for what we are; and whatever we 36 wish ourselves to be, we have the power to make ourselves. If what 37 we are now has been the result of our own past actions, it certainly 38 follows that whatever we wish to be in future can be produced by 39 our present actions; so we have to know how to act. You will say, 40 "What is the use of learning how to work? Everyone works in some 41 way or other in this world." But there is such a thing as frittering 42 away our energies. With regard to Karma-Yoga, the Gita says that it 43 is doing work with cleverness and as a science; by knowing how to 44 work, one can obtain the greatest results. You must remember that 45 all work is simply to bring out the power of the mind which is 46 already there, to wake up the soul. The power is inside every man, 47 so is knowing; the different works are like blows to bring them out, 48 to cause these giants to wake up.

49 Man works with various motives. There cannot be work 50 without motive. Some people want to get fame, and they work for 51 fame. Others want money, and they work for money. Others want to 52 have power, and they work for power. Others want to get to heaven,

1 and they work for the same. Others want to leave a name when 2 they die, as they do in China, where no man gets a title until he is 3 dead; and that is a better way, after all, than with us. When a man 4 does something very good there, they give a title of nobility to his 5 father, who is dead, or to his grandfather. Some people work for 6 that. Some of the followers of certain Mohammedan sects work all 7 their lives to have a big tomb built for them when they die. I know 8 sects among whom, as soon as a child is born, a tomb is prepared 9 for it; that is among them the most important work a man has to do, 10 and the bigger and the finer the tomb, the better off the man is 11 supposed to be. Others work as a penance; do all sorts of wicked 12 things, then erect a temple, or give something to the priests to buy 13 them off and obtain from them a passport to heaven. They think 14 that this kind of beneficence will clear them and they will go scot-15 free in spite of their sinfulness. Such are some of the various 16 motives for work.

17 Work for work's sake. There are some who are really the salt 18 of the earth in every country and who work for work's sake, who do 19 not care for name, or fame, or even to go to heaven. They work just 20 because good will come of it. There are others who do good to the 21 poor and help mankind from still higher motives, because they 22 believe in doing good and love good. The motive for name and fame 23 seldom brings immediate results, as a rule; they come to us when 24 we are old and have almost done with life. If a man works without 25 any selfish motive in view, does he not gain anything? Yes, he gains 26 the highest. Unselfishness is more paying, only people have not the 27 patience to practise it. It is more paying from the point of view of 28 health also. Love, truth and unselfishness are not merely moral 29 figures of speech, but they form our highest ideal, because in them 30 lies such a manifestation of power. In the first place, a man who can 31 work for five days, or even for five minutes, without any selfish 32 motive whatever, without thinking of future, of heaven, of 33 punishment, or anything of the kind, has in him the capacity to 34 become a powerful moral giant. It is hard to do it, but in the heart 35 of our hearts we know its value, and the good it brings. It is the 36 greatest manifestation of power--this tremendous restraint; self-37 restraint is a manifestation of greater power than all outgoing 38 action. A carriage with four horses may rush down a hill 39 unrestrained, or the coachman may curb the horses. Which is the 40 greater manifestation of power, to let them go or to hold them? A 41 cannon-ball flying through the air goes a long distance and falls.
42 Another is cut short in its flight by striking against a wall, and the 43 impact generates intense heat. All outgoing energy following a 44 selfish motive is frittered away; it will not cause power to return to 45 you; but if restrained, it will result in development of power. This 46 self-control will tend to produce a mighty will, a character which 47 makes a Christ or a Buddha. Foolish men do not know this secret; 48 they nevertheless want to rule mankind. Even a fool may rule the 49 whole world if he works and waits. Let him wait a few years, 50 restrain that foolish idea of governing; and when that idea is wholly 51 gone, he will be a power in the world. The majority of us cannot see 52 beyond a few years, just as some animals cannot see beyond a few 53 steps. Just a little narrow circle--that is our world. We have not the 1 patience to look beyond, and thus become immoral and wicked.

2 This is our weakness, our powerlessness.

3 Even the lowest forms of work are not to be despised. Let the 4 man, who knows no better, work for selfish ends, for name and 5 fame; but everyone should always try to get towards higher and 6 higher motives and to understand them. "To work we have the 7 right, but not to the fruits thereof." Leave the fruits alone. Why care 8 for results? If you wish to help a man, never think what that man's 9 attitude should be towards you. If you want to do a great or a good 10 work, do not trouble to think what the result will be.

11 There arises a difficult question in this ideal of work. Intense 12 activity is necessary; we must always work. We cannot live a minute 13 without work. What then becomes of rest? Here is one side of the 14 life-struggle--work, in which we are whirled rapidly round. And here 15 is the other--that of calm, retiring renunciation: everything is 16 peaceful around, there is very little of noise and show, only nature 17 with her animals and flowers and mountains. Neither of them is a 18 perfect picture. A man used to solitude, if brought in contact with 19 the surging whirlpool of the world, will be crushed by it; just as the 20 fish that lives in the deep sea water, as soon as it is brought to the 21 surface, breaks into pieces, deprived of the weight of water on it 22 that had kept it together. Can a man who has been used to the 23 turmoil and the rush of life live at ease if he comes to a quiet place?
24 He suffers and perchance may lose his mind. The ideal man is he 25 who, in the midst of the greatest silence and solitude, finds the 26 intensest activity, and in the midst of the intensest activity finds the 27 silence and solitude of the desert. He has learnt the secret of 28 restraint, he has controlled himself. He goes through the streets of 29 a big city with all its traffic, and his mind is as calm as if he were in 30 a cave, where not a sound could reach him; and he is intensely 31 working all the time. That is the ideal of Karma- Yoga, and if you 32 have attained to that you have really learnt the secret of work.

33 But we have to begin from the beginning, to take up the 34 works as they come to us and slowly make ourselves more unselfish 35 every day. We must do the work and find out the motive power that 36 prompts us; and, almost without exception, in the first years, we 37 shall find that our motives are always selfish; but gradually this 38 selfishness will melt by persistence, till at last will come the time 39 when we shall be able to do really unselfish work. We may all hope 40 that some day or other, as we struggle through the paths of life, 41 there will come a time when we shall become perfectly unselfish; 42 and the moment we attain to that, all our powers will be 43 concentrated, and the knowledge which is ours will be manifest.

EACH IS GREAT IN HIS OWN PLACE

According to the Sankhya philosophy, nature is composed of three forces called, in Sanskrit, Sattva, Rajas, and Tamas. These as manifested in the physical world are what we may call equilibrium, activity, and inertness. Tamas is typified as darkness or inactivity; Rajas is activity, expressed as attraction or repulsion; and Sattva is the equilibrium of the two.

In every man there are these three forces. Sometimes Tamas prevails. We become lazy, we cannot move, we are inactive, bound down by certain ideas or by mere dullness. At other times activity prevails, and at still other times that calm balancing of both. Again, in different men, one of these forces is generally predominant. The characteristic of one man is inactivity, dullness and laziness; that of another, activity, power, manifestation of energy; and in still another we find the sweetness, calmness, and gentleness, which are due to the balancing of both action and inaction. So in all creation--in animals, plants, and men--we find the more or less typical manifestation of all these different forces.

Karma-Yoga has specially to deal with these three factors. By teaching what they are and how to employ them, it helps us to do our work better. Human society is a graded organisation. We all know about morality, and we all know about duty, but at the same time we find that in different countries the significance of morality varies greatly. What is regarded as moral in one country may in another be considered perfectly immoral. For instance, in one country cousins may marry; in another, it is thought to be very immoral; in one, men may marry their sisters-in-law; in another, it is regarded as immoral; in one country people may marry only once; in another, many times; and so forth. Similarly, in all other departments of morality, we find the standard varies greatly- yet we have the idea that there must be a universal standard of morality.

So it is with duty. The idea of duty varies much among different nations. In one country, if a man does not do certain things, people will say he has acted wrongly; while if he does those very things in another country, people will say that he did not act rightly--and yet we know that there must be some universal idea of duty. In the same way, one class of society thinks that certain things are among its duty, while another class thinks quite the opposite and would be horrified if it had to do those things. Two ways are left open to us--the way of the ignorant, who think that there is only one way to truth and that all the rest are wrong, and the way of the wise, who admit that, according to our mental constitution or the different planes of existence in which we are, duty and morality may vary. The important thing is to know that there are gradations of duty and of morality--that the duty of one state of life, in one set of circumstances, will not and cannot be that of another.

To illustrate: All great teachers have taught, "Resist not evil," that non-resistance is the highest moral ideal. We all know that, if a certain number of us attempted to put that maxim fully into

1 practice, the whole social fabric would fall to pieces, the wicked
2 would take possession of our properties and our lives, and would do 3 whatever they like with us. Even if only one day of such non-4 resistance were practised, it would lead to disaster. Yet, intuitively, 5 in our heart of hearts we feel the truth of the teaching "Resist not 6 evil." This seems to us to be the highest ideal; yet to teach this 7 doctrine only would be equivalent to condemning a vast portion of 8 mankind. Not only so, it would be making men feel that they were 9 always doing wrong, and cause in them scruples of conscience in all 10 their actions; it would weaken them, and that constant self-11 disapproval would breed more vice than any other weakness would.
12 To the man who has begun to hate himself the gate to degeneration 13 has already opened; and the same is true of a nation.

14 Our first duty is not to hate ourselves, because to advance we 15 must have faith in ourselves first and then in God. He who has no 16 faith in himself can never have faith in God. Therefore, the only 17 alternative remaining to us is to recognise that duty and morality 18 vary under different circumstances; not that the man who resists 19 evil is doing what is always and in itself wrong, but that in the 20 different circumstances in which he is placed it may become even 21 his duty to resist evil.

22 In reading the Bhagavad-Gita, many of you in Western 23 countries may have felt astonished at the second chapter, wherein 24 Sri Krishna calls Arjuna a hypocrite and a coward because of his 25 refusal to fight, or offer resistance, on account of his adversaries 26 being his friends and relatives, making the plea that non-resistance 27 was the highest ideal of love. This is a great lesson for us all to 28 learn, that in all matters the two extremes are alike. The extreme 29 positive and the extreme negative are always similar. When the 30 vibrations of light are too slow, we do not see them, nor do we see 31 them when they are too rapid. So with sound; when very low in 32 pitch, we do not hear it; when very high, we do not hear it either. Of 33 like nature is the difference between resistance and non-resistance.
34 One man does not resist because he is weak, lazy, and cannot, not 35 because he will not; the other man knows that he can strike an 36 irresistible blow if he likes; yet he not only does not strike, but 37 blesses his enemies. The one who from weakness resists not 38 commits a sin, and as such cannot receive any benefit from the non-39 resistance; while the other would commit a sin by offering 40 resistance. Buddha gave up his throne and renounced his position, 41 that was true renunciation; but there cannot be any question of 42 renunciation in the case of a beggar who has nothing to renounce.
43 So we must always be careful about what we really mean when we 44 speak of this non-resistance and ideal love. We must first take care 45 to understand whether we have the power of resistance or not.
46 Then, having the power, if we renounce it and do not resist, we are 47 doing a grand act of love; but if we cannot resist, and yet, at the 48 same time, try to deceive ourselves into the belief that we are 49 actuated by motives of the highest love, we are doing the exact 50 opposite. Arjuna became a coward at the sight of the mighty array 51 against him; his "love" make him forget his duty towards his 52 country and king. That is why Sri Krishna told him that he was a

1 hypocrite; Thou talkest like a wise man, but thy actions betray thee 2 to be a coward; therefore stand up and fight!

3 Such is the central idea of Karma-Yoga. The Karma-Yogi is the 4 man who understands that the highest ideal is non-resistance, and 5 who also knows that this non-resistance is the highest manifestation 6 of power in actual possession, and also what is called the resisting 7 of evil is but a step on the way towards the manifestation of this 8 highest power, namely, non-resistance. Before reaching this highest 9 ideal, man's duty is to resist evil; let him work, let him fight, let him 10 strike straight from the shoulder. Then only, when he has gained the 11 power to resist, will non-resistance be a virtue.

12 I once met a man in my country whom I had known before as 13 a very stupid, dull person, who knew nothing and had not the desire 14 to know anything, and was living the life of a brute. He asked me 15 what he should do to know God, how he was to get free. "Can you 16 tell a lie?" I asked him. "No," he replied. "Then you must learn to do 17 so. It is better to tell a lie than to be a brute, or a log of wood. You 18 are inactive; you have not certainly reached the highest state, 19 which is beyond all actions, calm and serene; you are too dull even 20 to do something wicked." That was an extreme case, of course, and 21 I was joking with him; but what I meant was that a man must be 22 active in order to pass through activity to perfect calmness.

23 Inactivity should be avoided by all means. Activity always 24 means resistance. Resist all evils, mental and physical; and when 25 you have succeeded in resisting, then will calmness come. It is very 26 easy to say, "Hate nobody, resist not evil," but we know what that 27 kind of thing generally means in practice. When the eyes of society 28 are turned towards us, we may make a show of non-resistance, but 29 in our hearts it is canker all the time. We feel the utter want of the 30 calm of non-resistance; we feel that it would be better for us to 31 resist. If you desire wealth, and know at the same time that the 32 whole world regards him who aims at wealth as a very wicked man, 33 you, perhaps, will not dare to plunge into the struggle for wealth, 34 yet your mind will be running day and night after money. This is 35 hypocrisy and will serve no purpose. Plunge into the world, and 36 then, after a time, when you have suffered and enjoyed all that is in 37 it, will renunciation come; then will calmness come. So fulfil your 38 desire for power and everything else, and after you have fulfilled 39 the desire, will come the time when you will know that they are all 40 very little things; but until you have fulfilled this desire, until you 41 have passed through that activity, it is impossible for you to come to 42 the state of calmness, serenity, and self-surrender. These ideas of 43 serenity and renunciation have been preached for thousands of 44 years; everybody has heard of them from childhood, and yet we see 45 very few in the world who have really reached that stage. I do not 46 know if I have seen twenty persons in my life who are really calm 47 and non-resisting, and I have travelled over half the world.

48 Every man should take up his own ideal and endeavour to 49 accomplish it. That is a surer way of progress than taking up other 50 men's ideals, which he can never hope to accomplish. For instance, 51 we take a child and at once give him the task of walking twenty 52 miles. Either the little one dies, or one in a thousand crawls the 1 twenty miles, to reach the end exhausted and half-dead. That is like 2 what we generally try to do with the world. All the men and women, 3 in any society, are not of the same mind, capacity, or of the same 4 power to do things; they must have different ideals, and we have no 5 right to sneer at any ideal. Let every one do the best he can for 6 realising his own ideal. Nor is it right that I should be judged by 7 your standard or you by mine. The apple tree should not be judged 8 by the standard of the oak, nor the oak by that of the apple. To 9 judge the apple tree you must take the apple standard, and for the 10 oak, its own standard.

11 Unity in variety is the plan of creation. However men and 12 women may vary individually, there is unity in the background. The 13 different individual characters and classes of men and women are 14 natural variations in creation. Hence, we ought not to judge them 15 by the same standard or put the same ideal before them. Such a 16 course creates only an unnatural struggle, and the result is that 17 man begins to hate himself and is hindered from becoming religious 18 and good. Our duty is to encourage every one in his struggle to live 19 up to his own highest ideal, and strive at the same time to make the 20 ideal as near as possible to the truth.

21 In the Hindu system of morality we find that this fact has 22 been recognised from very ancient times; and in their scriptures 23 and books on ethics different rules are laid down for the different 24 classes of men--the householder, the Sannyasin (the man who has 25 renounced the world), and the student.

26 The life of every individual, according to the Hindu scriptures, 27 has its peculiar duties apart from what belongs in common to 28 universal humanity. The Hindu begins life as a student; then he 29 marries and becomes a householder; in old age he retires; and 30 lastly he gives up the world and becomes a Sannyasin. To each of 31 these stages of life certain duties are attached. No one of these 32 stages is intrinsically superior to another. The life of the married 33 man is quite as great as that of the celibate who has devoted 34 himself to religious work. The scavenger in the street is quite as 35 great and glorious as the king on his throne. Take him off his 36 throne, make him do the work of the scavenger, and see how he 37 fares. Take up the scavenger and see how he will rule. It is useless 38 to say that the man who lives out of the world is a greater man than 39 he who lives in the world; it is much more difficult to live in the 40 world and worship God than to give it up and live a free and easy 41 life. The four stages of life in India have in later times been reduced 42 to two--that of the householder and of the monk. The householder 43 marries and carries on his duties as a citizen, and the duty of the 44 other is to devote his energies wholly to religion, to preach and to 45 worship God. I shall read to you a few passages from the Maha-
46 Nirvana-Tantra, which treats of this subject, and you will see that it 47 is a very difficult task for a man to be a householder, and perform 48 all his duties perfectly:

49 The householder should be devoted to God; the knowledge of 50 God should be his goal of life. Yet he must work constantly, perform 51 all his duties; he must give up the fruits of his actions to God.

1 It is the most difficult thing in this world to work and not care 2 for the result, to help a man and never think that he ought to be 3 grateful, to do some good work and at the same time never look to 4 see whether it brings you name or fame, or nothing at all. Even the 5 most arrant coward becomes brave when the world praises him. A 6 fool can do heroic deeds when the approbation of society is upon 7 him, but for a man to constantly do good without caring for the 8 approbation of his fellow men is indeed the highest sacrifice man 9 can perform. The great duty of the householder is to earn a living, 10 but he must take care that he does not do it by telling lies, or by 11 cheating, or by robbing others; and he must remember that his life 12 is for the service of God, and the poor.

13 Knowing that mother and father are the visible 14 representatives of God, the householder, always and by all means, 15 must please them. If the mother is pleased, and the father, God is 16 pleased with the man. That child is really a good child who never 17 speaks harsh words to his parents.

18 Before parents one must not utter jokes, must not show 19 restlessness, must not show anger or temper. Before mother or 20 father, a child must bow down low, and stand up in their presence, 21 and must not take a seat until they order him to sit.

22 If the householder has food and drink and clothes without 23 first seeing that his mother and his father, his children, his wife, 24 and the poor, are supplied, he is committing a sin. The mother and 25 the father are the causes of this body; so a man must undergo a 26 thousand troubles in order to do good to them.

27 Even so is his duty to his wife. No man should scold his wife, 28 and he must always maintain her as if she were his own mother.
29 And even when he is in the greatest difficulties and troubles, he 30 must not show anger to his wife.

31 He who thinks of another woman besides his wife, if he 32 touches her even with his mind--that man goes to dark hell.

33 Before women he must not talk improper language, and never 34 brag of his powers. He must not say, "I have done this, and I have 35 done that."

36 The householder must always please his wife with money, 37 clothes, love, faith, and words like nectar, and never do anything to 38 disturb her. That man who has succeeded in getting the love of a 39 chaste wife has succeeded in his religion and has all the virtues.

40 The following are duties towards children:

41 A son should be lovingly reared up to his fourth year; he 42 should be educated till he is sixteen. When he is twenty years of 43 age he should be employed in some work; he should then be treated 44 affectionately by his father as his equal. Exactly in the same manner 45 the daughter should be brought up, and should be educated with 46 the greatest care. And when she marries, the father ought to give 47 her jewels and wealth.

48 Then the duty of the man is towards his brothers and sisters, 49 and towards the children of his brothers and sisters, if they are 1 poor, and towards his other relatives, his friends and his servants.

2 Then his duties are towards the people of the same village, and the 3 poor, and any one that comes to him for help. Having sufficient 4 means, if the householder does not take care to give to his relatives 5 and to the poor, know him to be only a brute; his is not a human 6 being.

7 Excessive attachment to food, clothes, and the tending of the 8 body, and dressing of the hair should be avoided. The householder 9 must be pure in heart and clean in body, always active and always 10 ready for work.

11 To his enemies the householder must be a hero. Then he 12 must resist. That is the duty of the householder. He must not sit 13 down in a corner and weep, and talk nonsense about non-14 resistance. If he does not show himself a hero to his enemies he has 15 not done his duty. And to his friends and relatives he must be as 16 gentle as a lamb.

17 It is the duty of the householder not to pay reverence to the 18 wicked; because, if he reverences the wicked people of the world, 19 he patronises wickedness; and it will be a great mistake if he 20 disregards those who are worthy of respect, the good people. He 21 must not be gushing in his friendship; he must not go out of the way 22 making friends everywhere; he must watch the actions of the men 23 he wants to make friends with, and their dealings with other men, 24 reason upon them, and then make friends.

25 These three things he must not talk of. He must not talk in 26 public of his own fame; he must not preach his own name or his 27 own powers; he must not talk of his wealth, or of anything that has 28 been told to him privately.

29 A man must not say he is poor, or that he is wealthy--he must 30 not brag of his wealth. Let him keep his own counsel; this is his 31 religious duty. This is not mere worldly wisdom; if a man does not 32 do so, he may be held to be immoral.

33 The householder is the basis, the prop, of the whole society.
34 He is the principal earner. The poor, the weak, the children and the 35 women who do not work--all live upon the householder; so there 36 must be certain duties that he has to perform, and these duties 37 must make him feel strong to perform them, and not make him 38 think that he is doing things beneath his ideal. Therefore, if he has 39 done something weak, or has made some mistake, he must not say 40 so in public; and if he is engaged in some enterprise and knows he 41 is sure to fail in it, he must not speak of it. Such self-exposure is not 42 only uncalled for, but also unnerves the man and makes him unfit 43 for the performance of his legitimate duties in life. At the same 44 time, he must struggle hard to acquire these things--firstly, 45 knowledge, and secondly, wealth. It is his duty, and if he does not do 46 his duty, he is nobody. A householder who does not struggle to get 47 wealth is immoral. If he is lazy and content to lead an idle life, he is 48 immoral, because upon him depend hundreds. If he gets riches, 49 hundreds of others will be thereby supported.

50 If there were not in this city hundreds who had striven to 1 become rich, and who had acquired wealth, where would all this 2 civilisation, and these alms-houses and great houses be?

3 Going after wealth in such a case is not bad, because that 4 wealth is for distribution. The householder is the centre of life and 5 society. It is a worship for him to acquire and spend wealth nobly, 6 for the householder who struggles to become rich by good means 7 and for good purposes is doing practically the same thing for the 8 attainment of salvation as the anchorite does in his cell when he is 9 praying; for in them we see only the different aspects of the same 10 virtue of self-surrender and self-sacrifice prompted by the feeling of 11 devotion to God and to all that is His.

12 He must struggle to acquire a good name by all means. He 13 must not gamble, he must not move in the company of the wicked, 14 he must not tell lies, and must not be the cause of trouble to others.

15 Often people enter into things they have not the means to 16 accomplish, with the result that they cheat others to attain their 17 own ends. Then there is in all things the time factor to be taken into 18 consideration; what at one time might be a failure, would perhaps 19 at another time be a very great success.

20 The householder must speak the truth, and speak gently, 21 using words which people like, which will do good to others; nor 22 should he talk of the business of other men.

23 The householder by digging tanks, by planting trees on the 24 roadsides, by establishing rest-houses for men and animals, by 25 making roads and building bridges, goes towards the same goal as 26 the greatest Yogi.

27 This is one part of the doctrine of Karma-Yoga--activity, the 28 duty of the householder. There is a passage later on, where it says 29 that "if the householder dies in battle, fighting for his country or his 30 religion, he comes to the same goal as the Yogi by meditation," 31 showing thereby that what is duty for one is not duty for another. At 32 the same time, it does not say that this duty is lowering and the 33 other elevating. Each duty has its own place, and according to the 34 circumstances in which we are placed, must we perform our duties.

35 One idea comes out of all this--the condemnation of all 36 weakness. This is a particular idea in all our teachings which I like, 37 either in philosophy, or in religion, or in work. If you read the Vedas, 38 you will find this word always repeated--fearlessness--fear nothing.
39 Fear is a sign of weakness. A man must go about his duties without 40 taking notice of the sneers and the ridicule of the world.

41 If a man retires from the world to worship God, he must not 42 think that those who live in the world and work for the good of the 43 world are not worshipping God: neither must those who live in the 44 world, for wife and children, think that those who give up the world 45 are low vagabonds. Each is great in his own place. This thought I 46 will illustrate by a story.

47 A certain king used to inquire of all the Sannyasins that came 48 to his country, "Which is the greater man--he who gives up the 49 world and becomes a Sannyasin, or he who lives in the world and

1 performs his duties as a householder?" Many wise men sought to 2 solve the problem. Some asserted that the Sannyasin was the 3 greater, upon which the king demanded that they should prove their 4 assertion. When they could not, he ordered them to marry and 5 become householders. Then others came and said, "The 6 householder who performs his duties is the greater man." Of them, 7 too the king demanded proofs. When they could not give them, he 8 made them also settle down as householders.

9 At last there came a young Sannyasin, and the king similarly 10 inquired of him also. He answered, "Each, O king, is equally great 11 in his place." "Prove this to me," asked the king. "I will prove it to 12 you," said the Sannyasin, "but you must first come and live as I do 13 for a few days, that I may be able to prove to you what I say." The 14 king consented and followed the Sannyasin out of his own territory 15 and passed through many other countries until they came to a great 16 kingdom. In the capital of that kingdom a great ceremony was 17 going on. The king and the Sannyasin heard the noise of drums and 18 music, and heard also the criers; the people were assembled in the 19 streets in gala dress, and a great proclamation was being made.
20 The king and the Sannyasin stood there to see what was going on.
21 The crier was proclaiming loudly that the princess, daughter of the 22 king of that country, was about to choose a husband from among 23 those assembled before her.

24 It was an old custom in India for princesses to choose 25 husbands in this way. Each princess had certain ideas of the sort of 26 man she wanted for a husband. Some would have the handsomest 27 man, others would have only the most learned, others again the 28 richest, and so on. All the princes of the neighbourhood put on their 29 bravest attire and presented themselves before her. Sometimes 30 they too had their own criers to enumerate their advantages and 31 the reasons why they hoped the princess would choose them. The 32 princess was taken round on a throne, in the most splendid array, 33 and looked at and heard about them. If she was not pleased with 34 what she saw and heard, she said to her bearers, "Move on," and no 35 more notice was taken of the rejected suitors. If, however, the 36 princess was pleased with any one of them, she threw a garland of 37 flowers over him and he became her husband.

38 The princess of the country to which our king and the 39 Sannyasin had come was having one of these interesting 40 ceremonies. She was the most beautiful princess in the world, and 41 the husband of the princess would be ruler of the kingdom after her 42 father's death. The idea of this princess was to marry the 43 handsomest man, but she could not find the right one to please her.
44 Several times these meetings had taken place, but the princess 45 could not select a husband. This meeting was the most splendid of 46 all; more people than ever had come to it. The princess came in on a 47 throne, and the bearers carried her from place to place. She did not 48 seem to care for any one, and every one became disappointed that 49 this meeting also was going to be a failure. Just then came a young 50 man, a Sannyasin, handsome as if the sun had come down to the 51 earth, and stood in one corner of the assembly, watching what was 52 going on. The throne with the princess came near him, and as soon

1 as she saw the beautiful Sannyasin, she stopped and threw the 2 garland over him. The young Sannyasin seized the garland and 3 threw it off, exclaiming, "What nonsense is this? I am a Sannyasin.
4 What is marriage to me?" The king of that country thought that 5 perhaps this man was poor and so dared not marry the princess, 6 and said to him, "With my daughter goes half my kingdom now, and 7 the whole kingdom after my death!" and put the garland again on 8 the Sannyasin. The young man threw it off once more, saying, 9 "Nonsense! I do not want to marry," and walked quickly away from 10 the assembly.

11 Now the princess had fallen so much in love with this young 12 man that she said, "I must marry this man or I shall die"; and she 13 went after him to bring him back. Then our other Sannyasin, who 14 had brought the king there, said to him, "King, let us follow this 15 pair"; so they walked after them, but at a good distance behind. The 16 young Sannyasin who had refused to marry the princess walked out 17 into the country for several miles. When he came to a forest and 18 entered into it, the princess followed him, and the other two 19 followed them. Now this young Sannyasin was well acquainted with 20 that forest and knew all the intricate paths in it. He suddenly 21 passed into one of these and disappeared, and the princess could 22 not discover him. After trying for a long time to find him she sat 23 down under a tree and began to weep, for she did not know the way 24 out. Then our king and the other Sannyasin came up to her and 25 said, "Do not weep; we will show you the way out of this forest, but 26 it is too dark for us to find it now. Here is a big tree; let us rest 27 under it, and in the morning we will go early and show you the 28 road."

29 Now a little bird and his wife and their three little ones lived 30 on that tree, in a nest. This little bird looked down and saw the 31 three people under the tree and said to his wife, "My dear, what 32 shall we do? Here are some guests in the house, and it is winter, 33 and we have no fire." So he flew away and got a bit of burning 34 firewood in his beak and dropped it before the guests, to which they 35 added fuel and made a blazing fire. But the little bird was not 36 satisfied. He said again to his wife, "My dear, what shall we do?
37 There is nothing to give these people to eat, and they are hungry.
38 We are householders; it is our duty to feed any one who comes to 39 the house. I must do what I can, I will give them my body." So he 40 plunged into the midst of the fire and perished. The guests saw him 41 falling and tried to save him, but he was too quick for them.

42 The little bird's wife saw what her husband did, and she said, 43 "Here are three persons and only one little bird for them to eat. It is 44 not enough; it is my duty as a wife not to let my husband's effort go 45 in vain; let them have my body also." Then she fell into the fire and 46 was burned to death.

47 Then the three baby-birds, when they saw what was done and 48 that there was still not enough food for the three guests, said, "Our 49 parents have done what they could and still it is not enough. It is 50 our duty to carry on the work of our parents; let our bodies go too." 51 And they all dashed down into the fire also.

1 Amazed at what they saw, the three people could not of 2 course eat these birds. They passed the night without food, and in 3 the morning the king and the Sannyasin showed the princess the 4 way, and she went back to her father.

5 Then the Sannyasin said to the king, "King, you have seen 6 that each is great in his own place. If you want to live in the world, 7 live like those birds, ready at any moment to sacrifice yourself for 8 others. If you want to renounce the world, be like that young man to 9 whom the most beautiful woman and a kingdom were as nothing. If 10 you want to be a householder, hold your life a sacrifice for the 11 welfare of others; and if you choose the life of renunciation, do not 12 even look at beauty and money and power. Each is great in his own 13 place, but the duty of the one is not the duty of the other."

THE SECRET OF WORK

4 Helping others physically by removing their physical needs, is 5 indeed great, but the help is great according as the need is greater 6 and according as the help is far-reaching. If a man's wants can be 7 removed for an hour, it is helping him indeed; if his wants can be 8 removed for a year, it will be more help to him; but if his wants can 9 be removed for ever, it is surely the greatest help that can be given 10 him. Spiritual knowledge is the only thing that can destroy our 11 miseries for ever; any other knowledge satisfies wants only for a 12 time. It is only with the knowledge of the spirit that the faculty of 13 want is annihilated for ever; so helping man spiritually is the 14 highest help that can be given to him. He who gives man spiritual 15 knowledge is the greatest benefactor of mankind and as such we 16 always find that those were the most powerful of men who helped 17 man in his spiritual needs, because spirituality is the true basis of 18 all our activities in life. A spiritually strong and sound man will be 19 strong in every other respect, if he so wishes. Until there is spiritual 20 strength in man even physical needs cannot be well satisfied. Next 21 to spiritual comes intellectual help. The gift of knowledge is a far 22 higher gift than that of food and clothes; it is even higher than 23 giving life to a man, because the real life of man consists of 24 knowledge. Ignorance is death, knowledge is life. Life is of very 25 little value, if it is a life in the dark, groping through ignorance and 26 misery. Next in order comes, of course, helping a man physically.
27 Therefore, in considering the question of helping others, we must 28 always strive not to commit the mistake of thinking that physical 29 help is the only help that can be given. It is not only the last but the 30 least, because it cannot bring about permanent satisfaction. The 31 misery that I feel when I am hungry is satisfied by eating, but 32 hunger returns; my misery can cease only when I am satisfied
33 beyond all want. Then hunger will not make me miserable; no 34 distress, no sorrow will be able to move me. So, that help which 35 tends to make us strong spiritually is the highest, next to it comes 36 intellectual help, and after that physical help.

37 The miseries of the world cannot be cured by physical help 38 only. Until man's nature changes, these physical needs will always 39 arise, and miseries will always be felt, and no amount of physical 40 help will cure them completely. The only solution of this problem is 41 to make mankind pure. Ignorance is the mother of all the evil and 42 all the misery we see. Let men have light, let them be pure and 43 spiritually strong and educated, then alone will misery cease in the 44 world, not before. We may convert every house in the country into a 45 charity asylum, we may fill the land with hospitals, but the misery of 46 man will still continue to exist until man's character changes.

47 We read in the Bhagavad Gita again and again that we must 48 all work incessantly. All work is by nature composed of good and 49 evil. We cannot do any work which will not do some good 50 somewhere; there cannot be any work which will not cause some 51 harm somewhere. Every work must necessarily be a mixture of 1 good and evil; yet we are commanded to work incessantly. Good 2 and evil will both have their results, will produce their Karma. Good 3 action will entail upon us good effect; bad action, bad. But good and 4 bad are both bondages of the soul. The solution reached in the Gita 5 in regard to this bondage-producing nature of work is that, if we do 6 not attach ourselves to the work we do, it will not have any binding 7 effect on our soul. We shall try to understand what is meant by this 8 "non-attachment" to work.

9 This is the one central idea in the Gita: work incessantly, but 10 be not attached to it. Samskara can be translated very nearly by 11 "inherent tendency". Using the simile of a lake for the mind, every 12 ripple, every wave that rises in the mind, when it subsides, does not 13 die out entirely, but leaves a mark and a future possibility of that 14 wave coming out again. This mark, with the possibility of the wave 15 reappearing, is what is called Samskara. Every work that we do, 16 every movement of the body, every thought that we think, leaves 17 such an impression on the mind-stuff, and even when such 18 impressions are not obvious on the surface, they are sufficiently 19 strong to work beneath the surface, subconsciously. What we are 20 every moment is determined by the sum total of these impressions 21 on the mind. What I am just at this moment is the effect of the sum 22 total of all the impressions of my past life. This is really what is 23 meant by character; each man's character is determined by the sum 24 total of these impressions. If good impressions prevail, the 25 character becomes good; if bad, it becomes bad. If a man 26 continuously hears bad words, thinks bad thoughts, does bad 27 actions, his mind will be full of bad impressions; and they will 28 influence his thought and work without his being conscious of the 29 fact. In fact, these bad impressions are always working, and their 30 resultant must be evil, and that man will be a bad man; he cannot 31 help it. The sum total of these impressions in him will create the 32 strong motive power for doing bad actions. He will be like a 33 machine in the hand of his impressions, and they will force him to 34 do evil. Similarly, if a man thinks good thoughts and does good 35 works, the sum total of these impressions will be good; and they, in 36 a similar manner, will force him to do good even in spite of himself.
37 When a man has done so much good work and thought so many 38 good thoughts that there is an irresistible tendency in him to do 39 good, in spite of himself and even if he wishes to do evil, his mind, 40 as the sum total of his tendencies, will not allow him to do so; the 41 tendencies will turn him back; he is completely under the influence 42 of the good tendencies. When such is the case, a man's good 43 character is said to be established.

44 As the tortoise tucks its feet and head inside the shell, and 45 you may kill it and break it in pieces, and yet it will not come out, 46 even so the character of that man who has control over his motives 47 and organs is unchangeably established. He controls his own inner 48 forces, and nothing can draw them out against his will. By this 49 continuous reflex of good thoughts, good impressions moving over 50 the surface of the mind, the tendency for doing good becomes 51 strong, and as the result we feel able to control the Indriyas (the 52 sense-organs, the nerve-centres). Thus alone will character be

1 established, then alone a man gets to truth. Such a man is safe for 2 ever; he cannot do any evil. You may place him in any company, 3 there will be no danger for him. There is a still higher state than 4 having this good tendency, and that is the desire for liberation. You 5 must remember that freedom of the soul is the goal of all Yogas, 6 and each one equally leads to the same result. By work alone men 7 may get to where Buddha got largely by meditation or Christ by 8 prayer. Buddha was a working Jnani, Christ was a Bhakta, but the 9 same goal was reached by both of them. The difficulty is here.
10 Liberation means entire freedom--freedom from the bondage of 11 good, as well as from the bondage of evil. A golden chain is as much 12 a chain as an iron one. There is a thorn in my finger, and I use 13 another to take the first one out; and when I have taken it out, I 14 throw both of them aside; I have no necessity for keeping the 15 second thorn, because both are thorns after all. So the bad 16 tendencies are to be counteracted by the good ones, and the bad 17 impressions on the mind should be removed by the fresh waves of 18 good ones, until all that is evil almost disappears, or is subdued and 19 held in control in a corner of the mind; but after that, the good 20 tendencies have also to be conquered. Thus the "attached" becomes 21 the "unattached". Work, but let not the action or the thought 22 produce a deep impression on the mind. Let the ripples come and 23 go, let huge actions proceed from the muscles and the brain, but let 24 them not make any deep impression on the soul.

25 How can this be done? We see that the impression of any 26 action, to which we attach ourselves, remains. I may meet hundred 27 of persons during the day, and among them meet also one whom I
28 love; and when I retire at night, I may try to think of all the faces I 29 saw, but only that face comes before the mind--the face which I met 30 perhaps only for one minute, and which I loved; all the others have 31 vanished. My attachment to this particular person caused a deeper 32 impression on my mind than all the other faces. Physiologically the 33 impressions have all been the same; every one of the faces that I 34 saw pictured itself on the retina, and the brain took the pictures in, 35 and yet there was no similarity of effect upon the mind. Most of the 36 faces, perhaps, were entirely new faces, about which I had never 37 thought before, but that one face of which I got only a glimpse 38 found associations inside. Perhaps I had pictured him in my mind 39 for years, knew hundreds of things about him, and this one new 40 vision of him awakened hundreds of sleeping memories in my mind; 41 and this one impression having been repeated perhaps a hundred 42 times more than those of the different faces together, will produce a 43 great effect on the mind.

44 Therefore, be "unattached"; let things work; let brain centres 45 work; work incessantly, but let not a ripple conquer the mind. Work 46 as if you were a stranger in this land, a sojourner; work incessantly, 47 but do not bind yourselves; bondage is terrible. This world is not 48 our habitation, it is only one of the many stages through which we 49 are passing. Remember that great saying of the Sankhya, "The 50 whole of nature is for the soul, not the soul for nature." The very 51 reason of nature's existence is for the education of the soul; it has 52 no other meaning; it is there because the soul must have

1 knowledge, and through knowledge free itself. If we remember this 2 always, we shall never be attached to nature; we shall know that 3 nature is a book in which we are to read, and that when we have 4 gained the required knowledge, the book is of no more value to us.
5 Instead of that, however, we are identifying ourselves with nature; 6 we are thinking that the soul is for nature, that the spirit is for the 7 flesh, and, as the common saying has it, we think that man "lives to 8 eat" and not "eats to live". We are continually making this mistake; 9 we are regarding nature as ourselves and are becoming attached to 10 it; and as soon as this attachment comes, there is the deep 11 impression on the soul, which binds us down and makes us work 12 not from freedom but like slaves.

13 The whole gist of this teaching is that you should work like a 14 master and not as a slave; work incessantly, but do not do slave's 15 work. Do you not see how everybody works? Nobody can be 16 altogether at rest; ninety-nine per cent of mankind work like slaves, 17 and the result is misery; it is all selfish work. Work through 18 freedom! Work through love! The word "love" is very difficult to 19 understand; love never comes until there is freedom. There is no 20 true love possible in the slave. If you buy a slave and tie him down 21 in chains and make him work for you, he will work like a drudge, 22 but there will be no love in him. So when we ourselves work for the 23 things of the world as slaves, there can be no love in us, and our 24 work is not true work. This is true of work done for relatives and 25 friends, and is true of work done for our own selves. Selfish work is 26 slave's work; and here is a test. Every act of love brings happiness; 27 there is no act of love which does not bring peace and blessedness 28 as its reaction. Real existence, real knowledge, and real love are 29 eternally connected with one another, the three in one: where one 30 of them is, the others also must be; they are the three aspects of 31 the One without a second--the Existence-Knowledge-Bliss. When 32 that existence becomes relative, we see it as the world; that 33 knowledge becomes in its turn modified into the knowledge of the 34 things of the world; and that bliss forms the foundation of all true 35 love known to the heart of man. Therefore true love can never react 36 so as to cause pain either to the lover or to the beloved. Suppose a 37 man loves a woman; he wishes to have her all to himself and feels 38 extremely jealous about her every movement; he wants her to sit 39 near him, to stand near him, and to eat and move at his bidding. He 40 is a slave to her and wishes to have her as his slave. That is not 41 love; it is a kind of morbid affection of the slave, insinuating itself as 42 love. It cannot be love, because it is painful; if she does not do what 43 he wants, it brings him pain. With love there is no painful reaction; 44 love only brings a reaction of bliss; if it does not, it is not love; it is 45 mistaking something else for love. When you have succeeded in 46 loving your husband, your wife, your children, the whole world, the 47 universe, in such a manner that there is no reaction of pain or 48 jealousy, no selfish feeling, then you are in a fit state to be 49 unattached.

50 Krishna says, "Look at Me, Arjuna! If I stop from work for one 51 moment, the whole universe will die. I have nothing to gain from 52 work; I am the one Lord, but why do I work? Because I love the 1 world." God is unattached because He loves; that real love makes 2 us unattached. Wherever there is attachment, the clinging to the 3 things of the world, you must know that it is all physical attraction 4 between sets of particles of matter--something that attracts two 5 bodies nearer and nearer all the time and, if they cannot get near 6 enough, produces pain; but where there is real love, it does not 7 rest on physical attachment at all. Such lovers may be a thousand 8 miles away from one another, but their love will be all the same; it 9 does not die, and will never produce any painful reaction.

10 To attain this unattachment is almost a life-work, but as soon 11 as we have reached this point, we have attained the goal of love 12 and become free; the bondage of nature falls from us, and we see 13 nature as she is; she forges no more chains for us; we stand entirely 14 free and take not the results of work into consideration; who then 15 cares for what the results may be?

16 Do you ask anything from your children in return for what you 17 have given them? It is your duty to work for them, and there the 18 matter ends. In whatever you do for a particular person, a city, or a 19 state, assume the same attitude towards it as you have towards 20 your children--expect nothing in return. If you can invariably take 21 the position of a giver, in which everything given by you is a free 22 offering to the world, without any thought of return, then will your 23 work bring you no attachment. Attachment comes only where we 24 expect a return.

25 If working like slaves results in selfishness and attachment, 26 working as master of our own mind gives rise to the bliss of non-27 attachment. We often talk of right and justice, but we find that in 28 the world right and justice are mere baby's talk. There are two 29 things which guide the conduct of men: might and mercy. The 30 exercise of might is invariably the exercise of selfishness. All men 31 and women try to make the most of whatever power or advantage 32 they have. Mercy is heaven itself; to be good, we have all to be 33 merciful. Even justice and right should stand on mercy. All thought 34 of obtaining return for the work we do hinders our spiritual 35 progress; nay, in the end it brings misery. There is another way in 36 which this idea of mercy and selfless charity can be put into 37 practice; that is, by looking upon work as "worship" in case we 38 believe in a Personal God. Here we give up all the fruits of our work 39 unto the Lord, and worshipping Him thus, we have no right to 40 expect anything from mankind for the work we do. The Lord 41 Himself works incessantly and is ever without attachment. Just as 42 water cannot wet the lotus leaf, so work cannot bind the unselfish 43 man by giving rise to attachment to results. The selfless and 44 unattached man may live in the very heart of a crowded and sinful 45 city; he will not be touched by sin.

46 This idea of complete self-sacrifice is illustrated in the 47 following story: After the battle of Kurukshetra the five Pandava 48 brothers performed a great sacrifice and made very large gifts to 49 the poor. All people expressed amazement at the greatness and 50 richness of the sacrifice, and said that such a sacrifice the world 51 had never seen before. But, after the ceremony, there came a little 52 mongoose, half of whose body was golden, and the other half

1 brown; and he began to roll on the floor of the sacrificial hall. He 2 said to those around, "You are all liars; this is no sacrifice." "What!" 3 they exclaimed, "you say this is no sacrifice; do you not know how 4 money and jewels were poured out to the poor and every one 5 became rich and happy? This was the most wonderful sacrifice any 6 man every performed." But the mongoose said, "There was once a 7 little village, and in it there dwelt a poor Brahmin with his wife, his 8 son, and his son's wife. They were very poor and lived on small gifts 9 made to them for preaching and teaching. There came in that land 10 a three years' famine, and the poor Brahmin suffered more than 11 ever. At last when the family had starved for days, the father 12 brought home one morning a little barley flour, which he had been 13 fortunate enough to obtain, and he divided it into four parts, one for 14 each member of the family. They prepared it for their meal, and just 15 as they were about to eat, there was a knock at the door. The father 16 opened it, and there stood a guest. Now in India a guest is a sacred 17 person; he is as a god for the time being, and must be treated as 18 such. So the poor Brahmin said, "Come in, sir; you are welcome."
19 He set before the guest his own portion of the food, which the guest 20 quickly ate and said, "Oh, sir, you have killed me; I have been 21 starving for ten days, and this little bit has but increased my 22 hunger." Then the wife said to her husband, "Give him my share," 23 but the husband said, "Not so." The wife however insisted, saying, 24 "Here is a poor man, and it is our duty as householders to see that 25 he is fed, and it is my duty as a wife to give him my portion, seeing 26 that you have no more to offer him." Then she gave her share to the 27 guest, which he ate, and said he was still burning with hunger. So 28 the son said, "Take my portion also; it is the duty of a son to help his 29 father to fulfil his obligation." The guest ate that, but remained still 30 unsatisfied; so the son's wife gave him her portion also. That was 31 sufficient, and the guest departed, blessing them. That night those 32 four people died of starvation. A few granules of that flour had 33 fallen on the floor; and when I rolled my body on them, half of it 34 became golden, as you see. Since then I have been travelling all 35 over the world, hoping to find another sacrifice like that, but 36 nowhere have I found one; nowhere else has the other half of my 37 body been turned into gold. That is why I say this is no sacrifice."

38 This idea of charity is going out of India; great men are 39 becoming fewer and fewer. When I was first learning English, I read 40 an English story book in which there was a story about a dutiful boy 41 who had gone out to work and had given some of his money to his 42 old mother, and this was praised in three or four pages. What was 43 that? No Hindu boy can ever understand the moral of that story.
44 Now I understand it when I hear the Western idea--every man for 45 himself. And some men take everything for themselves, and fathers 46 and mothers and wives and children go to the wall. That should 47 never and nowhere be the ideal of the householder.

48 Now you see what Karma-Yoga means; even at the point of 49 death to help any one, without asking questions. Be cheated 50 millions of times and never ask a question, and never think of what 51 you are doing. Never vaunt of your gifts to the poor or expect their 52 gratitude, but rather be grateful to them for giving you the occasion

1 of practising charity to them. Thus it is plain that to be an ideal 2 householder is a much more difficult task than to be an ideal
3 Sannyasin; the true life of work is indeed as hard as, if not harder 4 than, the equally true life of renunciation.

WHAT IS DUTY?

It is necessary in the study of Karma-Yoga to know what duty is. If I have to do something I must first know that it is my duty, and then I can do it. The idea of duty again is different in different nations. The Mohammedan says what is written in his book, the Koran, is his duty; the Hindu says what is in the Vedas is his duty; and the Christian says what is in the Bible is his duty. We find that there are varied ideas of duty, differing according to different states in life, different historical periods and different nations. The term "duty", like every other universal abstract term, is impossible clearly to define; we can only get an idea of it by knowing its practical operations and results. When certain things occur before us, we have all a natural or trained impulse to act in a certain manner towards them; when this impulse comes, the mind begins to think about the situation. Sometimes it thinks that it is good to act in a particular manner under the given conditions; at other times it thinks that it is wrong to act in the same manner even in the very same circumstances. The ordinary idea of duty everywhere is that every good man follows the dictates of his conscience. But what is it that makes an act a duty? If a Christian finds a piece of beef before him and does not eat it to save his own life, or will not give it to save the life of another man, he is sure to feel that he has not done his duty. But if a Hindu dares to eat that piece of beef or to give it to another Hindu, he is equally sure to feel that he too has not done his duty; the Hindu's training and education make him feel that way. In the last century there were notorious bands of robbers in India called thugs; they thought it their duty to kill any man they could and take away his money; the larger the number of men they killed, the better they thought they were. Ordinarily if a man goes out into the street and shoots down another man, he is apt to feel sorry for it, thinking that he has done wrong. But if the very same man, as a soldier in his regiment, kills not one but twenty, he is certain to feel glad and think that he has done his duty remarkable well. Therefore we see that it is not the thing done that defines a duty. To give an objective definition of duty is thus entirely impossible. Yet there is duty from the subjective side. Any action that makes us go Godward is a good action, and is our duty; any action that makes us go downward is evil, and is not our duty. From the subjective standpoint we may see that certain acts have a tendency to exalt and ennoble us, while certain other acts have a tendency to degrade and to brutalise us. But it is not possible to make out with certainty which acts have which kind of tendency in relation to all persons, of all sorts and conditions. There is, however, only one idea of duty which has been universally accepted by all mankind, of all ages and sects and countries, and that has been summed up in a Sanskrit aphorism thus: "Do not injure any being; not injuring any being is virtue, injuring any being is sin."

The Bhagavad Gita frequently alludes to duties dependent upon birth and position in life. Birth and position in life and in

1 society largely determine the mental and moral attitude of 2 individuals towards the various activities of life. It is therefore our 3 duty to do that work which will exalt and ennoble us in accordance 4 with the ideals and activities of the society in which we are born.
5 But it must be particularly remembered that the same ideals and 6 activities do not prevail in all societies and countries; our ignorance 7 of this is the main cause of much of the hatred of one nation
8 towards another. An American thinks that whatever an American 9 does in accordance with the custom of his country is the best thing 10 to do, and that whoever does not follow his custom must be a very 11 wicked man. A Hindu thinks that his customs are the only right 12 ones and are the best in the world, and that whosoever does not 13 obey them must be the most wicked man living. This is quite a 14 natural mistake which all of us are apt to make. But it is very 15 harmful; it is the cause of half the uncharitableness found in the 16 world. When I came to this country and was going through the 17 Chicago Fair, a man from behind pulled at my turban. I looked back 18 and saw that he was a very gentlemanly-looking man, neatly 19 dressed. I spoke to him; and when he found that I knew English, he 20 became very much abashed. On another occasion in the same Fair 21 another man gave me a push. When I asked him the reason, he also 22 was ashamed and stammered out an apology saying, "Why do you 23 dress that way?" The sympathies of these men were limited within 24 the range of their own language and their own fashion of dress.
25 Much of the oppression of powerful nations on weaker ones is 26 caused by this prejudice. It dries up their fellow-feeling for fellow 27 men. That very man who asked me why I did not dress as he did 28 and wanted to ill-treat me because of my dress may have been a 29 very good man, a good father, and a good citizen; but the kindness 30 of his nature died out as soon as he saw a man in a different dress.
31 Strangers are exploited in all countries, because they do not know 32 how to defend themselves; thus they carry home false impressions 33 of the peoples they have seen. Sailors, soldiers, and traders behave 34 in foreign lands in very queer ways, although they would not dream 35 of doing so in their own country; perhaps this is why the Chinese 36 call Europeans and Americans "foreign devils". They could not have 37 done this if they had met the good, the kindly sides of Western life.

38 Therefore the one point we ought to remember is that we 39 should always try to see the duty of others through their own eyes, 40 and never judge the customs of other peoples by our own standard.
41 I am not the standard of the universe. I have to accommodate 42 myself to the world, and not the world to me. So we see that 43 environments change the nature of our duties, and doing the duty 44 which is ours at any particular time is the best thing we can do in 45 this world. Let us do that duty which is ours by birth; and when we 46 have done that, let us do the duty which is ours by our position in 47 life and in society. There is, however, one great danger in human 48 nature, viz. that man never examines himself. He thinks he is quite 49 as fit to be on the throne as the king. Even if he is, he must first 50 show that he has done the duty of his own position; and then higher 51 duties will come to him. When we begin to work earnestly in the 52 world, nature gives us blows right and left and soon enables us to 53 find out our position. No man can long occupy satisfactorily a

1 position for which he is not fit. There is no use in grumbling against 2 nature's adjustment. He who does the lower work is not therefore a 3 lower man. No man is to be judged by the mere nature of his duties, 4 but all should be judged by the manner and the spirit in which they 5 perform them.

6 Later on we shall find that even this idea of duty undergoes 7 change, and that the greatest work is done only when there is no
8 selfish motive to prompt it. Yet it is work through the sense of duty 9 that leads us to work without any idea of duty; when work will 10 become worship--nay, something higher--then will work be done for 11 its own sake. We shall find that the philosophy of duty, whether it be 12 in the form of ethics or of love, is the same as in every other Yoga-- 13 the object being the attenuating of the lower self, so that the real 14 higher Self may shine forth--the lessening of the frittering away of 15 energies on the lower plane of existence, so that the soul may 16 manifest itself on the higher ones. This is accomplished by the 17 continuous denial of low desires, which duty rigorously requires.
18 The whole organisation of society has thus been developed, 19 consciously or unconsciously, in the realms of action and 20 experience, where, by limiting selfishness, we open the way to an 21 unlimited expansion of the real nature of man.

22 Duty is seldom sweet. It is only when love greases its wheels
23 that it runs smoothly; it is a continuous friction otherwise. How else 24 could parents do their duties to their children, husbands to their 25 wives, and vice versa? Do we not meet with cases of friction every 26 day in our lives? Duty is sweet only through love, and love shines in 27 freedom alone. Yet is it freedom to be a slave to the senses, to 28 anger, to jealousies and a hundred other petty things that must 29 occur every day in human life? In all these little roughnesses that 30 we meet with in life, the highest expression of freedom is to 31 forbear. Women, slaves to their own irritable, jealous tempers, are 32 apt to blame their husbands, and assert their own "freedom", as 33 they think, not knowing that thereby they only prove that they are 34 slaves. So it is with husbands who eternally find fault with their 35 wives.

36 Chastity is the first virtue in man or woman, and the man 37 who, however he may have strayed away, cannot be brought to the 38 right path by a gentle and loving and chaste wife is indeed very 39 rare. The world is not yet as bad as that. We hear much about 40 brutal husbands all over the world and about the impurity of men, 41 but is it not true that there are quite as many brutal and impure 42 women as men? If all women were as good and pure as their own 43 constant assertions would lead one to believe, I am perfectly 44 satisfied that there would not be one impure man in the world.
45 What brutality is there which purity and chastity cannot conquer? A 46 good, chaste wife, who thinks of every other man except her own 47 husband as her child and has the attitude of a mother towards all 48 men, will grow so great in the power of her purity that there cannot 49 be a single man, however brutal, who will not breathe an 50 atmosphere of holiness in her presence. Similarly, every husband 51 must look upon all women, except his own wife, in the light of his 52 own mother or daughter or sister. That man, again, who wants to be

1 a teacher of religion must look upon every woman as his mother, 2 and always behave towards her as such.

3 The position of the mother is the highest in the world, as it is 4 the one place in which to learn and exercise the greatest 5 unselfishness. The love of God is the only love that is higher than a 6 mother's love; all others are lower. It is the duty of the mother to 7 think of her children first and then of herself. But, instead of that, if 8 the parents are always thinking of themselves first, the result is 9 that the relation between parents and children becomes the same 10 as that between birds and their offspring which, as soon as they are 11 fledged, do not recognise any parents. Blessed, indeed, is the man 12 who is able to look upon woman as the representative of the 13 motherhood of God. Blessed, indeed, is the woman to whom man 14 represents the fatherhood of God. Blessed are the children who 15 look upon their parents as Divinity manifested on earth.

16 The only way to rise is by doing the duty next to us, and thus 17 gathering strength go on until we reach the highest state. A young 18 Sannyasin went to a forest; there he meditated, worshipped, and 19 practised Yoga for a long time. After years of hard work and 20 practice, he was one day sitting under a tree, when some dry leaves 21 fell upon his head. He looked up and saw a crow and a crane 22 fighting on the top of the tree, which made him very angry. He said, 23 "What! Dare you throw these dry leaves upon my head!" As with 24 these words he angrily glanced at them, a flash of fire went out of 25 his head--such was the Yogi's power--and burnt the birds to ashes.
26 He was very glad, almost overjoyed at this development of power-- 27 he could burn the crow and the crane by a look. After a time he had 28 to go to the town to beg his bread. He went, stood at a door, and 29 said, "Mother, give me food." A voice came from inside the house, 30 "Wait a little, my son." The young man thought, "You wretched 31 woman, how dare you make me wait! You do not know my power 32 yet." While he was thinking thus the voice came again: "Boy, don't 33 be thinking too much of yourself. Here is neither crow nor crane."
34 He was astonished; still he had to wait. At last the woman came, 35 and he fell at her feet and said, "Mother, how did you know that?"
36 She said, "My boy, I do not know your Yoga or your practices. I am a 37 common everyday woman. I made you wait because my husband is 38 ill, and I was nursing him. All my life I have struggled to do my duty.
39 When I was unmarried, I did my duty to my parents; now that I am 40 married, I do my duty to my husband; that is all the Yoga I practise.
41 But by doing my duty I have become illumined; thus I could read 42 your thoughts and know what you had done in the forest. If you 43 want to know something higher than this, go to the market of such 44 and such a town where you will find a Vyadha who will tell you 45 something that you will be very glad to learn." The Sannyasin 46 thought, "Why should I go to that town and to a Vyadha?" But after 47 what he had seen, his mind opened a little, so he went. When he 48 came near the town, he found the market and there saw, at a 49 distance, a big fat Vyadha cutting meat with big knives, talking and 50 bargaining with different people. The young man said, "Lord help 51 me! Is this the man from whom I am going to learn? He is the 52 incarnation of a demon, if he is anything." In the meantime this man

1 looked up and said, "O Swami, did that lady send you here? Take a 2 seat until I have done my business." The Sannyasin thought, "What 3 comes to me here?" He took his seat; the man went on with his 4 work, and after he had finished he took his money and said to the 5 Sannyasin, "Come sir, come to my home." On reaching home the 6 Vyadha gave him a seat, saying, "Wait here," and went into the 7 house. He then washed his old father and mother, fed them, and did 8 all he could to please them, after which he came to the Sannyasin 9 and said, "Now, sir, you have come here to see me; what can I do for 10 you?" The Sannyasin asked him a few questions about soul and 11 about God, and the Vyadha gave him a lecture which forms a part of 12 the Mahabharata, called the Vyadha Gita . It contains one of the 13 highest flights of the Vedanta. When the Vyadha finished his 14 teaching, the Sannyasin felt astonished. He said, "Why are you in 15 that body? With such knowledge as yours why are you in a Vyadha's 16 body, and doing such filthy, ugly work?" "My son," replied the 17 Vyadha, "no duty is ugly, no duty is impure. My birth placed me in 18 these circumstances and environments. In my boyhood I learnt the 19 trade; I am unattached, and I try to do my duty well. I try to do my 20 duty as a householder, and I try to do all I can to make my father 21 and mother happy. I neither know your Yoga, nor have I become a 22 Sannyasin, nor did I go out of the world into a forest; nevertheless, 23 all that you have heard and seen has come to me through the 24 unattached doing of the duty which belongs to my position."

25 There is a sage in India, a great Yogi, one of the most 26 wonderful men I have ever seen in my life. He is a peculiar man, he 27 will not teach any one; if you ask him a question he will not answer.
28 It is too much for him to take up the position of a teacher, he will 29 not do it. If you ask a question, and wait for some days, in the 30 course of conversation he will bring up the subject, and wonderful 31 light will he throw on it. He told me once the secret of work, "Let 32 the end and the means be joined into one." When you are doing any 33 work, do not think of anything beyond. Do it as worship, as the 34 highest worship, and devote your whole life to it for the time being.
35 Thus, in the story, the Vyadha and the woman did their duty with 36 cheerfulness and whole-heartedness; and the result was that they 37 become illuminated, clearly showing that the right performance of 38 the duties of any station in life, without attachment to results, leads 39 us to the highest realisation of the perfection of the soul.

40 It is the worker who is attached to results that grumbles 41 about the nature of the duty which has fallen to his lot; to the 42 unattached worker all duties are equally good, and form efficient 43 instruments with which selfishness and sensuality may be killed, 44 and the freedom of the soul secured. We are all apt to think too 45 highly of ourselves. Our duties are determined by our deserts to a 46 much larger extent than we are willing to grant. Competition rouses 47 envy, and it kills the kindliness of the heart. To the grumbler all 48 duties are distasteful; nothing will ever satisfy him, and his whole 49 life is doomed to prove a failure. Let us work on, doing as we go 50 whatever happens to be our duty, and being ever ready to put our 51 shoulders to the wheel. Then surely shall we see the Light!

WE HELP OURSELVES, NOT THE WORLD

Before considering further how devotion to duty helps us in our spiritual progress, let me place before you in a brief compass another aspect of what we in India mean by Karma. In every religion there are three parts: philosophy, mythology, and ritual. Philosophy of course is the essence of every religion; mythology explains and illustrates it by means of the more or less legendary lives of great men, stories and fables of wonderful things, and so on; ritual gives to that philosophy a still more concrete form, so that every one may grasp it--ritual is in fact concretised philosophy. This ritual is Karma; it is necessary in every religion, because most of us cannot understand abstract spiritual things until we grow much spiritually. It is easy for men to think that they can understand anything; but when it comes to practical experience, they find that abstract ideas are often very hard to comprehend. Therefore symbols are of great help, and we cannot dispense with the symbolical method of putting things before us. From time immemorial symbols have been used by all kinds of religions. In one sense we cannot think but in symbols; words themselves are symbols of thought. In another sense everything in the universe may be looked upon as a symbol. The whole universe is a symbol, and God is the essence behind. This kind of symbology is not simply the creation of man; it is not that certain people belonging to a religion sit down together and think out certain symbols, and bring them into existence out of their own minds. The symbols of religion have a natural growth. Otherwise, why is it that certain symbols are associated with certain ideas in the mind of almost every one? Certain symbols are universally prevalent. Many of you may think that the cross first came into existence as a symbol in connection with the Christian religion, but as a matter of fact it existed before Christianity was, before Moses was born, before the Vedas were given out, before there was any human record of human things. The cross may be found to have been in existence among the Aztecs and the Phoenicians; every race seems to have had the cross. Again, the symbol of the crucified Savior, of a man crucified upon a cross, appears to have been known to almost every nation. The circle has been a great symbol throughout the world. Then there is the most universal of all symbols, the Swastika {pictured}. At one time it was thought that the Buddhists carried it all over the world with them, but it has been found out that ages before Buddhism it was used among nations. In Old Babylon and in Egypt it was to be found. What does this show? All these symbols could not have been purely conventional. There must be some reason for them; some natural association between them and the human mind. Language is not the result of convention; it is not that people ever agreed to represent certain ideas by certain words; there never was an idea without a corresponding word or a word without a corresponding idea; ideas and words are in their nature inseparable. The symbols to represent ideas may be sound symbols or colour symbols. Deaf and dumb people have to think with other than sound symbols. Every

1 thought in the mind has a form as its counterpart. This is called in 2 Sanskrit philosophy Nama-Rupa--name and form. It is as impossible 3 to create by convention a system of symbols as it is to create a 4 language. In the world's ritualistic symbols we have an expression
5 of the religious thought of humanity. It is easy to say that there is no 6 use of rituals and temples and all such paraphernalia; every baby 7 says that in modern times. But it must be easy for all to see that 8 those who worship inside a temple are in many respects different 9 from those who will not worship there. Therefore the association of 10 particular temples, rituals, and other concrete forms with particular 11 religions has a tendency to bring into the minds of the followers of 12 those religions the thoughts for which those concrete things stand 13 as symbols; and it is not wise to ignore rituals and symbology 14 altogether. The study and practice of these things form naturally a 15 part of Karma-Yoga.

16 There are many other aspects of this science of work. One 17 among them is to know the relation between thought and word and 18 what can be achieved by the power of the word. In every religion 19 the power of the word is recognised, so much so that in some of 20 them creation itself is said to have come out of the word. The 21 external aspect of the thought of God is the Word, and as God 22 thought and willed before He created, creation came out of the 23 Word. In this stress and hurry of our materialistic life, our nerves 24 lose sensibility and become hardened. The older we grow, the 25 longer we are knocked about in the world, the more callous we 26 become; and we are apt to neglect things that even happen 27 persistently and prominently around us. Human nature, however, 28 asserts itself sometimes, and we are led to inquire into and wonder 29 at some of these common occurrences; wondering thus is the first 30 step in the acquisition of light. Apart from the higher philosophic 31 and religious value of the Word, we may see that sound symbols 32 play a prominent part in the drama of human life. I am talking to 33 you. I am not touching you; the pulsations of the air caused by my 34 speaking go into your ear, they touch your nerves and produce 35 effects in your minds. You cannot resist this. What can be more 36 wonderful than this? One man calls another a fool, and at this the 37 other stands up and clenches his fist and lands a blow on his nose.
38 Look at the power of the word! There is a woman weeping and 39 miserable; another woman comes along and speaks to her a few 40 gentle words, the doubled up frame of the weeping woman 41 becomes straightened at once, her sorrow is gone and she already 42 begins to smile. Think of the power of words! They are a great force 43 in higher philosophy as well as in common life. Day and night we 44 manipulate this force without thought and without inquiry. To know 45 the nature of this force and to use it well is also a part of Karma-46 Yoga.

47 Our duty to others means helping others; doing good to the 48 world. Why should we do good to the world? Apparently to help the 49 world, but really to help ourselves. We should always try to help the 50 world, that should be the highest motive in us; but if we consider 51 well, we find that the world does not require our help at all. This 52 world was not made that you or I should come and help it. I once

1 read a sermon in which it was said, "All this beautiful world is very 2 good, because it gives us time and opportunity to help others."
3 Apparently, this is a very beautiful sentiment, but is it not a 4 blasphemy to say that the world needs our help? We cannot deny 5 that there is much misery in it; to go out and help others is, 6 therefore, the best thing we can do, although in the long run, we 7 shall find that helping others is only helping ourselves. As a boy I 8 had some white mice. They were kept in a little box in which there 9 were little wheels, and when the mice tried to cross the wheels, the 10 wheels turned and turned, and the mice never got anywhere. So it 11 is with the world and our helping it. The only help is that we get 12 moral exercise. This world is neither good nor evil; each man 13 manufactures a world for himself. If a blind man begins to think of 14 the world, it is either as soft or hard, or as cold or hot. We are a 15 mass of happiness or misery; we have seen that hundreds of times 16 in our lives. As a rule, the young are optimistic and the old 17 pessimistic. The young have life before them; the old complain their 18 day is gone; hundreds of desires, which they cannot fulfil struggle 19 in their hearts. Both are foolish nevertheless. Life is good or evil 20 according to the state of mind in which we look at it, it is neither by 21 itself. Fire, by itself, is neither good nor evil. When it keeps us warm 22 we say, "How beautiful is fire!" When it burns our fingers, we blame 23 it. Still, in itself it is neither good nor bad. According as we use it, it 24 produces in us the feeling of good or bad; so also is this world. It is 25 perfect. By perfection is meant that it is perfectly fitted to meet its 26 ends. We may all be perfectly sure that it will go on beautifully well 27 without us, and we need not bother our heads wishing to help it.

28 Yet we must do good; the desire to do good is the highest 29 motive power we have, if we know all the time that it is a privilege 30 to help others. Do not stand on a high pedestal and take five cents 31 in your hand and say, "Here, my poor man," but be grateful that the 32 poor man is there, so that by making a gift to him you are able to 33 help yourself. It is not the receiver that is blessed, but it is the giver.
34 Be thankful that you are allowed to exercise your power of 35 benevolence and mercy in the world, and thus become pure and 36 perfect. All good acts tend to make us pure and perfect. What can 37 we do at best? Build a hospital, make roads, or erect charity 38 asylums. We may organise a charity and collect two or three 39 millions of dollars, build a hospital with one million, with the second 40 give balls and drink champagne, and of the third let the officers 41 steal half, and leave the rest finally to reach the poor; but what are 42 all these? One mighty wind in five minutes can break all your 43 buildings up. What shall we do then? One volcanic eruption may 44 sweep away all our roads and hospitals and cities and buildings. Let 45 us give up all this foolish talk of doing good to the world. It is not 46 waiting for your or my help; yet we must work and constantly do 47 good, because it is a blessing to ourselves. That is the only way we 48 can become perfect. No beggar whom we have helped has ever 49 owed a single cent to us; we owe everything to him, because he has 50 allowed us to exercise our charity on him. It is entirely wrong to 51 think that we have done, or can do, good to the world, or to think 52 that we have helped such and such people. It is a foolish thought, 53 and all foolish thoughts bring misery. We think that we have helped 1 some man and expect him to thank us, and because he does not,

2 unhappiness comes to us. Why should we expect anything in return 3 for what we do? Be grateful to the man you help, think of him as 4 God. Is it not a great privilege to be allowed to worship God by 5 helping our fellow men? If we were really unattached, we should 6 escape all this pain of vain expectation, and could cheerfully do 7 good work in the world. Never will unhappiness or misery come 8 through work done without attachment. The world will go on with 9 its happiness and misery through eternity.

10 There was a poor man who wanted some money; and 11 somehow he had heard that if he could get hold of a ghost, he might 12 command him to bring money or anything else he liked; so he was 13 very anxious to get hold of a ghost. He went about searching for a 14 man who would give him a ghost, and at last he found a sage with 15 great powers, and besought his help. The sage asked him what he 16 would do with a ghost. "I want a ghost to work for me; teach me 17 how to get hold of one, sir; I desire it very much," replied the man.
18 But the sage said, "Don't disturb yourself, go home." The next day 19 the man went again to the sage and began to weep and pray, "Give 20 me a ghost; I must have a ghost, sir, to help me." At last the sage 21 was disgusted, and said, "Take this charm, repeat this magic word, 22 and a ghost will come, and whatever you say to him he will do. But 23 beware; they are terrible beings, and must be kept continually busy.
24 If you fail to give him work, he will take your life." The man replied, 25 "That is easy; I can give him work for all his life." Then he went to a 26 forest, and after long repetition of the magic word, a huge ghost 27 appeared before him, and said, "I am a ghost. I have been 28 conquered by your magic; but you must keep me constantly 29 employed. The moment you fail to give me work I will kill you." The 30 man said, "Build me a palace," and the ghost said, "It is done; the 31 palace is built." "Bring me money," said the man. "Here is your 32 money," said the ghost. "Cut this forest down, and build a city in its 33 place." "That is done," said the ghost, "anything more?" Now the 34 man began to be frightened and thought he could give him nothing 35 more to do; he did everything in a trice. The ghost said, "Give me 36 something to do or I will eat you up." The poor man could find no 37 further occupation for him, and was frightened. So he ran and ran 38 and at last reached the sage, and said, "Oh, sir, protect my life!"
39 The sage asked him what the matter was, and the man replied, "I 40 have nothing to give the ghost to do. Everything I tell him to do he 41 does in a moment, and he threatens to eat me up if I do not give 42 him work." Just then the ghost arrived, saying, "I'll eat you up," and 43 he would have swallowed the man. The man began to shake, and 44 begged the sage to save his life. The sage said, "I will find you a 45 way out. Look at that dog with a curly tail. Draw your sword quickly 46 and cut the tail off and give it to the ghost to straighten out." The 47 man cut off the dog's tail and gave it to the ghost, saying, 48 "Straighten that out for me." The ghost took it and slowly and 49 carefully straightened it out, but as soon as he let it go, it instantly 50 curled up again. Once more he laboriously straightened it out, only 51 to find it again curled up as soon as he attempted to let go of it.
52 Again he patiently straightened it out, but as soon as he let it go, it 53 curled up again. So he went on for days and days, until he was

1 exhausted and said, "I was never in such trouble before in my life. I 2 am an old veteran ghost, but never before was I in such trouble." "I 3 will make a compromise with you;" he said to the man, "you let me 4 off and I will let you keep all I have given you and will promise not 5 to harm you." The man was much pleased, and accepted the offer 6 gladly.

7 This world is like a dog's curly tail, and people have been 8 striving to straighten it out for hundreds of years; but when they let 9 it go, it has curled up again. How could it be otherwise? One must 10 first know how to work without attachment, then one will not be a 11 fanatic. When we know that this world is like a dog's curly tail and 12 will never get straightened, we shall not become fanatics. If there 13 were no fanaticism in the world, it would make much more progress 14 than it does now. It is a mistake to think that fanaticism can make 15 for the progress of mankind. On the contrary, it is a retarding 16 element creating hatred and anger, and causing people to fight 17 each other, and making them unsympathetic. We think that 18 whatever we do or possess is the best in the world, and what we do 19 not do or possess is of no value. So, always remember the instance 20 of the curly tail of the dog whenever you have a tendency to 21 become a fanatic. You need not worry or make yourself sleepless 22 about the world; it will go on without you. When you have avoided 23 fanaticism, then alone will you work well. It is the level-headed 24 man, the calm man, of good judgment and cool nerves, of great 25 sympathy and love, who does good work and so does good to 26 himself. The fanatic is foolish and has no sympathy; he can never 27 straighten the world, nor himself become pure and perfect.

28 To recapitulate the chief points in today's lecture: First, we 29 have to bear in mind that we are all debtors to the world and the 30 world does not owe us anything. It is a great privilege for all of us 31 to be allowed to do anything for the world. In helping the world we 32 really help ourselves. The second point is that there is a God in this 33 universe. It is not true that this universe is drifting and stands in 34 need of help from you and me. God is ever present therein, He is 35 undying and eternally active and infinitely watchful. When the 36 whole universe sleeps, He sleeps not; He is working incessantly; all 37 the changes and manifestations of the world are His. Thirdly, we 38 ought not to hate anyone. This world will always continue to be a 39 mixture of good and evil. Our duty is to sympathise with the weak 40 and to love even the wrongdoer. The world is a grand moral 41 gymnasium wherein we have all to take exercise so as to become 42 stronger and stronger spiritually. Fourthly, we ought not to be 43 fanatics of any kind, because fanaticism is opposed to love. You 44 hear fanatics glibly saying, "I do not hate the sinner. I hate the sin," 45 but I am prepared to go any distance to see the face of that man 46 who can really make a distinction between the sin and the sinner. It 47 is easy to say so. If we can distinguish well between quality and 48 substance, we may become perfect men. It is not easy to do this.
49 And further, the calmer we are and the less disturbed our nerves, 50 the more shall we love and the better will our work be.

NON-ATTACHMENT IS COMPLETE SELF-ABNEGATION

Just as every action that emanates from us comes back to us as reaction, even so our actions may act on other people and theirs on us. Perhaps all of you have observed it as a fact that when persons do evil actions, they become more and more evil, and when they begin to do good, they become stronger and stronger and learn to do good at all times. This intensification of the influence of action cannot be explained on any other ground than that we can act and react upon each other. To take an illustration from physical science, when I am doing a certain action, my mind may be said to be in a certain state of vibration; all minds which are in similar circumstances will have the tendency to be affected by my mind. If there are different musical instruments tuned alike in one room, all of you may have noticed that when one is struck, the others have the tendency to vibrate so as to give the same note. So all minds that have the same tension, so to say, will be equally affected by the same thought. Of course, this influence of thought on mind will vary according to distance and other causes, but the mind is always open to affection. Suppose I am doing an evil act, my mind is in a certain state of vibration, and all minds in the universe, which are in a similar state, have the possibility of being affected by the vibration of my mind. So, when I am doing a good action, my mind is in another state of vibration; and all minds similarly strung have the possibility of being affected by my mind; and this power of mind upon mind is more or less according as the force of the tension is greater or less.

Following this simile further, it is quite possible that, just as light waves may travel for millions of years before they reach any object, so thought waves may also travel hundreds of years before they meet an object with which they vibrate in unison. It is quite possible, therefore, that this atmosphere of ours is full of such thought pulsations, both good and evil. Every thought projected from every brain goes on pulsating, as it were, until it meets a fit object that will receive it. Any mind which is open to receive some of these impulses will take them immediately. So, when a man is doing evil actions, he has brought his mind to a certain state of tension and all the waves which correspond to that state of tension, and which may be said to be already in the atmosphere, will struggle to enter into his mind. That is why an evil-doer generally goes on doing more and more evil. His actions become intensified. Such, also will be the case with the doer of good; he will open himself to all the good waves that are in the atmosphere, and his good actions also will become intensified. We run, therefore, a twofold danger in doing evil: first, we open ourselves to all the evil influences surrounding us; secondly, we create evil which affects others, may be hundreds of years hence. In doing evil we injure ourselves and others also. In doing good we do good to ourselves and to others as well; and, like all other forces in man, these forces

1 of good and evil also gather strength from outside.

2 According to Karma-Yoga, the action one has done cannot be 3 destroyed until it has borne its fruit; no power in nature can stop it 4 from yielding its results. If I do an evil action, I must suffer for it;
5 there is no power in this universe to stop or stay it. Similarly, if I do 6 a good action, there is no power in the universe which can stop its 7 bearing good results. The cause must have its effect; nothing can 8 prevent or restrain this. Now comes a very fine and serious 9 question about Karma-Yoga--namely, that these actions of ours, both 10 good and evil, are intimately connected with each other. We cannot 11 put a line of demarcation and say, this action is entirely good and 12 this entirely evil. There is no action which does not bear good and 13 evil fruits at the same time. To take the nearest example: I am 14 talking to you, and some of you, perhaps, think I am doing good; 15 and at the same time I am, perhaps, killing thousands of microbes 16 in the atmosphere; I am thus doing evil to something else. When it 17 is very near to us and affects those we know, we say that it is very 18 good action if it affects them in a good manner. For instance, you 19 may call my speaking to you very good, but the microbes will not; 20 the microbes you do not see, but yourselves you do see. The way in 21 which my talk affects you is obvious to you, but how it affects the 22 microbes is not so obvious. And so, if we analyse our evil actions 23 also, we may find that some good possibly results from them
24 somewhere. He who in good action sees that there is something evil 25 in it, and in the midst of evil sees that there is something good in it 26 somewhere, has known the secret of work.

27 But what follows from it? That, howsoever we may try, there 28 cannot be any action which is perfectly pure, or any which is 29 perfectly impure, taking purity and impurity in the sense of injury 30 and non-injury. We cannot breathe or live without injuring others, 31 and every bit of the food we eat is taken away from another's
32 mouth. Our very lives are crowding out other lives. It may be men, 33 or animals, or small microbes, but some one or other of these we 34 have to crowd out. That being the case, it naturally follows that 35 perfection can never be attained by work. We may work through all 36 eternity, but there will be no way out of this intricate maze. You may 37 work on, and on, and on; there will be no end to this inevitable 38 association of good and evil in the results of work.

39 The second point to consider is, what is the end of work? We 40 find the vast majority of people in every country believing that there 41 will be a time when this world will become perfect, when there will 42 be no disease, nor death, nor unhappiness, nor wickedness. That is 43 a very good idea, a very good motive power to inspire and uplift the 44 ignorant; but if we think for a moment, we shall find on the very 45 face of it that it cannot be so. How can it be, seeing that good and 46 evil are the obverse and reverse of the same coin? How can you 47 have good without evil at the same time? What is meant by 48 perfection? A perfect life is a contradiction in terms. Life itself is a 49 state of continuous struggle between ourselves and everything 50 outside. Every moment we are fighting actually with external 51 nature, and if we are defeated, our life has to go. It is, for instance, 52 a continuous struggle for food and air. If food or air fails, we die.

1 Life is not a simple and smoothly flowing thing, but it is a compound 2 effect. This complex struggle between something inside and the 3 external world is what we call life. So it is clear that when this 4 struggle ceases, there will be an end of life.

5 What is meant by ideal happiness is the cessation of this 6 struggle. But then life will cease, for the struggle can only cease 7 when life itself has ceased. We have seen already that in helping 8 the world we help ourselves. The main effect of work done for 9 others is to purify ourselves. By means of the constant effort to do 10 good to others we are trying to forget ourselves; this forgetfulness 11 of self is the one great lesson we have to learn in life. Man thinks 12 foolishly that he can make himself happy, and after years of 13 struggle finds out at last that true happiness consists in killing 14 selfishness and that no one can make him happy except himself.
15 Every act of charity, every thought of sympathy, every action of 16 help, every good deed, is taking so much of self-importance away 17 from our little selves and making us think of ourselves as the lowest 18 and the least, and, therefore, it is all good. Here we find that Jnana, 19 Bhakti, and Karma--all come to one point. The highest ideal is 20 eternal and entire self-abnegation, where there is no "I", but all is 21 "Thou"; and whether he is conscious or unconscious of it, Karma-22 Yoga leads man to that end. A religious preacher may become 23 horrified at the idea of an Impersonal God; he may insist on a 24 Personal God and wish to keep up his own identity and individuality, 25 whatever he may mean by that. But his ideas of ethics, if they are 26 really good, cannot but be based on the highest self-abnegation. It 27 is the basis of all morality; you may extend it to men, or animals, or 28 angels, it is the one basic idea, the one fundamental principle 29 running through all ethical systems.

30 You will find various classes of men in this world. First, there 31 are the God-men, whose self-abnegation is complete, and who do 32 only good to others even at the sacrifice of their own lives. These 33 are the highest of men. If there are a hundred of such in any 34 country, that country need never despair. But they are unfortunately 35 too few. Then there are the good men who do good to others so long 36 as it does not injure themselves. And there is a third class who, to 37 do good to themselves, injure others. It is said by a Sanskrit poet 38 that there is a fourth unnamable class of people who injure others 39 merely for injury's sake. Just as there are at one pole of existence 40 the highest good men, who do good for the sake of doing good, so, 41 at the other pole, there are others who injure others just for the 42 sake of the injury. They do not gain anything thereby, but it is their 43 nature to do evil.

44 Here are two Sanskrit words. The one is Pravritti, which 45 means revolving towards, and the other is Nivritti, which means 46 revolving away. The "revolving towards" is what we call the world, 47 the "I and mine"; it includes all those things which are always 48 enriching that "me" by wealth and money and power, and name and 49 fame, and which are of a grasping nature, always tending to 50 accumulate everything in one centre, that centre being "myself".
51 That is the Pravritti, the natural tendency of every human being; 52 taking everything from everywhere and heaping it around one

1 centre, that centre being man's own sweet self. When this tendency
2 begins to break, when it is Nivritti or "going away from," then begin 3 morality and religion. Both Pravritti and Nivritti are of the nature of 4 work: the former is evil work, and the latter is good work. This 5 Nivritti is the fundamental basis of all morality and all religion, and 6 the very perfection of it is entire self-abnegation, readiness to 7 sacrifice mind and body and everything for another being. When a 8 man has reached that state, he has attained to the perfection of 9 Karma-Yoga. This is the highest result of good works. Although a 10 man has not studied a single system of philosophy, although he does 11 not believe in any God, and never has believed, although he has not 12 prayed even once in his whole life, if the simple power of good 13 actions has brought him to that state where he is ready to give up 14 his life and all else for others, he has arrived at the same point to 15 which the religious man will come through his prayers and the 16 philosopher through his knowledge; and so you may find that the 17 philosopher, the worker, and the devotee, all meet at one point, that 18 one point being self-abnegation. However much their systems of 19 philosophy and religion may differ, all mankind stand in reverence 20 and awe before the man who is ready to sacrifice himself for others.
21 Here, it is not at all any question of creed, or doctrine- even men 22 who are very much opposed to all religious ideas, when they see 23 one of these acts of complete self-sacrifice, feel that they must 24 revere it. Have you not seen even a most bigoted Christian, when 25 he reads Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia, stand in reverence of 26 Buddha, who preached no God, preached nothing but self-sacrifice?
27 The only thing is that the bigot does not know that his own end and 28 aim in life is exactly the same as that of those from whom he differs.
29 The worshipper, by keeping constantly before him the idea of God 30 and a surrounding of good, comes to the same point at last and 31 says, "Thy will be done," and keeps nothing to himself. That is self-32 abnegation. The philosopher, with his knowledge, sees that the 33 seeming self is a delusion and easily gives it up. It is self-34 abnegation. So Karma, Bhakti, and Jnana all meet here; and this is 35 what was meant by all the great preachers of ancient times, when 36 they taught that God is not the world. There is one thing which is 37 the world and another which is God; and this distinction is very 38 true. What they mean by world is selfishness. Unselfishness is God.
39 One may live on a throne, in a golden palace, and be perfectly 40 unselfish; and then he is in God. Another may live in a hut and wear 41 rags, and have nothing in the world; yet, if he is selfish, he is 42 intensely merged in the world.

43 To come back to one of our main points, we say that we 44 cannot do good without at the same time doing some evil, or do evil 45 without doing some good. Knowing this, how can we work? There 46 have, therefore, been sects in this world who have in an 47 astoundingly preposterous way preached slow suicide as the only 48 means to get out of the world, because if a man lives, he has to kill 49 poor little animals and plants or do injury to something or some 50 one. So according to them the only way out of the world is to die.
51 The Jains have preached this doctrine as their highest ideal. This 52 teaching seems to be very logical. But the true solution is found in 53 the Gita. It is the theory of non-attachment, to be attached to 1 nothing while doing our work of life. Know that you are separated 2 entirely from the world, though you are in the world, and that 3 whatever you may be doing in it, you are not doing that for your 4 own sake. Any action that you do for yourself will bring its effect to 5 bear upon you. If it is a good action, you will have to take the good 6 effect, and if bad, you will have to take the bad effect; but any 7 action that is not done for your own sake, whatever it be, will have 8 no effect on you. There is to be found a very expressive sentence in 9 our scriptures embodying this idea: "Even if he kill the whole 10 universe (or be himself killed), he is neither the killer nor the killed, 11 when he knows that he is not acting for himself at all." Therefore 12 Karma-Yoga teaches, "Do not give up the world; live in the world, 13 imbibe its influences as much as you can; but if it be for your own 14 enjoyment's sake, work not at all." Enjoyment should not be the 15 goal. First kill your self and then take the whole world as yourself; 16 as the old Christians used to say, "The old man must die." This old 17 man is the selfish idea that the whole world is made for our 18 enjoyment. Foolish parents teach their children to pray, "O Lord, 19 Thou hast created this sun for me and this moon for me," as if the 20 Lord has had nothing else to do than to create everything for these 21 babies. Do not teach your children such nonsense. Then again, 22 there are people who are foolish in another way: they teach us that 23 all these animals were created for us to kill and eat, and that this 24 universe is for the enjoyment of men. That is all foolishness. A tiger 25 may say, "Man was created for me," and pray, "O Lord, how wicked 26 are these men who do not come and place themselves before me to 27 be eaten; they are breaking Your law." If the world is created for us, 28 we are also created for the world. That this world is created for our 29 enjoyment is the most wicked idea that holds us down. This world is 30 not for our sake. Millions pass out of it every year; the world does 31 not feel it; millions of others are supplied in their place. Just as 32 much as the world is for us, so we also are for the world.

33 To work properly, therefore, you have first to give up the idea 34 of attachment. Secondly, do not mix in the fray, hold yourself as a 35 witness and go on working. My master used to say, "Look upon your 36 children as a nurse does." The nurse will take your baby and fondle 37 it and play with it and behave towards it as gently as if it were her 38 own child; but as soon as you give her notice to quit, she is ready to 39 start off bag and baggage from the house. Everything in the shape 40 of attachment is forgotten; it will not give the ordinary nurse the 41 least pang to leave your children and take up other children. Even 42 so are you to be with all that you consider your own. You are the 43 nurse, and if you believe in God, believe that all these things which 44 you consider yours are really His. The greatest weakness often 45 insinuates itself as the greatest good and strength. It is a weakness 46 to think that any one is dependent on me, and that I can do good to 47 another. This belief is the mother of all our attachment, and through 48 this attachment comes all our pain. We must inform our minds that 49 no one in this universe depends upon us; not one beggar depends 50 on our charity; not one soul on our kindness; not one living thing on 51 our help. All are helped on by nature, and will be so helped even 52 though millions of us were not here. The course of nature will not 53 stop for such as you and me; it is, as already pointed out, only a

1 blessed privilege to you and to me that we are allowed, in the way 2 of helping others, to educate ourselves. This is a great lesson to 3 learn in life, and when we have learned it fully, we shall never be 4 unhappy; we can go and mix without harm in society anywhere and 5 everywhere. You may have wives and husbands, and regiments of 6 servants, and kingdoms to govern; if only you act on the principle 7 that the world is not for you and does not inevitably need you, they 8 can do you no harm. This very year some of your friends may have 9 died. Is the world waiting without going on, for them to come 10 again? Is its current stopped? No, it goes on. So drive out of your 11 mind the idea that you have to do something for the world; the 12 world does not require any help from you. It is sheer nonsense on 13 the part of any man to think that he is born to help the world; it is 14 simply pride, it is selfishness insinuating itself in the form of virtue.
15 When you have trained your mind and your nerves to realise this 16 idea of the world's non-dependence on you or on anybody, there will 17 then be no reaction in the form of pain resulting from work. When 18 you give something to a man and expect nothing--do not even 19 expect the man to be grateful--his ingratitude will not tell upon you, 20 because you never expected anything, never thought you had any 21 right to anything in the way of a return. You gave him what he 22 deserved; his own Karma got it for him; your Karma made you the 23 carrier thereof. Why should you be proud of having given away 24 something? You are the porter that carried the money or other kind 25 of gift, and the world deserved it by its own Karma. Where is then 26 the reason for pride in you? There is nothing very great in what you 27 give to the world. When you have acquired the feeling of non-28 attachment, there will then be neither good nor evil for you. It is 29 only selfishness that causes the difference between good and evil. It 30 is a very hard thing to understand, but you will come to learn in 31 time that nothing in the universe has power over you until you allow 32 it to exercise such a power. Nothing has power over the Self of 33 man, until the Self becomes a fool and loses independence. So, by 34 non-attachment, you overcome and deny the power of anything to 35 act upon you. It is very easy to say that nothing has the right to act 36 upon you until you allow it to do so; but what is the true sign of the 37 man who really does not allow anything to work upon him, who is 38 neither happy nor unhappy when acted upon by the external world?
39 The sign is that good or ill fortune causes no change in his mind: in 40 all conditions he continues to remain the same.

41 There was a great sage in India called Vyasa. This Vyasa is 42 known as the author of the Vedanta aphorisms, and was a holy man.
43 His father had tried to become a very perfect man and had failed.
44 His grandfather had also tried and failed. His great-grandfather 45 had similarly tried and failed. He himself did not succeed perfectly, 46 but his son, Shuka, was born perfect. Vyasa taught his son wisdom; 47 and after teaching him the knowledge of truth himself, he sent him 48 to the court of King Janaka. He was a great king and was called 49 Janaka Videha. Videha means "without a body". Although a king, he 50 had entirely forgotten that he was a body; he felt that he was a 51 spirit all the time. This boy Shuka was sent to be taught by him. The 52 king knew that Vyasa's son was coming to him to learn wisdom: so 53 he made certain arrangements beforehand. And when the boy

1 presented himself at the gates of the palace, the guards took no
2 notice of him whatsoever. They only gave him a seat, and he sat 3 there for three days and nights, nobody speaking to him, nobody 4 asking him who he was or whence he was. He was the son of a very 5 great sage, his father was honoured by the whole country, and he 6 himself was a most respectable person; yet the low, vulgar guards 7 of the palace would take no notice of him. After that, suddenly, the 8 ministers of the king and all the big officials came there and 9 received him with the greatest honours. They conducted him in and 10 showed him into splendid rooms, gave him the most fragrant baths 11 and wonderful dresses, and for eight days they kept him there in all 12 kinds of luxury. That solemnly serene face of Shuka did not change 13 even to the smallest extent by the change in the treatment 14 accorded to him; he was the same in the midst of this luxury as 15 when waiting at the door. Then he was brought before the king. The 16 king was on his throne, music was playing, and dancing and other 17 amusements were going on. The king then gave him a cup of milk, 18 full to the brim, and asked him to go seven times round the hall 19 without spilling even a drop. The boy took the cup and proceeded in 20 the midst of the music and the attraction of the beautiful faces. As 21 desired by the king, seven times did he go round, and not a drop of 22 the milk was spilt. The boy's mind could not be attracted by 23 anything in the world, unless he allowed it to affect him. And when 24 he brought the cup to the king, the king said to him, "What your 25 father has taught you, and what you have learned yourself, I can 26 only repeat. You have known the Truth; go home."

27 Thus the man that has practised control over himself cannot 28 be acted upon by anything outside; there is no more slavery for him.
29 His mind has become free. Such a man alone is fit to live well in the 30 world. We generally find men holding two opinions regarding the 31 world. Some are pessimists and say, "How horrible this world is, 32 how wicked!" Some others are optimists and say, "How beautiful 33 this world is, how wonderful!" To those who have not controlled 34 their own minds, the world is either full of evil or at best a mixture 35 of good and evil. This very world will become to us an optimistic 36 world when we become masters of our own minds. Nothing will 37 then work upon us as good or evil; we shall find everything to be in 38 its proper place, to be harmonious. Some men, who begin by saying 39 that the world is a hell, often end by saying that it is a heaven when 40 they succeed in the practice of self-control. If we are genuine 41 Karma Yogis and wish to train ourselves to that attainment of this 42 state, wherever we may begin we are sure to end in perfect self-43 abnegation; and as soon as this seeming self has gone, the whole 44 world, which at first appears to us to be filled with evil, will appear 45 to be heaven itself and full of blessedness. Its very atmosphere will 46 be blessed; every human face there will be god. Such is the end and 47 aim of Karma-Yoga, and such is its perfection in practical life.

48 Our various Yogas do not conflict with each other; each of 49 them leads us to the same goal and makes us perfect. Only each has 50 to be strenuously practised. The whole secret is in practising. First 51 you have to hear, then think, and then practise. This is true of every 52 Yoga. You have first to hear about it and understand what it is; and 1 many things which you do not understand will be made clear to you

2 by constant hearing and thinking. It is hard to understand 3 everything at once. The explanation of everything is after all in 4 yourself. No one was ever really taught by another; each of us has 5 to teach himself. The external teacher offers only the suggestion 6 which rouses the internal teacher to work to understand things.
7 Then things will be made clearer to us by our own power of 8 perception and thought, and we shall realise them in our own souls;
9 and that realisation will grow into the intense power of will. First it 10 is feeling, then it becomes willing, and out of that willing comes the 11 tremendous force for work that will go through every vein and 12 nerve and muscle, until the whole mass of your body is changed
13 into an instrument of the unselfish Yoga of work, and the desired 14 result of perfect self-abnegation and utter unselfishness is duly 15 attained. This attainment does not depend on any dogma, or 16 doctrine, or belief. Whether one is Christian, or Jew, or Gentile, it 17 does not matter. Are you unselfish? That is the question. If you are, 18 you will be perfect without reading a single religious book, without 19 going into a single church or temple. Each one of our Yogas is fitted 20 to make man perfect even without the help of the others, because 21 they have all the same goal in view. The Yogas of work, of wisdom, 22 and of devotion are all capable of serving as direct and independent 23 means for the attainment of Moksha. "Fools alone say that work and 24 philosophy are different, not the learned." The learned know that, 25 though apparently different from each other, they at last lead to the 26 same goal of human perfection.

FREEDOM

In addition to meaning work, we have stated that psychologically the word Karma also implies causation. Any work, any action, any thought that produces an effect is called a Karma. Thus the law of Karma means the law of causation, of inevitable cause and sequence. Wheresoever there is a cause, there an effect must be produced; this necessity cannot be resisted, and this law of Karma, according to our philosophy, is true throughout the whole universe. Whatever we see, or feel, or do, whatever action there is anywhere in the universe, while being the effect of past work on the one hand, becomes, on the other, a cause in its turn, and produces its own effect. It is necessary, together with this, to consider what is meant by the word "law". By law is meant the tendency of a series to repeat itself. When we see one event followed by another, or sometimes happening simultaneously with another, we expect this sequence or co-existence to recur. Our old logicians and philosophers of the Nyaya school call this law by the name of Vyapti. According to them, all our ideas of law are due to association. A series of phenomena becomes associated with things in our mind in a sort of invariable order, so that whatever we perceive at any time is immediately referred to other facts in the mind. Any one idea or, according to our psychology, any one wave that is produced in the mind-stuff, Chitta, must always give rise to many similar waves. This is the psychological idea of association, and causation is only as aspect of this grand pervasive principle of association. This pervasiveness of association is what is, in Sanskrit, called Vyapti. In the external world the idea of law is the same as in the internal--the expectation that a particular phenomenon will be followed by another, and that the series will repeat itself. Really speaking, therefore, law does not exist in nature. Practically it is an error to say that gravitation exists in the earth, or that there is any law existing objectively anywhere in nature. Law is the method, the manner in which our mind grasps a series of phenomena; it is all in the mind. Certain phenomena, happening one after another or together, and followed by the conviction of the regularity of their recurrence--thus enabling our minds to grasp the method of the whole series--constitute what we call law.

The next question for consideration is what we mean by law being universal. Our universe is that portion of existence which is characterised by what the Sanskrit psychologists call Desha-kala-nimitta, or what is known to European psychology as space, time, and causation. This universe is only a part of infinite existence, thrown into a peculiar mould, composed of space, time, and causation. It necessarily follows that law is possible only within this conditioned universe; beyond it there cannot be any law. When we speak of the universe, we only mean that portion of existence which is limited by our mind--the universe of the senses, which we can see, feel, touch, hear, think of, imagine. This alone is under law; but beyond it existence cannot be subject to law, because causation does not extend beyond the world of our minds. Anything beyond

1 the range of our mind and our senses is not bound by the law of 2 causation, as there is no mental association of things in the region
3 beyond the senses, and no causation without association of ideas. It 4 is only when "being" or existence gets moulded into name and form 5 that it obeys the law of causation, and is said to be under law; 6 because all law has its essence in causation. Therefore we see at 7 once that there cannot be any such thing as free will; the very 8 words are a contradiction, because will is what we know and 9 everything that we know is within our universe, and everything 10 within our universe is moulded by the conditions of space, time, and 11 causation. Everything that we know, or can possibly know, must be 12 subject to causation, and that which obeys the law of causation 13 cannot be free. It is acted upon by other agents, and becomes a 14 cause in its turn. But that which has become converted into the will, 15 which was not the will before, but which, when it fell into this 16 mould of space, time, and causation, became converted into the 17 human will, is free; and when this will gets out of this mould of 18 space, time, and causation, it will be free again. From freedom it 19 comes, and becomes moulded into this bondage, and it gets out and 20 goes back to freedom again.

21 The question has been raised as to from whom this universe 22 comes, in whom it rests, and to whom it goes; and the answer has 23 been given that from freedom it comes, in bondage it rests, and 24 goes back into that freedom again. So, when we speak of man as no 25 other than that infinite being which is manifesting itself, we mean 26 that only one very small part thereof is man; this body and this 27 mind which we see are only one part of the whole, only one spot of 28 the infinite being. This whole universe is only one speck of the 29 infinite being; and all our laws, our bondages, our joys and our 30 sorrows, our happinesses and our expectations, are only within this 31 small universe; all our progression and digression are within its 32 small compass. So you see how childish it is to expect a 33 continuation of this universe--the creation of our minds--and to 34 expect to go to heaven, which after all must mean only a repetition 35 of this world that we know. You see at once that it is an impossible 36 and childish desire to make the whole of infinite existence conform 37 to the limited and conditioned existence which we know. When a 38 man says that he will have again and again this same thing which 39 he is having now, or, as I sometimes put it, when he asks for a 40 comfortable religion, you may know that he has become so 41 degenerate that he cannot think of anything higher than what he is 42 now; he is just his little present surroundings and nothing more. He 43 has forgotten his infinite nature, and his whole idea is confined to 44 these little joys, and sorrows, and heart-jealousies of the moment.
45 He thinks that this finite thing is the infinite; and not only so, he will 46 not let this foolishness go. He clings on desperately unto Trishna, 47 and the thirst after life, what the Buddhists call Tanha and Tissa.
48 There may be millions of kinds of happiness, and beings, and laws, 49 and progress, and causation, all acting outside the little universe 50 that we know; and, after all, the whole of this comprises but one 51 section of our infinite nature.

52 To acquire freedom we have to get beyond the limitations of 1 this universe; it cannot be found here. Perfect equilibrium, or what 2 the Christians call the peace that passeth all understanding, cannot 3 be had in this universe, nor in heaven, nor in any place where our 4 mind and thoughts can go, where the senses can feel, or which the 5 imagination can conceive. No such place can give us that freedom, 6 because all such places would be within our universe, and it is 7 limited by space, time, and causation. There may be places that are 8 more ethereal than this earth of ours, where enjoyments may be 9 keener, but even those places must be in the universe and, 10 therefore, in bondage to law; so we have to go beyond, and real 11 religion begins where this little universe ends. These little joys, and 12 sorrows, and knowledge of things end there, and the reality begins.

13 Until we give up the thirst after life, the strong attachment to this 14 our transient conditioned existence, we have no hope of catching 15 even a glimpse of that infinite freedom beyond. It stands to reason 16 then that there is only one way to attain to that freedom which is 17 the goal of all the noblest aspirations of mankind, and that is by 18 giving up this little life, giving up this little universe, giving up this 19 earth, giving up heaven, giving up the body, giving up the mind, 20 giving up everything that is limited and conditioned. If we give up 21 our attachment to this little universe of the senses or of the mind, 22 we shall be free immediately. The only way to come out of bondage 23 is to go beyond the limitations of law, to go beyond causation.

24 But it is a most difficult thing to give up the clinging to this 25 universe; few ever attain to that. There are two ways to do that 26 mentioned in our books. One is called the "Neti, Neti" (not this, not 27 this), the other is called "iti" (this); the former is the negative, and 28 the latter is the positive way. The negative way is the most difficult.
29 It is only possible to the men of the very highest, exceptional minds 30 and gigantic wills who simply stand up and say, "No, I will not have 31 this," and the mind and body obey their will, and they come out 32 successful. But such people are very rare. The vast majority of 33 mankind choose the positive way, the way through the world, 34 making use of all the bondages themselves to break those very 35 bondages. This is also a kind of giving up; only it is done slowly and 36 gradually, by knowing things, enjoying things and thus obtaining 37 experience, and knowing the nature of things until the mind lets 38 them all go at last and becomes unattached. The former way of 39 obtaining non-attachment is by reasoning, and the latter way is 40 through work and experience. The first is the path of Jnana-Yoga 41 and is characterised by the refusal to do any work; the second is 42 that of Karma-Yoga, in which there is no cessation from work. Every 43 one must work in the universe. Only those who are perfectly 44 satisfied with the Self, whose desires do not go beyond the Self, 45 whose mind never strays out of the Self, to whom the Self is all in 46 all, only those do not work. The rest must work. A current rushing 47 down of its own nature falls into a hollow and makes a whirlpool, 48 and, after running a little in that whirlpool, it emerges again in the 49 form of the free current to go on unchecked. Each human life is like 50 that current. It gets into the whirl, gets involved in this world of 51 space, time, and causation, whirls round a little, crying out, "my 52 father, my brother, my name, my fame," and so on, and at last 53 emerges out of it and regains its original freedom. The whole

1 universe is doing that. Whether we know it or not, whether we are 2 conscious or unconscious of it, we are all working to get out of the 3 dream of the world. Man's experience in the world is to enable him 4 to get out of its whirlpool.

5 What is Karma-Yoga? The knowledge of the secret of work.
6 We see that the whole universe is working. For what? For salvation, 7 for liberty; from the atom to the highest being, working for the one 8 end, liberty for the mind, for the body, for the spirit. All things are 9 always trying to get freedom, flying away from bondage. The sun, 10 the moon, the earth, the planets, all are trying to fly away from 11 bondage. The centrifugal and the centripetal forces of nature are 12 indeed typical of our universe. Instead of being knocked about in 13 this universe, and after long delay and thrashing, getting to know 14 things as they are, we learn from Karma-Yoga the secret of work, 15 the method of work, the organising power of work. A vast mass of 16 energy may be spent in vain if we do not know how to utilise it.
17 Karma- Yoga makes a science of work; you learn by it how best to 18 utilise all the workings of this world. Work is inevitable, it must be 19 so; but we should work to the highest purpose. Karma-Yoga makes 20 us admit that this world is a world of five minutes, that it is a 21 something we have to pass through; and that freedom is not here, 22 but is only to be found beyond. To find the way out of the bondages 23 of the world we have to go through it slowly and surely. There may 24 be those exceptional persons about whom I just spoke, those who 25 can stand aside and give up the world, as a snake casts off its skin 26 and stands aside and looks at it. There are no doubt these 27 exceptional beings; but the rest of mankind have to go slowing 28 through the world of work. Karma-Yoga shows the process, the 29 secret, and the method of doing it to the best advantage.

30 What does it say? "Work incessantly, but give up all 31 attachment to work." Do not identify yourself with anything. Hold 32 your mind free. All this that you see, the pains and the miseries, are 33 but the necessary conditions of this world; poverty and wealth and 34 happiness are but momentary; they do not belong to our real nature 35 at all. Our nature is far beyond misery and happiness, beyond every 36 object of the senses, beyond the imagination; and yet we must go 37 on working all the time. "Misery comes through attachment, not 38 through work." As soon as we identify ourselves with the work we 39 do, we feel miserable; but if we do not identify ourselves with it, we 40 do not feel that misery. If a beautiful picture belonging to another is 41 burnt, a man does not generally become miserable; but when his 42 own picture is burnt, how miserable he feels! Why? Both were 43 beautiful pictures, perhaps copies of the same original; but in one 44 case very much more misery is felt than in the other. It is because 45 in one case he identifies himself with the picture, and not in the 46 other. This "I and mine" causes the whole misery. With the sense of 47 possession comes selfishness, and selfishness brings on misery.
48 Every act of selfishness or thought of selfishness makes us attached 49 to something, and immediately we are made slaves. Each wave in 50 the Chitta that says "I and mine" immediately puts a chain round us 51 and makes us slaves; and the more we say "I and mine", the more 52 slavery grows, the more misery increases. Therefore Karma-Yoga

1 tells us to enjoy the beauty of all the pictures in the world, but not 2 to identify ourselves with any of them. Never say "mine". Whenever 3 we say a thing is "mine", misery will immediately come. Do not even 4 say "my child" in your mind. Possess the child, but do not say
5 "mine". If you do, then will come the misery. Do not say "my house," 6 do not say "my body". The whole difficulty is there. The body is 7 neither yours, nor mine, nor anybody's. These bodies are coming 8 and going by the laws of nature, but we are free, standing as 9 witness. This body is no more free than a picture or a wall. Why 10 should we be attached so much to a body? If somebody paints a 11 picture, he does it and passes on. Do not project that tentacle of 12 selfishness, "I must possess it". As soon as that is projected, misery 13 will begin.

14 So Karma-Yoga says, first destroy the tendency to project this 15 tentacle of selfishness, and when you have the power of checking it, 16 hold it in and do not allow the mind to get into the ways of 17 selfishness. Then you may go out into the world and work as much 18 as you can. Mix everywhere, go where you please; you will never be 19 contaminated with evil. There is the lotus leaf in the water; the 20 water cannot touch and adhere to it; so will you be in the world.
21 This is called "Vairagya", dispassion or non-attachment. I believe I 22 have told you that without non-attachment there cannot be any kind 23 of Yoga. Non-attachment is the basis of all the Yogas. The man who 24 gives up living in houses, wearing fine clothes, and eating good 25 food, and goes into the desert, may be a most attached person. His 26 only possession, his own body, may become everything to him; and 27 as he lives he will be simply struggling for the sake of his body.
28 Non-attachment does not mean anything that we may do in relation 29 to our external body, it is all in the mind. The binding link of "I and 30 mine" is in the mind. If we have not this link with the body and with 31 the things of the senses, we are non-attached, wherever and 32 whatever we may be. A man may be on a throne and perfectly non-33 attached; another man may be in rags and still very much attached.
34 First, we have to attain this state of non-attachment and then to 35 work incessantly. Karma-Yoga gives us the method that will help us 36 in giving up all attachment, though it is indeed very hard.

37 Here are the two ways of giving up all attachment. The one is 38 for those who do not believe in God, or in any outside help. They 39 are left to their own devices; they have simply to work with their 40 own will, with the powers of their mind and discrimination, saying, 41 "I must be non-attached". For those who believe in God there is 42 another way, which is much less difficult. They give up the fruits of 43 work unto the Lord; they work and are never attached to the 44 results. Whatever they see, feel, hear, or do, is for Him. For 45 whatever good work we may do, let us not claim any praise or 46 benefit. It is the Lord's; give up the fruits unto Him. Let us stand 47 aside and think that we are only servants obeying the Lord, our 48 Master, and that every impulse for action comes from Him every 49 moment. Whatever thou worshipping, whatever thou perceivest, 50 whatever thou doest, give up all unto Him and be at rest. Let us be 51 at peace, perfect peace, with ourselves, and give up our whole body 52 and mind and everything as an eternal sacrifice unto the Lord.

1 Instead of the sacrifice of pouring oblations into the fire, perform 2 this one great sacrifice day and night--the sacrifice of your little self.
3 "In search of wealth in this world, Thou art the only wealth I have 4 found; I sacrifice myself unto Thee. In search of some one to be 5 loved, Thou art the only one beloved I have found; I sacrifice myself 6 unto Thee." Let us repeat this day and night, and say, "Nothing for 7 me; no matter whether the thing is good, bad, or indifferent; I do 8 not care for it; I sacrifice all unto Thee." Day and night let us 9 renounce our seeming self until it becomes a habit with us to do so, 10 until it gets into the blood, the nerves, and the brain, and the whole 11 body is every moment obedient to this idea of self-renunciation. Go 12 then into the midst of the battlefield, with the roaring cannon and 13 the din of war, and you will find yourself to be free and at peace.

14 Karma-Yoga teaches us that the ordinary idea of duty is on the 15 lower plane; nevertheless, all of us have to do our duty. Yet we may 16 see that this peculiar sense of duty is very often a great cause of 17 misery. Duty becomes a disease with us; it drags us ever forward. It 18 catches hold of us and makes our whole life miserable. It is the 19 bane of human life. This duty, this idea of duty is the midday 20 summer sun which scorches the innermost soul of mankind. Look at 21 those poor slaves to duty! Duty leaves them no time to say prayers, 22 no time to bathe. Duty is ever on them. They go out and work. Duty 23 is on them! They come home and think of the work for the next day.
24 Duty is on them! It is living a slave's life, at last dropping down in 25 the street and dying in harness, like a horse. This is duty as it is 26 understood. The only true duty is to be unattached and to work as 27 free beings, to give up all work unto God. All our duties are His.
28 Blessed are we that we are ordered out here. We serve our time;
29 whether we do it ill or well, who knows? If we do it well, we do not 30 get the fruits. If we do it ill, neither do we get the care. Be at rest, 31 be free, and work. This kind of freedom is a very hard thing to 32 attain. How easy it is to interpret slavery as duty--the morbid 33 attachment of flesh for flesh as duty! Men go out into the world and 34 struggle and fight for money or for any other thing to which they 35 get attached. Ask them why they do it. They say, "It is a duty." It is 36 the absurd greed for gold and gain, and they try to cover it with a 37 few flowers.

38 What is duty after all? It is really the impulsion of the flesh, of 39 our attachment; and when an attachment has become established, 40 we call it duty. For instance, in countries where there is no 41 marriage, there is no duty between husband and wife; when 42 marriage comes, husband and wife live together on account of 43 attachment; and that kind of living together becomes settled after 44 generations; and when it becomes so settled, it becomes a duty. It 45 is, so to say, a sort of chronic disease. When it is acute, we call it 46 disease; when it is chronic, we call it nature. It is a disease. So 47 when attachment becomes chronic, we baptise it with the high-48 sounding name of duty. We strew flowers upon it, trumpets sound 49 for it, sacred texts are said over it, and then the whole world fights, 50 and men earnestly rob each other for this duty's sake. Duty is good 51 to the extent that it checks brutality. To the lowest kinds of men, 52 who cannot have any other ideal, it is of some good; but those who

1 want to be Karma Yogis must throw this idea of duty overboard.
2 There is no duty for you and me. Whatever you have to give to the 3 world, do give by all means, but not as a duty. Do not take any 4 thought of that. Be not compelled. Why should you be compelled?
5 Everything that you do under compulsion goes to build up 6 attachment. Why should you have any duty? Resign everything unto 7 God. In this tremendous fiery furnace where the fire of duty 8 scorches everybody, drink this cup of nectar and be happy. We are 9 all simply working out His will, and have nothing to do with rewards 10 and punishments. If you want the reward, you must also have the 11 punishment; the only way to get out of the punishment is to give up 12 the reward. The only way of getting out of misery is by giving up 13 the idea of happiness, because these two are linked to each other.
14 On one side there is happiness, on the other there is misery. On one 15 side there is life, on the other there is death. The only way to get 16 beyond death is to give up the love of life. Life and death are the 17 same thing, looked at from different points. So the idea of 18 happiness without misery, or of life without death, is very good for 19 school-boys and children; but the thinker sees that it is all a 20 contradiction in terms and gives up both. Seek no praise, no 21 reward, for anything you do. No sooner do we perform a good 22 action than we begin to desire credit for it. No sooner do we give 23 money to some charity than we want to see our names blazoned in 24 the papers. Misery must come as a result of such desires. The 25 greatest men in the world have passed away unknown. The 26 Buddhas and the Christs that we know are but second-rate heroes 27 in comparison with the greatest men of whom the world knows 28 nothing. Hundreds of these unknown heroes have lived in every 29 country working silently. Silently they live and silently they pass 30 away; and in time their thoughts find expression in Buddhas or 31 Christs, and it is these latter that become known to us. The highest 32 men do not seek to get any name or fame from their knowledge.
33 They leave their ideas to the world; they put forth no claims for 34 themselves and establish no schools or systems in their name. Their 35 whole nature shrinks from such a thing. They are the pure 36 Sattvikas, who can never make any stir, but only melt down in love.
37 I have seen one such Yogi who lives in a cave in India. He is one of 38 the most wonderful men I have ever seen. He has so completely lost 39 the sense of his own individuality that we may say that the man in 40 him is completely gone, leaving behind only the all-comprehending 41 sense of the divine. If an animal bites one of his arms, he is ready to 42 give it his other arm also, and say that it is the Lord's will.
43 Everything that comes to him is from the Lord. He does not show 44 himself to men, and yet he is a magazine of love and of true and 45 sweet ideas.

46 Next in order come the men with more Rajas, or activity, 47 combative natures, who take up the ideas of the perfect ones and 48 preach them to the world. The highest kind of men silently collect 49 true and noble ideas, and others--the Buddhas and Christs--go from 50 place to place preaching them and working for them. In the life of 51 Gautama Buddha we notice him constantly saying that he is the 52 twenty-fifth Buddha. The twenty-four before him are unknown to 53 history, although the Buddha known to history must have built upon

1 foundations laid by them. The highest men are calm, silent, and 2 unknown. They are the men who really know the power of thought; 3 they are sure that, even if they go into a cave and close the door 4 and simply think five true thoughts and then pass away, these five 5 thoughts of theirs will live through eternity. Indeed such thoughts 6 will penetrate through the mountains, cross the oceans, and travel 7 through the world. They will enter deep into human hearts and 8 brains and raise up men and women who will give them practical 9 expression in the workings of human life. These Sattvika men are 10 too near the Lord to be active and to fight, to be working, 11 struggling, preaching, and doing good, as they say, here on earth to 12 humanity. The active workers, however good, have still a little 13 remnant of ignorance left in them. When our nature has yet some 14 impurities left in it, then alone can we work. It is in the nature of 15 work to be impelled ordinarily by motive and by attachment. In the 16 presence of an ever active Providence who notes even the 17 sparrow's fall, how can man attach any importance to his own 18 work? Will it not be a blasphemy to do so when we know that He is 19 taking care of the minutest things in the world? We have only to 20 stand in awe and reverence before Him saying, "Thy will be done".
21 The highest men cannot work, for in them there is no attachment.
22 Those whose whole soul is gone into the Self, those whose desires 23 are confined in the Self, who have become ever associated with the 24 Self, for them there is no work. Such are indeed the highest of 25 mankind; but apart from them every one else has to work. In so 26 working we should never think that we can help on even the least 27 thing in this universe. We cannot. We only help ourselves in this 28 gymnasium of the world. This is the proper attitude of work. If we 29 work in this way, if we always remember that our present 30 opportunity to work thus is a privilege which has been given to us, 31 we shall never be attached to anything.

32 Millions like you and me think that we are great people in the 33 world; but we all die, and in five minutes the world forgets us. But 34 the life of God is infinite. "Who can live a moment, breathe a 35 moment, if this all-powerful One does not will it?" He is the ever 36 active Providence. All power is His and within His command.
37 Through His command the winds blow, the sun shines, the earth
38 lives, and death stalks upon the earth. He is the all in all; He is all 39 and in all. We can only worship Him. Give up all fruits of work; do 40 good for its own sake; then alone will come perfect non-attachment.
41 The bonds of the heart will thus break, and we shall reap perfect 42 freedom. This freedom is indeed the goal of Karma-Yoga.

THE IDEAL OF KARMA-YOGA

The grandest idea in the religion of the Vedanta is that we may reach the same goal by different paths; and these paths I have generalised into four, viz. those of work, love, psychology, and knowledge. But you must, at the same time, remember that these divisions are not very marked and quite exclusive of each other. Each blends into the other. But according to the type which prevails, we name the divisions. It is not that you can find men who have no other faculty than that of work, nor that you can find men who are no more than devoted worshippers only, nor that there are men who have no more than mere knowledge. These divisions are made in accordance with the type or the tendency that may be seen to prevail in a man. We have found that, in the end, all these four paths converge and become one. All religions and all methods of work and worship lead us to one and the same goal.

I have already tried to point out that goal. It is freedom as I understand it. Everything that we perceive around us is struggling towards freedom, from the atom to the man, from the insentient, lifeless particle of matter to the highest existence on earth, the human soul. The whole universe is in fact the result of this struggle for freedom. In all combinations every particle is trying to go on its own way, to fly from the other particles; but the others are holding it in check. Our earth is trying to fly away from the sun, and the moon from the earth. Everything has a tendency to infinite dispersion. All that we see in the universe has for its basis this one struggle towards freedom; it is under the impulse of this tendency that the saint prays and the robber robs. When the line of action taken is not a proper one, we call it evil; and when the manifestation of it is proper and high, we call it good. But the impulse is the same, the struggle towards freedom. The saint is oppressed with the knowledge of his condition of bondage, and he wants to get rid of it; so he worships God. The thief is oppressed with the idea that he does not possess certain things, and he tries to get rid of that want, to obtain freedom from it; so he steals. Freedom is the one goal of all nature, sentient or insentient; and consciously or unconsciously, everything is struggling towards that goal. The freedom which the saint seeks is very different from that which the robber seeks; the freedom loved by the saint leads him to the enjoyment of infinite, unspeakable bliss, while that on which the robber has set his heart only forges other bonds for his soul.

There is to be found in every religion the manifestation of this struggle towards freedom. It is the groundwork of all morality, of unselfishness, which means getting rid of the idea that men are the same as their little body. When we see a man doing good work, helping others, it means that he cannot be confined within the limited circle of "me and mine". There is no limit to this getting out of selfishness. All the great systems of ethics preach absolute unselfishness as the goal. Supposing this absolute unselfishness can be reached by a man, what becomes of him? He is no more the little Mr. So-and-so; he has acquired infinite expansion. The little

1 personality which he had before is now lost to him for ever; he has 2 become infinite, and the attainment of this infinite expansion is 3 indeed the goal of all religions and of all moral and philosophical 4 teachings. The personalist, when he hears this idea philosophically 5 put, gets frightened. At the same time, if he preaches morality, he 6 after all teaches the very same idea himself. He puts no limit to the 7 unselfishness of man. Suppose a man becomes perfectly unselfish 8 under the personalistic system, how are we to distinguish him from 9 the perfected ones in other systems? He has become one with the 10 universe and to become that is the goal of all; only the poor 11 personalist has not the courage to follow out his own reasoning to 12 its right conclusion. Karma-Yoga is the attaining through unselfish 13 work of that freedom which is the goal of all human nature. Every 14 selfish action, therefore, retards our reaching the goal, and every 15 unselfish action takes us towards the goal; that is why the only 16 definition that can be given of morality is this: That which is selfish 17 is immoral, and that which is unselfish is moral.

18 But, if you come to details, the matter will not be seen to be 19 quite so simple. For instance, environment often makes the details 20 different as I have already mentioned. The same action under one 21 set of circumstances may be unselfish, and under another set quite 22 selfish. So we can give only a general definition, and leave the 23 details to be worked out by taking into consideration the 24 differences in time, place, and circumstances. In one country one 25 kind of conduct is considered moral, and in another the very same 26 is immoral, because the circumstances differ. The goal of all nature 27 is freedom, and freedom is to be attained only by perfect 28 unselfishness; every thought, word, or deed that is unselfish takes 29 us towards the goal, and, as such, is called moral. That definition, 30 you will find, holds good in every religion and every system of 31 ethics. In some systems of thought morality is derived from a 32 Superior Being--God. If you ask why a man ought to do this and not 33 that, their answer is : "Because such is the command of God." But 34 whatever be the source from which it is derived, their code of 35 ethics also has the same central idea--not to think of self but to give 36 up self. And yet some persons, in spite of this high ethical idea, are 37 frightened at the thought of having to give up their little 38 personalities. We may ask the man who clings to the idea of little 39 personalities to consider the case of a person who has become 40 perfectly unselfish, who has no thought for himself, who does no 41 deed for himself, who speaks no word for himself, and then say 42 where his "himself" is. That "himself" is known to him only so long 43 as he thinks, acts, or speaks for himself. If he is only conscious of 44 others, of the universe, and of the all, where is his "himself"? It is 45 gone forever.

46 Karma-Yoga, therefore, is a system of ethics and religion
47 intended to attain freedom through unselfishness, and by good 48 works. The Karma-Yogi need not believe in any doctrine whatever.
49 He may not believe even in God, may not ask what his soul is, nor 50 think of any metaphysical speculation. He has got his own special 51 aim of realising selflessness; and he has to work it out himself.
52 Every moment of his life must be realisation, because he has to 1 solve by mere work, without the help of doctrine or theory, the very 2 same problem to which the Jnani applies his reason and inspiration

3 and the Bhakta his love.

4 Now comes the next question: What is this work? What is this 5 doing good to the world? Can we do good to the world? In an 6 absolute sense, no; in a relative sense, yes. No permanent or 7 everlasting good can be done to the world; if it could be done, the 8 world would not be this world. We may satisfy the hunger of a man 9 for five minutes, but he will be hungry again. Every pleasure with 10 which we supply a man may be seen to be momentary. No one can 11 permanently cure this ever-recurring fever of pleasure and pain.
12 Can any permanent happiness be given to the world? In the ocean 13 we cannot raise a wave without causing a hollow somewhere else.
14 The sum total of the good things in the world has been the same 15 throughout in its relation to man's need and greed. It cannot be 16 increased or decreased. Take the history of the human race as we 17 know it today. Do we not find the same miseries and the same 18 happiness, the same pleasures and pains, the same differences in 19 position? Are not some rich, some poor, some high, some low, some 20 healthy, some unhealthy? All this was just the same with the 21 Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Romans in ancient times as it is with 22 the Americans today. So far as history is known, it has always been 23 the same; yet at the same time we find that, running along with all 24 these incurable differences of pleasure and pain, there has ever 25 been the struggle to alleviate them. Every period of history has 26 given birth to thousands of men and women who have worked hard 27 to smooth the passage of life for others. And how far have they 28 succeeded? We can only play at driving the ball from one place to 29 another. We take away pain from the physical plane, and it goes to 30 the mental one. It is like that picture in Dante's hell where the 31 misers were given a mass of gold to roll up a hill. Every time they 32 rolled it up a little, it again rolled down. All our talks about the 33 millennium are very nice as school-boys' stories, but they are no 34 better than that. All nations that dream of the millennium also think 35 that, of all peoples in the world, they will have the best of it then for 36 themselves. This is the wonderfully unselfish idea of the 37 millennium!

38 We cannot add happiness to this world; similarly, we cannot 39 add pain to it either. The sum total of the energies of pleasure and 40 pain displayed here on earth will be the same throughout. We just 41 push it from this side to the other side, and from that side to this, 42 but it will remain the same, because to remain so is its very nature.
43 This ebb and flow, this rising and falling, is in the world's very 44 nature; it would be as logical to hold otherwise as to say that we 45 may have life without death. This is complete nonsense, because 46 the very idea of life implies death and the very idea of pleasure 47 implies pain. The lamp is constantly burning out, and that is its life.
48 If you want to have life, you have to die every moment for it. Life 49 and death are only different expressions of the same thing looked at 50 from different standpoints; they are the falling and the rising of the 51 same wave, and the two form one whole. One looks at the "fall" side 52 and becomes a pessimist, another looks at the "rise" side and

1 becomes an optimist. When a boy is going to school and his father 2 and mother are taking care of him, everything seems blessed to 3 him; his wants are simple, he is a great optimist. But the old man, 4 with his varied experience, becomes calmer, and is sure to have his 5 warmth considerably cooled down. So, old nations, with signs of 6 decay all around them, are apt to be less hopeful than new nations.
7 There is a proverb in India: "A thousand years a city, and a 8 thousand years a forest." This change of city into forest and vice 9 versa is going on everywhere, and it makes people optimists or 10 pessimists according to the side they see of it.

11 The next idea we take up is the idea of equality. These 12 millennium ideas have been great motive powers to work. Many 13 religions preach this an element in them--that God is coming to rule 14 the universe, and that then there will be no difference at all in 15 conditions. The people who preach this doctrine are mere fanatics, 16 and fanatics are indeed the sincerest of mankind. Christianity was 17 preached just on the basis of the fascination of this fanaticism, and 18 that is what made it so attractive to the Greek and the Roman 19 slaves. They believed that under the millennial religion there would 20 be no more slavery, that there would be plenty to eat and drink; 21 and, therefore, they flocked round the Christian standard. Those 22 who preached the idea first were of course ignorant fanatics, but 23 very sincere. In modern times this millennial aspiration takes the 24 form of equality--of liberty, equality, and fraternity. This is also 25 fanaticism. True equality has never been and never can be on earth.
26 How can we all be equal here? This impossible kind of equality 27 implies total death. What makes this world what it is? Lost balance.
28 In the primal state, which is called chaos, there is perfect balance.
29 How do all the formative forces of the universe come then? By 30 struggling, competition, conflict. Suppose that all the particles of 31 matter were held in equilibrium, would there be then any process of 32 creation? We know from science that it is impossible. Disturb a 33 sheet of water, and there you find every particle of the water trying 34 to become calm again, one rushing against the other; and in the 35 same way all the phenomena which we call the universe--all things 36 therein--are struggling to get back to the state of perfect balance.
37 Again a disturbance comes, and again we have combination and 38 creation. Inequality is the very basis of creation. At the same time 39 the forces struggling to obtain equality are as much a necessity of 40 creation as those which destroy it.

41 Absolute equality, that which means a perfect balance of all 42 the struggling forces in all the planes, can never be in this world.
43 Before you attain that state, the world will have become quite unfit 44 for any kind of life, and no one will be there. We find, therefore, that 45 all these ideas of the millennium and of absolute equality are not 46 only impossible but also that, if we try to carry them out, they will 47 lead us surely enough to the day of destruction. What makes the 48 difference between man and man? It is largely the difference in the 49 brain. Nowadays no one but a lunatic will say that we are all born 50 with the same brain power. We come into the world with unequal 51 endowments; we come as greater men or as lesser men, and there 52 is no getting away from that pre-natally determined condition. The 1 American Indians were in this country for thousands of years, and a 2 few handfuls of your ancestors came to their land. What difference 3 they have caused in the appearance of the country! Why did not the 4 Indians make improvements and build cities, if all were equal? With 5 your ancestors a different sort of brain power came into the land, 6 different bundles of past impressions came, and they worked out 7 and manifested themselves. Absolute non-differentiation is death.

8 So long as this world lasts, differentiation there will and must be, 9 and the millennium of perfect equality will come only when a cycle 10 of creation comes to its end. Before that, equality cannot be. Yet 11 this idea of realising the millennium is a great motive power. Just as 12 inequality is necessary for creation itself, so the struggle to limit it 13 is also necessary. If there were no struggle to become free and get 14 back to God, there would be no creation either. It is the difference 15 between these two forces that determines the nature of the motives 16 of men. There will always be these motives to work, some tending 17 towards bondage and others towards freedom.

18 This world's wheel within wheel is a terrible mechanism; if 19 we put our hands in it, as soon as we are caught we are gone. We 20 all think that when we have done a certain duty, we shall be at rest; 21 but before we have done a part of that duty, another is already in 22 waiting. We are all being dragged along by this mighty, complex 23 world-machine. There are only two ways out of it; one is to give up 24 all concerns with the machine, to let it go and stand aside, to give 25 up our desires. That is very easy to say, but is almost impossible to 26 do. I do not know whether in twenty millions of men one can do 27 that. The other way is to plunge into the world and learn the secret 28 of work, and that is the way of Karma-Yoga. Do not fly away from 29 the wheels of the world-machine, but stand inside it and learn the 30 secret of work. Through proper work done inside, it is also possible 31 to come out. Through this machinery itself is the way out.

32 We have now seen what work is. It is a part of nature's 33 foundation, and goes on always. Those that believe in God 34 understand this better, because they know that God is not such an 35 incapable being as will need our help. Although this universe will go 36 on always, our goal is freedom, our goal is unselfishness; and 37 according to Karma-Yoga, that goal is to be reached through work.
38 All ideas of making the world perfectly happy may be good as 39 motive powers for fanatics; but we must know that fanaticism
40 brings forth as much evil as good. The Karma Yogi asks why you 41 require any motive to work other than the inborn love of freedom.
42 Be beyond the common worldly motives. "To work you have the 43 right, but not to the fruits thereof." Man can train himself to know 44 and to practise that, says the Karma Yogi. When the idea of doing 45 good becomes a part of his very being, then he will not seek for any 46 motive outside. Let us do good because it is good to do good; he 47 who does good work even in order to get to heaven binds himself 48 down, says the Karma Yogi. Any work that is done with any the least 49 selfish motive, instead of making us free, forges one more chain for 50 our feet.

51 So the only way is to give up all the fruits of work, to be 52 unattached to them. Know that this world is not we, nor are we this

1 world; that we are really not the body; that we really do not work.
2 We are the Self, eternally at rest and at peace. Why should we be 3 bound by anything? It is very good to say that we should be 4 perfectly non-attached, but what is the way to do it? Every good 5 work we do without any ulterior motive, instead of forging a new 6 chain, will break one of the links in the existing chains. Every good 7 thought that we send to the world without thinking of any return, 8 will be stored up there and break one link in the chain, and make us 9 purer and purer, until we become the purest of mortals. Yet all this 10 may seem to be rather quixotic and too philosophical, more 11 theoretical than practical. I have read many arguments against the 12 Bhagavad-Gita, and many have said that without motives you 13 cannot work. They have never seen unselfish work except under the 14 influence of fanaticism, and, therefore, they speak in that way.

15 Let me tell you in conclusion a few words about one man who 16 actually carried this teaching of Karma-Yoga into practice. That man 17 is Buddha. He is the one man who ever carried this into perfect 18 practice. All the prophets of the world, except Buddha, had external 19 motives to move them to unselfish action. The prophets of the 20 world, with this single exception, may be divided into two sets, one 21 set holding that they are incarnations of God come down on earth, 22 and the other holding that they are only messengers from God; and 23 both draw their impetus for work from outside, expect reward from 24 outside, however highly spiritual may be the language they use. But 25 Buddha is the only prophet who said, "I do not care to know your 26 various theories about God. What is the use of discussing all the 27 subtle doctrines about the soul? Do good and be good. And this will 28 take you to freedom and to whatever truth there is." He was, in the 29 conduct of his life, absolutely without personal motives; and what 30 man worked more than he? Show me in history one character who 31 has soared so high above all. The whole human race has produced 32 but one such character, such high philosophy, such wide sympathy.
33 This great philosopher, preaching the highest philosophy, yet had 34 the deepest sympathy for the lowest of animals, and never put forth 35 any claims for himself. He is the ideal Karma-Yogi, acting entirely 36 without motive, and the history of humanity shows him to have been 37 the greatest man ever born; beyond compare the greatest 38 combination of heart and brain that ever existed, the greatest soul-39 power that has ever been manifested. He is the first great reformer 40 the world has seen. He was the first who dared to say, "Believe not 41 because some old manuscripts are produced, believe not because it 42 is your national belief, because you have been made to believe it 43 from your childhood; but reason it all out, and after you have 44 analysed it, then, if you find that it will do good to one and all, 45 believe it, live up to it, and help others to live up to it." He works 46 best who works without any motive, neither for money, nor for 47 fame, nor for anything else; and when a man can do that, he will be 48 a Buddha, and out of him will come the power to work in such a 49 manner as will transform the world. This man represents the very 50 highest ideal of Karma-Yoga.

RAJA-YOGA

PREFACE

Since the dawn of history, various extraordinary phenomena have been recorded as happening amongst human beings. Witnesses are not wanting in modern times to attest to the fact of such events, even in societies living under the full blaze of modern science. The vast mass of such evidence is unreliable, as coming from ignorant, superstitious, or fraudulent persons. In many instances the so-called miracles are imitations. But what do they imitate? It is not the sign of a candid and scientific mind to throw overboard anything without proper investigation. Surface scientists, unable to explain the various extraordinary mental phenomena, strive to ignore their very existence. They are, therefore, more culpable than those who think that their prayers are answered by a being, or beings, above the clouds, or than those who believe that their petitions will make such beings change the course of the universe. The latter have the excuse of ignorance, or at least of a defective system of education, which has taught them dependence upon such beings, a dependence which has become a part of their degenerate nature. The former have no such excuse.

For thousands of years such phenomena have been studied, investigated, and generalised, the whole ground of the religious faculties of man has been analysed, and the practical result is the science of Raja-Yoga. Raja-Yoga does not, after the unpardonable manner of some modern scientists, deny the existence of facts which are difficult to explain; on the other hand, it gently yet in no uncertain terms tells the superstitious that miracles, and answers to prayers, and powers of faith, though true as facts, are not rendered comprehensible through the superstitious explanation of attributing them to the agency of a being, or beings, above the clouds. It declares that each man is only a conduit for the infinite ocean of knowledge and power that lies behind mankind. It teaches that desires and wants are in man, that the power of supply is also in man; and that wherever and whenever a desire, a want, a prayer has been fulfilled, it was out of this infinite magazine that the supply came, and not from any supernatural being. The idea of supernatural beings may rouse to a certain extent the power of action in man, but it also brings spiritual decay. It brings dependence; it brings fear; it brings superstition. It degenerates into a horrible belief in the natural weakness of man. There is no supernatural, says the Yogi, but there are in nature gross manifestations and subtle manifestations. The subtle are the causes, the gross the effects. The gross can be easily perceived by the senses; not so the subtle. The practice of Raja-Yoga will lead to the acquisition of the more subtle perceptions.

All the orthodox systems of India philosophy have one goal in view, the liberation of the soul through perfection. The method is by Yoga. The word Yoga covers an immense ground, but both the Sankhya and the Vedanta Schools point to Yoga in some form or other.

The subject of the present book is that form of Yoga known as

1 Raja- Yoga. The aphorisms of Patanjali are the highest authority on 2 Raja-Yoga, and form its textbook. The other philosophers, though 3 occasionally differing from Patanjali in some philosophical points, 4 have, as a rule, acceded to his method of practice a decided 5 consent. The first part of this book comprises several lectures to 6 classes delivered by the present writer in New York. The second 7 part is a rather free translation of the aphorisms (Sutras) of 8 Patanjali, with a running commentary. Effort has been made to 9 avoid technicalities as far as possible, and to keep to the free and 10 easy style of conversation. In the first part some simple and specific 11 directions are given for the student who want to practise, but all 12 such are especially and earnestly reminded that, with few 13 exceptions, Yoga can only be safely learnt by direct contact with a 14 teacher. If these conversations succeed in awakening a desire for 15 further information on the subject, the teacher will not be wanting.

16 The system of Patanjali is based upon the system of the 17 Sankhyas, the points of difference being very few. The two most 18 important differences are, first, that Patanjali admits a Personal God 19 in the form of a first teacher, while the only God the Sankhyas admit 20 is a nearly perfected being, temporarily in charge of a cycle of 21 creation. Second, the Yogis hold the mind to be equally all-22 pervading with the soul, or Purusha, and the Sankhyas do not.

23 The Author

Each soul is potentially divine.

The goal is to manifest this Divinity within by controlling nature, external and internal.

Do this either by work, or worship, or psychic control, or philosophy--by one, or more, or all of these--and be free.

This is the whole of religion. Doctrines, or dogmas, or rituals, or books, or temples, or forms, are but secondary details.

INTRODUCTORY

All our knowledge is based upon experience. What we call inferential knowledge, in which we go from the less to the more general, or from the general to the particular, has experience as its basis. In what are called the exact sciences, people easily find the truth, because it appeals to the particular experiences of every human being. The scientist does not tell you to believe in anything, but he has certain results which come from his own experiences, and reasoning on them when he asks us to believe in his conclusions, he appeals to some universal experience of humanity. In every exact science there is a basis which is common to all humanity, so that we can at once see the truth or the fallacy of the conclusions drawn therefrom. Now, the question is: Has religion any such basis or not? I shall have to answer the question both in the affirmative and in the negative.

Religion, as it is generally taught all over the world, is said to be based upon faith and belief, and, in most cases, consists only of different sets of theories, and that is the reason why we find all religions quarrelling with one another. These theories, again, are based upon belief. One man says there is a great Being sitting above the clouds and governing the whole universe, and he asks me to believe that solely on the authority of his assertion. In the same way, I may have my own ideas, which I am asking others to believe, and if they ask a reason, I cannot give them any. This is why religion and metaphysical philosophy have a bad name nowadays. Every educated man seems to say, "Oh, these religions are only bundles of theories without any standard to judge them by, each man preaching his own pet ideas." Nevertheless, there is a basis of universal belief in religion, governing all the different theories and all the varying ideas of different sects in different countries. Going

1 to their basis we find that they also are based upon universal 2 experiences.

3 In the first place, if you analyse all the various religions of the 4 world, you will find that these are divided into two classes, those 5 with a book and those without a book. Those with a book are the 6 strongest, and have the largest number of followers. Those without 7 books have mostly died out, and the few new ones have very small 8 followings. Yet, in all of them we find one consensus of opinion, that 9 the truths they teach are the results of the experiences of particular 10 persons. The Christian asks you to believe in his religion, to believe 11 in Christ and to believe in him as the incarnation of God, to believe 12 in a God, in a soul, and in a better state of that soul. If I ask him for 13 reason, he says he believes in them. But if you go to the fountain-14 head of Christianity, you will find that it is based upon experience.
15 Christ said he saw God; the disciples said they felt God; and so 16 forth. Similarly, in Buddhism, it is Buddha's experience. He 17 experienced certain truths, saw them, came in contact with them, 18 and preached them to the world. So with the Hindus. In their books 19 the writers, who are called Rishis, or sages, declare they 20 experienced certain truths, and these they preach. Thus it is clear 21 that all the religions of the world have been built upon that one 22 universal and adamant foundation of all our knowledge--direct 23 experience. The teachers all saw God; they all saw their own souls, 24 they saw their future, they saw their eternity, and what they saw 25 they preached. Only there is this difference that by most of these 26 religions especially in modern times, a peculiar claim is made, 27 namely, that these experiences are impossible at the present day; 28 they were only possible with a few men, who were the first 29 founders of the religions that subsequently bore their names. At the 30 present time these experiences have become obsolete, and, 31 therefore, we have now to take religion on belief. This I entirely 32 deny. If there has been one experience in this world in any 33 particular branch of knowledge, it absolutely follows that that 34 experience has been possible millions of times before, and will be 35 repeated eternally. Uniformity is the rigorous law of nature; what 36 once happened can happen always.

37 The teachers of the science of Yoga, therefore, declare that 38 religion is not only based upon the experience of ancient times, but 39 that no man can be religious until he has the same perceptions 40 himself. Yoga is the science which teaches us how to get these 41 perceptions. It is not much use to talk about religion until one has 42 felt it. Why is there so much disturbance, so much fighting and 43 quarrelling in the name of God? There has been more bloodshed in 44 the name of God than for any other cause, because people never 45 went to the fountain-head; they were content only to give a mental 46 assent to the customs of their forefathers, and wanted others to do 47 the same. What right has a man to say he has a soul if he does not 48 feel it, or that there is a God if he does not see Him? If there is a 49 God we must see Him, if there is a soul we must perceive it;
50 otherwise it is better not to believe. It is better to be an outspoken 51 atheist than a hypocrite. The modern idea, on the one hand, with 52 the "learned" is that religion and metaphysics and all search after a

1 Supreme Being are futile; on the other hand, with the semi-2 educated, the idea seems to be that these things really have no
3 basis; their only value consists in the fact that they furnish strong 4 motive powers for doing good to the world. If men believe in a God, 5 they may become good, and moral, and so make good citizens. We 6 cannot blame them for holding such ideas, seeing that all the 7 teaching these men get is simply to believe in an eternal rigmarole 8 of words, without any substance behind them. They are asked to 9 live upon words; can they do it? If they could, I should not have the 10 least regard for human nature. Man wants truth, wants to 11 experience truth for himself; when he has grasped it, realised it, 12 felt it within his heart of hearts, then alone, declare the Vedas, 13 would all doubts vanish, all darkness be scattered, and all 14 crookedness be made straight. "Ye children of immortality, even 15 those who live in the highest sphere, the way is found; there is a 16 way out of all this darkness, and that is by perceiving Him who is 17 beyond all darkness; there is no other way."

18 The science of Raja-Yoga proposes to put before humanity a 19 practical and scientifically worked out method of reaching this 20 truth. In the first place, every science must have its own method of 21 investigation. If you want to become an astronomer and sit down 22 and cry "Astronomy! Astronomy!" it will never come to you. The 23 same with chemistry. A certain method must be followed. You must 24 go to a laboratory, take different substances, mix them up, 25 compound them, experiment with them, and out of that will come a 26 knowledge of chemistry. If you want to be an astronomer, you must 27 go to an observatory, take a telescope, study the stars and planets, 28 and then you will become an astronomer. Each science must have 29 its own methods. I could preach you thousands of sermons, but they 30 would not make you religious, until you practised the method.
31 These are the truths of the sages of all countries, of all ages, of men 32 pure and unselfish, who had no motive but to do good to the world.
33 They all declare that they have found some truth higher than what 34 the senses can bring to us, and they invite verification. They ask us 35 to take up the method and practise honestly, and then, if we do not 36 find this higher truth, we will have the right to say there is no truth 37 in the claim, but before we have done that, we are not rational in 38 denying the truth of their assertions. So we must work faithfully, 39 using the prescribed methods, and light will come.

40 In acquiring knowledge we make use of generalisations, and 41 generalisation is based upon observation. We first observe facts, 42 then generalise, and then draw conclusions or principles. The 43 knowledge of the mind, of the internal nature of man, of thought, 44 can never be had until we have first the power of observing the 45 facts that are going on within. It is comparatively easy to observe 46 facts in the external world, for many instruments have been 47 invented for the purpose, but in the internal world we have no 48 instrument to help us. Yet we know we must observe in order to 49 have a real science. Without a proper analysis, any science will be 50 hopeless--mere theorising. And that is why all the psychologists 51 have been quarrelling among themselves since the beginning of 52 time, except those few who found out the means of observation.

1 The science of Raja-Yoga, in the first place, proposes to give 2 us such a means of observing the internal states. The instrument is 3 the mind itself. The power of attention, when properly guided, and 4 directed towards the internal world, will analyse the mind, and 5 illumine facts for us. The powers of the mind are like rays of light 6 dissipated; when they are concentrated, they illumine. This is our 7 only means of knowledge. Everyone is using it, both in the external 8 and the internal world; but, for the psychologist, the same minute 9 observation has to be directed to the internal world, which the 10 scientific man directs to the external; and this requires a great deal 11 of practice. From our childhood upwards we have been taught only 12 to pay attention to things external, but never to things internal; 13 hence most of us have nearly lost the faculty of observing the 14 internal mechanism. To turn the mind, as it were, inside, stop it 15 from going outside, and then to concentrate all its powers, and 16 throw them upon the mind itself, in order that it may know its own 17 nature, analyse itself, is very hard work. Yet that is the only way to 18 anything which will be a scientific approach to the subject.

19 What is the use of such knowledge? In the first place, 20 knowledge itself is the highest reward of knowledge, and secondly, 21 there is also utility in it. It will take away all our misery. When by 22 analysing his own mind, man comes face to face, as it were, with 23 something which is never destroyed, something which is, by its own 24 nature, eternally pure and perfect, he will no more be miserable, no 25 more unhappy. All misery comes from fear, from unsatisfied desire.
26 Man will find that he never dies, and then he will have no more fear 27 of death. When he knows that he is perfect, he will have no more 28 vain desires, and both these causes being absent, there will be no 29 more misery--there will be perfect bliss, even while in this body.

30 There is only one method by which to attain this knowledge, 31 that which is called concentration. The chemist in his laboratory 32 concentrates all the energies of his mind into one focus, and throws 33 them upon the materials he is analysing, and so finds out their 34 secrets. The astronomer concentrates all the energies of his mind 35 and projects them through his telescope upon the skies; and the 36 stars, the sun, and the moon, give up their secrets to him. The more 37 I can concentrate my thoughts on the matter on which I am talking 38 to you, the more light I can throw upon you. You are listening to me, 39 and the more you concentrate your thoughts, the more clearly you 40 will grasp what I have to say.

41 How has all the knowledge in the world been gained but by 42 the concentration of the powers of the mind? The world is ready to 43 give up its secrets if we only know how to knock, how to give it the 44 necessary blow. The strength and force of the blow come through 45 concentration. There is no limit to the power of the human mind.
46 The more concentrated it is, the more power is brought to bear on 47 one point; that is the secret.

48 It is easy to concentrate the mind on external things, the 49 mind naturally goes outwards; but not so in the case of religion, or 50 psychology, or metaphysics, where the subject and the object, are 51 one. The object is internal, the mind itself is the object, and it is 52 necessary to study the mind itself--mind studying mind. We know

1 that there is the power of the mind called reflection. I am talking to 2 you. At the same time I am standing aside, as it were, a second 3 person, and knowing and hearing what I am talking. You work and 4 think at the same time, while a portion of your mind stands by and 5 sees what you are thinking. The powers of the mind should be 6 concentrated and turned back upon itself, and as the darkest places 7 reveal their secrets before the penetrating rays of the sun, so will 8 this concentrated mind penetrate its own innermost secrets. Thus 9 will we come to the basis of belief, the real genuine religion. We will 10 perceive for ourselves whether we have souls, whether life is of five 11 minutes or of eternity, whether there is a God in the universe or 12 none. It will all be revealed to us. This is what Raja-Yoga proposes 13 to teach. The goal of all its teaching is how to concentrate the 14 minds, then, how to discover the innermost recesses of our own 15 minds, then, how to generalise their contents and form our own 16 conclusions from them. It, therefore, never asks the question what 17 our religion is, whether we are Deists or Atheists, whether 18 Christians, Jews, or Buddhists. We are human beings; that is 19 sufficient. Every human being has the right and the power to seek 20 for religion. Every human being has the right to ask the reason, 21 why, and to have his question answered by himself, if he only takes 22 the trouble.

23 So far, then, we see that in the study of this Raja-Yoga no faith 24 or belief is necessary. Believe nothing until you find it out for 25 yourself; that is what it teaches us. Truth requires no prop to make 26 it stand. Do you mean to say that the facts of our awakened state 27 require any dreams or imaginings to prove them? Certainly not.
28 This study of Raja-Yoga takes a long time and constant practice. A 29 part of this practice is physical, but in the main it is mental. As we 30 proceed we shall find how intimately the mind is connected with the 31 body. If we believe that the mind is simply a finer part of the body, 32 and that mind acts upon the body, then it stands to reason that the 33 body must react upon the mind. If the body is sick, the mind 34 becomes sick also. If the body is healthy, the mind remains healthy 35 and strong. When one is angry, the mind becomes disturbed.
36 Similarly when the mind is disturbed, the body also becomes 37 disturbed. With the majority of mankind the mind is greatly under 38 the control of the body, their mind being very little developed. The 39 vast mass of humanity is very little removed from the animals. Not 40 only so, but in many instances, the power of control in them is little 41 higher than that of the lower animals. We have very little command 42 of our minds. Therefore to bring that command about, to get that 43 control over body and mind, we must take certain physical helps.
44 When the body is sufficiently controlled, we can attempt the 45 manipulation of the mind. By manipulating the mind, we shall be 46 able to bring it under our control, make it work as we like, and 47 compel it to concentrate its powers as we desire.

48 According to the Raja-Yogi, the external world is but the gross 49 form of the internal, or subtle. The finer is always the cause, the 50 grosser the effect. So the external world is the effect, the internal 51 the cause. In the same way external forces are simply the grosser 52 parts, of which the internal forces are the finer. The man who has

1 discovered and learned how to manipulate the internal forces will 2 get the whole of nature under his control. The Yogi proposes to 3 himself no less a task than to master the whole universe, to control 4 the whole of nature. He wants to arrive at the point where what we 5 call "nature's laws" will have no influence over him, where he will 6 be able to get beyond them all. He will be master of the whole of 7 nature, internal and external. The progress and civilisation of the 8 human race simply mean controlling this nature.

9 Different races take to different processes of controlling 10 nature. Just as in the same society some individuals want to control 11 the external nature, and others the internal, so, among races, some 12 want to control the external nature, and others the internal. Some 13 say that by controlling internal nature we control everything.
14 Others that by controlling external nature we control everything.
15 Carried to the extreme both are right, because in nature there is no 16 such division as internal or external. These are fictitious limitations 17 that never existed. The externalists and the internalists are 18 destined to meet at the same point, when both reach the extreme of 19 their knowledge. Just as a physicist, when he pushes his knowledge 20 to its limits, finds it melting away into metaphysics, so a 21 metaphysician will find that what he calls mind and matter are but 22 apparent distinctions, the reality being One.

23 The end and aim of all science is to find the unity, the One out 24 of which the manifold is being manufactured, that One existing as 25 many. Raja-Yoga proposes to start from the internal world, to study 26 internal nature, and through that, control the whole--both internal 27 and external. It is a very old attempt. India has been its special 28 stronghold, but it was also attempted by other nations. In Western 29 countries it was regarded as mysticism and people who wanted to 30 practise it were either burned or killed as witches and sorcerers. In 31 India, for various reasons, it fell into the hands of persons who 32 destroyed ninety per cent of the knowledge, and tried to make a 33 great secret of the remainder. In modern times many so-called 34 teachers have arisen in the West worse than those of India, because 35 the latter knew something, while these modern exponents know 36 nothing.

37 Anything that is secret and mysterious in these systems of 38 Yoga should be at once rejected. The best guide in life is strength.
39 In religion, as in all other matters, discard everything that weakens 40 you, have nothing to do with it. Mystery-mongering weakens the 41 human brain. It has well-nigh destroyed Yoga--one of the grandest 42 of sciences. From the time it was discovered, more than four 43 thousand years ago, Yoga was perfectly delineated, formulated, and 44 preached in India. It is a striking fact that the more modern the 45 commentator the greater the mistakes he makes, while the more 46 ancient the writer the more rational he is. Most of the modern 47 writers talk of all sorts of mystery. Thus Yoga fell into the hands of a 48 few persons who made it a secret, instead of letting the full blaze of 49 daylight and reason fall upon it. They did so that they might have 50 the powers to themselves.

51 In the first place, there is no mystery in what I teach. What 52 little I know I will tell you. So far as I can reason it out I will do so,

1 but as to what I do not know I will simply tell you what the books
2 say. It is wrong to believe blindly. You must exercise your own 3 reason and judgment; you must practise, and see whether these 4 things happen or not. Just as you would take up any other science, 5 exactly in the same manner you should take up this science for 6 study. There is neither mystery nor danger in it. So far as it is true, 7 it ought to be preached in the public streets, in broad daylight. Any 8 attempt to mystify these things is productive of great danger.

9 Before proceeding further, I will tell you a little of the 10 Sankhya philosophy, upon which the whole of Raja-Yoga is based.
11 According to the Sankhya philosophy, the genesis of perception is 12 as follows: the affections of external objects are carried by the 13 outer instruments to their respective brain centres or organs, the 14 organs carry the affections to the mind, the mind to the 15 determinative faculty, from this the Purusha (the soul) receives 16 them, when perception results. Next he gives the order back, as it 17 were, to the motor centres to do the needful. With the exception of 18 the Purusha all of these are material, but the mind is much finer 19 matter than the external instruments. That material of which the 20 mind is composed goes also to form the subtle matter called the 21 Tanmatras. These become gross and make the external matter. That 22 is the psychology of the Sankhya. So that between the intellect and 23 the grosser matter outside there is only a difference in degree. The 24 Purusha is the only thing which is immaterial. The mind is an 25 instrument, as it were, in the hands of the soul, through which the 26 soul catches external objects. The mind is constantly changing and 27 vacillating, and can, when perfected, either attach itself to several 28 organs, to one, or to none. For instance, if I hear the clock with 29 great attention, I will not, perhaps, see anything although my eyes 30 may be open, showing that the mind was not attached to the seeing 31 organ, while it was to the hearing organ. But the perfected mind 32 can be attached to all the organs simultaneously. It has the reflexive 33 power of looking back into its own depths. This reflexive power is 34 what the Yogi wants to attain; by concentrating the powers of the 35 mind, and turning them inward, he seeks to know what is 36 happening inside. There is in this no question of mere belief; it is 37 the analysis arrived at by certain philosophers. Modern 38 physiologists tell us that the eyes are not the organ of vision, but 39 that the organ is in one of the nerve centres of the brain, and so 40 with all the senses; they also tell us that these centres are formed 41 of the same material as the brain itself. The Sankhyas also tell us 42 the same thing. The former is a statement on the physical side, and 43 the latter on the psychological side; yet both are the same. Our field 44 of research lies beyond this. The Yogi proposed to attain that fine 45 state of perception in which he can perceive all the different mental 46 states. There must be mental perception of all of them. One can 47 perceive how the sensation is travelling, how the mind is receiving 48 it, how it is going to the determinative faculty, and how this gives it 49 to the Purusha. As each science requires certain preparations and 50 has its own method, which must be followed before it could be 51 understood, even so in Raja-Yoga.

52 Certain regulations as to food are necessary; we must use

1 that food which brings us the purest mind. If you go into a 2 menagerie, you will find this demonstrated at once. You see the 3 elephants, huge animals, but calm and gentle; and if you go towards 4 the cages of the lions and tigers, you find them restless, showing 5 how much difference has been made by food. All the forces that are 6 working in this body have been produced out of food; we see that 7 every day. If you begin to fast, first your body will get weak, the 8 physical forces will suffer; then, after a few days, the mental forces 9 will suffer also. First, memory will fail. Then comes a point, when 10 you are not able to think, much less to pursue any course of 11 reasoning. We have, therefore, to take care what sort of food we eat 12 at the beginning, and when we have got strength enough, when our 13 practice is well advanced, we need not be so careful in this respect.
14 While the plant is growing it must be hedged round, lest it be 15 injured; but when it becomes a tree, the hedges are taken away. It 16 is strong enough to withstand all assaults.

17 A Yogi must avoid the two extremes of luxury and austerity.
18 He must not fast, nor torture his flesh. He who does so, says the 19 Gita, cannot be a Yogi: He who fasts, he who keeps awake, he who 20 sleeps much, he who works too much, he who does no work, none 21 of these can be a Yogi (Gita, VI, 16).

THE FIRST STEPS

Raja-Yoga is divided into eight steps. The first is Yama--non-killing, truthfulness, non-stealing, continence, and non-receiving of any gifts. Next is Niyama--cleanliness, contentment, austerity, study, and self-surrender to God. Then comes Asana, or posture; Pranayama, or control of Prana; Pratyahara, or restraint of the senses from their objects; Dharana, or fixing the mind on a spot; Dhyana, or meditation; and Samadhi, or superconsciousness. The Yama and Niyama, as we see, are moral trainings; without these as the basis no practice of Yoga will succeed. As these two become established, the Yogi will begin to realise the fruits of his practice; without these it will never bear fruit. A Yogi must not think of injuring anyone, by thought, word, or deed. Mercy shall not be for men alone, but shall go beyond, and embrace the whole world.

The next step is Asana, posture. A series of exercises, physical and mental, is to be gone through every day, until certain higher states are reached. Therefore it is quite necessary that we should find a posture in which we can remain long. That posture which is the easiest for one should be the one chosen. For thinking, a certain posture may be very easy for one man, while to another it may be very difficult. We will find later on that during the study of these psychological matters a good deal of activity goes on in the body. Nerve currents will have to be displaced and given a new channel. New sorts of vibrations will begin, the whole constitution will be remodelled, as it were. But the main part of the activity will lie along the spinal column, so that the one thing necessary for the posture is to hold the spinal column free, sitting erect, holding the three parts--the chest, neck, and head--in a straight line. Let the whole weight of the body be supported by the ribs, and then you have an easy natural posture, with the spine straight. You will easily see that you cannot think very high thoughts with the chest in. This portion of the Yoga is a little similar to the Hatha-Yoga which deals entirely with the physical body, its aim being to make the physical body very strong. We have nothing to do with it here, because its practices are very difficult, and cannot be learned in a day, and, after all, do not lead to much spiritual growth. Many of these practices you will find in Delsarte and other teachers, such as placing the body in different postures, but the object in these is physical, not psychological. There is not one muscle in the body over which a man cannot establish a perfect control. The heart can be made to stop or go on at his bidding, and each part of the organism can be similarly controlled.

The result of this branch of Yoga is to make men live long; health is the chief idea, the one goal of the Hatha-Yogi. He is determined not to fall sick, and he never does. He lives long; a hundred years is nothing to him; he is quite young and fresh when he is 150, without one hair turned grey. But that is all. A banyan tree lives sometimes 5000 years, but it is a banyan tree and nothing more. So, if a man lives long, he is only a healthy animal. One or two ordinary lessons of the Hatha-Yogis are very useful. For

1 instance, some of you will find it a good thing for headaches to 2 drink cold water through the nose as soon as you get up in the 3 morning; the whole day your brain will be nice and cool, and you 4 will never catch cold. It is very easy to do; put your nose into the 5 water, draw it up through the nostrils and make a pump action in 6 the throat.

7 After one has learned to have a firm erect seat, one has to 8 perform, according to certain schools, a practice called the 9 purifying of the nerves. This part has been rejected by some as not 10 belonging to Raja- Yoga, but as so great an authority as the 11 commentator Shankaracharya advises it, I think fit that it should be 12 mentioned, and I will quote his own directions from his commentary 13 on the Shvethashvatara Upanishad: "The mind whose dross has 14 been cleared away by Pranayama, becomes fixed in Brahman; 15 therefore Pranayama is declared. First the nerves are to be 16 purified, then comes the power to practise Pranayama. Stopping 17 the right nostril with the thumb, through the left nostril fill in air, 18 according to capacity; then, without any interval, throw the air out 19 through the right nostril, closing the left one. Again inhaling 20 through the right nostril eject through the left, according to 21 capacity; practising this three or five times at four hours of the day, 22 before dawn, during midday, in the evening, and at midnight, in 23 fifteen days or a month purity of the nerves is attained; then begins
24 Pranayama."

25 Practice is absolutely necessary. You may sit down and listen 26 to me by the hour every day, but if you do not practise, you will not 27 get one step further. It all depends on practice. We never 28 understand these things until we experience them. We will have to 29 see and feel them for ourselves. Simply listening to explanations 30 and theories will not do. There are several obstructions to practice.
31 The first obstruction is an unhealthy body: if the body is not in a fit 32 state, the practice will be obstructed. Therefore we have to keep 33 the body in good health; we have to take care of what we eat and 34 drink, and what we do. Always use a mental effort, what is usually 35 called "Christian Science," to keep the body strong. That is all-36 nothing further of the body. We must not forget that health is only a 37 means to an end. If health were the end, we would be like animals; 38 animals rarely become unhealthy.

39 The second obstruction is doubt; we always feel doubtful 40 about things we do not see. Man cannot live upon words, however 41 he may try. So, doubt comes to us as to whether there is any truth 42 in these things or not; even the best of us will doubt sometimes.
43 With practice, within a few days, a little glimpse will come, enough 44 to give one encouragement and hope. As a certain commentator on 45 Yoga philosophy says, "When one proof is obtained, however little 46 that may be, it will give us faith in the whole teaching of Yoga." For 47 instance, after the first few months of practice, you will begin to 48 find you can read another's thoughts; they will come to you in 49 picture form. Perhaps you will hear something happening at a long 50 distance, when you concentrate your mind with a wish to hear.
51 These glimpses will come, by little bits at first, but enough to give 52 you faith, and strength, and hope. For instance, if you concentrate

1 your thoughts on the tip of your nose, in a few days you will begin 2 to smell most beautiful fragrance, which will be enough to show you 3 that there are certain mental perceptions that can be made obvious 4 without the contact of physical objects. But we must always 5 remember that these are only the means; the aim, the end, the goal, 6 of all this training is liberation of the soul. Absolute control of 7 nature, and nothing short of it, must be the goal. We must be the 8 masters, and not the slaves of nature; neither body nor mind must 9 be our master, nor must we forget that the body is mine, and not I 10 the body's.

11 A god and a demon went to learn about the Self from a great 12 sage. They studied with him for a long time. At last the sage told 13 them, "You yourselves are the Being you are seeking." Both of them 14 thought that their bodies were the Self. They went back to their 15 people quite satisfied and said, "We have learned everything that 16 was to be learned; eat, drink, and be merry; we are the Self; there 17 is nothing beyond us." The nature of the demon was ignorant, 18 clouded; so he never inquired any further, but was perfectly 19 contented with the idea that he was God, that by the Self was 20 meant the body. The god had a purer nature. He at first committed 21 the mistake of thinking: I, this body, am Brahman: so keep it strong 22 and in health, and well dressed, and give it all sorts of enjoyments.
23 But, in a few days, he found out that that could not be the meaning 24 of the sage, their master; there must be something higher. So he 25 came back and said, "Sir, did you teach me that this body was the 26 Self? If so, I see all bodies die; the Self cannot die." The sage said, 27 "Find it out; thou art That." Then the god thought that the vital 28 forces which work the body were what the sage meant. But, after a 29 time, he found that if he ate, these vital forces remained strong, 30 but, if he starved, they became weak. The god then went back to 31 the sage and said, "Sir, do you mean that the vital forces are the 32 Self?" The sage said, "Find out for yourself; thou art That." The god 33 returned home once more, thinking that it was the mind, perhaps, 34 that was the Self. But in a short while he saw that thoughts were so 35 various, now good, again bad; the mind was too changeable to be 36 the Self. He went back to the sage and said, "Sir, I do not think that 37 the mind is the Self; did you mean that?" "No," replied the sage, 38 "thou art That; find out for yourself." The god went home, and at 39 last found that he was the Self, beyond all thought, one without 40 birth or death, whom the sword cannot pierce or the fire burn, 41 whom the air cannot dry or the water melt, the beginningless and 42 endless, the immovable, the intangible, the omniscient, the 43 omnipotent Being; that It was neither the body nor the mind, but 44 beyond them all. So he was satisfied; but the poor demon did not 45 get the truth, owing to his fondness for the body.

46 This world has a good many of these demonic natures, but 47 there are some gods too. If one proposes to teach any science to 48 increase the power of sense-enjoyment, one finds multitudes ready 49 for it. If one undertakes to show the supreme goal, one finds few to 50 listen to him. Very few have the power to grasp the higher, fewer 51 still the patience to attain to it. But there are a few also who know 52 that even if the body can be made to live for a thousand years, the

1 result in the end will be the same. When the forces that hold it 2 together go away, the body must fall. No man was ever born who 3 could stop his body one moment from changing. Body is the name 4 of a series of changes. "As in a river the masses of water are 5 changing before you every moment, and new masses are coming, 6 yet taking similar form, so is it with this body." Yet the body must be 7 kept strong and healthy. It is the best instrument we have.

8 This human body is the greatest body in the universe, and a 9 human being the greatest being. Man is higher than all animals, 10 than all angels; none is greater than man. Even the Devas (gods) 11 will have to come down again and attain to salvation through a 12 human body. Man alone attains to perfection, not even the Devas.
13 According to the Jews and Mohammedans, God created man after 14 creating the angels and everything else, and after creating man He 15 asked the angels to come and salute him, and all did so except Iblis; 16 so God cursed him and he became Satan. Behind this allegory is the 17 great truth that this human birth is the greatest birth we can have.
18 The lower creation, the animal, is dull, and manufactured mostly 19 out of Tamas. Animals cannot have any high thoughts; nor can the 20 angels, or Devas, attain to direct freedom without human birth. In 21 human society, in the same way, too much wealth or too much 22 poverty is a great impediment to the higher development of the 23 soul. It is from the middle classes that the great ones of the world 24 come. Here the forces are very equally adjusted and balanced.

25 Returning to our subject, we come next to Pranayama, 26 controlling the breathing. What has that to do with concentrating 27 the powers of the mind? Breath is like the fly-wheel of this machine, 28 the body. In a big engine you find the fly-wheel first moving, and 29 that motion is conveyed to finer and finer machinery until the most 30 delicate and finest mechanism in the machine is in motion. The 31 breath is that fly-wheel, supplying and regulating the motive power 32 to everything in this body.

33 There was once a minister to a great king. He fell into 34 disgrace. The king, as a punishment, ordered him to be shut up in 35 the top of a very high tower. This was done, and the minister was 36 left there to perish. He had a faithful wife, however, who came to 37 the tower at night and called to her husband at the top to know 38 what she could do to help him. He told her to return to the tower 39 the following night and bring with her a long rope, some stout 40 twine, pack thread, silken thread, a beetle, and a little honey.
41 Wondering much, the good wife obeyed her husband, and brought 42 him the desired articles. The husband directed her to attach the 43 silken thread firmly to the beetle, then to smear its horns with a 44 drop of honey, and to set it free on the wall of the tower, with its 45 head pointing upwards. She obeyed all these instructions, and the 46 beetle started on its long journey. Smelling the honey ahead it 47 slowly crept onwards, in the hope of reaching the honey, until at 48 last it reached to top of the tower, when the minister grasped the 49 beetle, and got possession of the silken thread. He told his wife to 50 tie the other end to the pack thread, and after he had drawn up the 51 pack thread, he repeated the process with the stout twine, and 52 lastly with the rope. Then the rest was easy. The minister

1 descended from the tower by means of the rope, and made his 2 escape. In this body of ours the breath motion is the "silken thread"; 3 by laying hold of and learning to control it we grasp the pack thread 4 of the nerve currents, and from these the stout twine of our 5 thoughts, and lastly the rope of Prana, controlling which we reach 6 freedom.

7 We do not know anything about our own bodies; we cannot 8 know. At best we can take a dead body, and cut it in pieces, and 9 there are some who can take a live animal and cut it in pieces in 10 order to see what is inside the body. Still, that has nothing to do 11 with our own bodies. We know very little about them. Why do we 12 not? Because our attention is not discriminating enough to catch 13 the very fine movements that are going on within. We can know of 14 them only when the mind becomes more subtle and enters, as it 15 were, deeper into the body. To get the subtle perception we have to 16 begin with the grosser perceptions. We have to get hold of that 17 which is setting the whole engine in motion. That is the Prana, the 18 most obvious manifestation of which is the breath. Then, along with 19 the breath, we shall slowly enter the body, which will enable us to 20 find out about the subtle forces, the nerve currents that are moving 21 all over the body. As soon as we perceive and learn to feel them, we 22 shall begin to get control over them, and over the body. The mind is 23 also set in motion by these different nerve currents, so at last we 24 shall reach the state of perfect control over the body and the mind, 25 making both our servants. Knowledge is power. We have to get this 26 power. So we must begin at the beginning, with Pranayama, 27 restraining the Prana. This Pranayama is a long subject, and will 28 take several lessons to illustrate it thoroughly. We shall take it part 29 by part.

30 We shall gradually see the reasons for each exercise and what 31 forces in the body are set in motion. All these things will come to 32 us, but it requires constant practice, and the proof will come by 33 practice. No amount of reasoning which I can give you will be proof 34 to you, until you have demonstrated it for yourselves. As soon as 35 you begin to feel these currents in motion all over you, doubts will 36 vanish, but it requires hard practice every day. You must practise at 37 least twice every day, and the best times are towards the morning 38 and the evening. When night passes into day, and day into night, a 39 state of relative calmness ensues. The early morning and the early 40 evening are the two periods of calmness. Your body will have a like 41 tendency to become calm at those times. We should take advantage 42 of that natural condition and begin then to practise. Make it a rule 43 not to eat until you have practised; if you do this, the sheer force of 44 hunger will break your laziness. In India they teach children never 45 to eat until they have practised or worshipped, and it becomes 46 natural to them after a time; a boy will not feel hungry until he has 47 bathed and practised.

48 Those of you who can afford it will do better to have a room 49 for this practice alone. Do not sleep in that room, it must be kept 50 holy. You must not enter the room until you have bathed, and are 51 perfectly clean in body and mind. Place flowers in that room always; 52 they are the best surroundings for a Yogi; also pictures that are

1 pleasing. Burn incense morning and evening. Have no quarrelling, 2 nor anger, nor unholy thought in that room. Only allow those 3 persons to enter it who are of the same thought as you. Then 4 gradually there will be an atmosphere of holiness in the room, so 5 that when you are miserable, sorrowful, doubtful, or your mind is 6 disturbed, the very fact of entering that room will make you calm.
7 This was the idea of the temple and the church, and in some 8 temples and churches you will find it even now, but in the majority 9 of them the very idea has been lost. The idea is that by keeping holy 10 vibrations there the place becomes and remains illumined. Those 11 who cannot afford to have a room set apart can practise anywhere 12 they like. Sit in a straight posture, and the first thing to do is to 13 send a current of holy thought to all creation. Mentally repeat, "Let 14 all beings be happy; let all beings be peaceful; let all beings be 15 blissful." So do to the east, south, north and west. The more you do 16 that the better you will feel yourself. You will find at last that the 17 easiest way to make ourselves healthy is to see that others are 18 healthy, and the easiest way to make ourselves happy is to see that 19 others are happy. After doing that, those who believe in God should 20 pray--not for money, not for health, nor for heaven; pray for 21 knowledge and light; every other prayer is selfish. Then the next 22 thing to do is to think of your own body, and see that it is strong and 23 healthy; it is the best instrument you have. Think of it as being as 24 strong as adamant, and that with the help of this body you will 25 cross the ocean of life. Freedom is never to be reached by the 26 weak. Throw away all weakness. Tell your body that it is strong, tell 27 your mind that it is strong, and have unbounded faith and hope in 28 yourself.

PRANA

Pranayama is not, as many think, something about breath; breath indeed has very little to do with it, if anything. Breathing is only one of the many exercises through which we get to the real Pranayama. Pranayama means the control of Prana. According to the philosophers of India, the whole universe is composed of two materials, one of which they call Akasha. It is the omnipresent, all-penetrating existence. Everything that has form, everything that is the result of combination, is evolved out of this Akasha. It is the Akasha that becomes the air, that becomes the liquids, that becomes the solids; it is the Akasha that becomes the sun, the earth, the moon, the stars, the comets; it is the Akasha that becomes the human body, the animal body, the plants, every form that we see, everything that can be sensed, everything that exists. It cannot be perceived; it is so subtle that it is beyond all ordinary perception; it can only be seen when it has become gross, has taken form. At the beginning of creation there is only this Akasha. At the end of the cycle the solids, the liquids, and the gases all melt into the Akasha again, and the next creation similarly proceeds out of this Akasha.

By what power is this Akasha manufactured into this universe? By the power of Prana. Just as Akasha is the infinite, omnipresent material of this universe, so is this Prana the infinite, omnipresent manifesting power of this universe. At the beginning and at the end of a cycle everything becomes Akasha, and all the forces that are in the universe resolve back into the Prana; in the next cycle, out of this Prana is evolved everything that we call energy, everything that we call force. It is the Prana that is manifesting as motion; it is the Prana that is manifesting as gravitation, as magnetism. It is the Prana that is manifesting as the actions of the body, as the nerve currents, as thought force. From thought down to the lowest force, everything is but the manifestation of Prana. The sum total of all forces in the universe, mental or physical, when resolved back to their original state, is called Prana. "When there was neither aught nor naught, when darkness was covering darkness, what existed then? That Akasha existed without motion." The physical motion of the Prana was stopped, but it existed all the same.

At the end of a cycle the energies now displayed in the universe quiet down and become potential. At the beginning of the next cycle they start up, strike upon the Akasha, and out of the Akasha evolve these various forms, and as the Akasha changes, this Prana changes also into all these manifestations of energy. The knowledge and control of this Prana is really what is meant by Pranayama.

This opens to us the door to almost unlimited power. Suppose, for instance, a man understood the Prana perfectly, and could control it, what power on earth would not be his? He would be able to move the sun and stars out of their places, to control everything in the universe, from the atoms to the biggest suns, because he would control the Prana. This is the end and aim of Pranayama.

1 When the Yogi becomes perfect, there will be nothing in nature not 2 under his control. If he orders the gods or the souls of the departed 3 to come, they will come at his bidding. All the forces of nature will 4 obey him as slaves. When the ignorant see these powers of the Yogi, 5 they call them the miracles. One peculiarity of the Hindu mind is 6 that it always inquires for the last possible generalisation, leaving 7 the details to be worked out afterwards. The question is raised in 8 the Vedas, "What is that, knowing which, we shall know 9 everything?" Thus, all books, and all philosophies that have been 10 written, have been only to prove that by knowing which everything 11 is known. If a man wants to know this universe bit by bit he must 12 know every individual grain of sand, which means infinite time; he 13 cannot know all of them. Then how can knowledge be? How is it 14 possible for a man to be all-knowing through particulars? The Yogis 15 say that behind this particular manifestation there is a 16 generalisation. Behind all particular ideas stands a generalised, an 17 abstract principle; grasp it, and you have grasped everything. Just 18 as this whole universe has been generalised in the Vedas into that 19 One Absolute Existence, and he who has grasped that Existence has 20 grasped the whole universe, so all forces have been generalised 21 into this Prana, and he who has grasped the Prana has grasped all 22 the forces of the universe, mental or physical. He who has 23 controlled the Prana has controlled his own mind, and all the minds 24 that exist. He who has controlled the Prana has controlled his body, 25 and all the bodies that exist, because the Prana is the generalised 26 manifestation of force.

27 How to control the Prana is the one idea of Pranayama. All 28 the trainings and exercises in this regard are for that one end. Each 29 man must begin where he stands, must learn how to control the 30 things that are nearest to him. This body is very near to us, nearer 31 than anything in the external universe, and this mind is the nearest 32 of all. The Prana which is working this mind and body is the nearest 33 to us of all the Prana in this universe. This little wave of the Prana 34 which represents our own energies, mental and physical, is the 35 nearest to us of all the waves of the infinite ocean of Prana. If we 36 can succeed in controlling that little wave, then alone we can hope 37 to control the whole of Prana. The Yogi who has done this gains 38 perfection; no longer is he under any power. He becomes almost 39 almighty, almost all-knowing. We see sects in every country who 40 have attempted this control of Prana. In this country there are 41 Mind-healers, Faith-healers, Spiritualists, Christian Scientists, 42 Hypnotists, etc., and if we examine these different bodies, we shall 43 find at the back of each this control of the Prana, whether they 44 know it or not. If you boil all their theories down, the residuum will 45 be that. It is the one and the same force they are manipulating, only 46 unknowingly. They have stumbled on the discovery of a force and 47 are using it unconsciously without knowing its nature, but it is the 48 same as the Yogi uses, and which comes from Prana.

49 The Prana is the vital force in every being. Thought is the 50 finest and highest action of Prana. Thought, again, as we see, is not 51 all. There is also what we call instinct or unconscious thought, the 52 lowest plane of action. If a mosquito stings us, our hand will strike

1 it automatically, instinctively. This is one expression of thought. All 2 reflex actions of the body belong to this plane of thought. There is 3 again the other plane of thought, the conscious. I reason, I judge, I 4 think, I see the pros and cons of certain things, yet that is not all.
5 We know that reason is limited. Reason can go only to a certain 6 extent, beyond that it cannot reach. The circle within which it runs 7 is very very limited indeed. Yet at the same time, we find facts rush 8 into this circle. Like the coming of comets certain things come into 9 this circle; it is certain they come from outside the limit, although 10 our reason cannot go beyond. The causes of the phenomena 11 intruding themselves in this small limit are outside of this limit. The 12 mind can exist on a still higher plane, the superconscious. When the 13 mind has attained to that state, which is called Samadhi--perfect 14 concentration, superconsciousness--it goes beyond the limits of 15 reason, and comes face to face with facts which no instinct or 16 reason can ever know. All manipulations of the subtle forces of the 17 body, the different manifestations of Prana, if trained, give a push to 18 the mind, help it to go up higher, and become superconscious, from 19 where it acts.

20 In this universe there is one continuous substance on every 21 plane of existence. Physically this universe is one: there is no 22 difference between the sun and you. The scientist will tell you it is 23 only a fiction to say the contrary. There is no real difference 24 between the table and me; the table is one point in the mass of 25 matter, and I another point. Each form represents, as it were, one 26 whirlpool in the infinite ocean of matter, of which not one is 27 constant. Just as in a rushing stream there may be millions of 28 whirlpools, the water in each of which is different every moment, 29 turning round and round for a few seconds, and then passing out, 30 replaced by a fresh quantity, so the whole universe is one constantly 31 changing mass of matter, in which all forms of existence are so 32 many whirlpools. A mass of matter enters into one whirlpool, say a 33 human body, stays there for a period, becomes changed, and goes 34 out into another, say an animal body this time, from which again 35 after a few years, it enters into another whirlpool, called a lump of 36 mineral. It is a constant change. Not one body is constant. There is 37 no such thing as my body, or your body, except in words. Of the one 38 huge mass of matter, one point is called a moon, another a sun, 39 another a man, another the earth, another a plant, another a 40 mineral. Not one is constant, but everything is changing, matter 41 eternally concreting and disintegrating. So it is with the mind.
42 Matter is represented by the ether; when the action of Prana is 43 most subtle, this very ether, in the finer state of vibration, will 44 represent the mind, and there it will be still one unbroken mass. If 45 you can simply get to that subtle vibration, you will see and feel 46 that the whole universe is composed of subtle vibrations.
47 Sometimes certain drugs have the power to take us, while as yet in 48 the senses, to that condition. Many of you may remember the 49 celebrated experiment of Sir Humphrey Davy, when the laughing 50 gas overpowered him--how, during the lecture, he remained 51 motionless, stupefied and, after that, he said that the whole 52 universe was made up of ideas. For the time being, as it were, the 53 gross vibrations had ceased, and only the subtle vibrations which 1 he called ideas, were present to him. He could only see the subtle 2 vibrations round him; everything had become thought; the whole 3 universe was an ocean of thought, he and everyone else had 4 become little thought whirlpools.

5 Thus, even in the universe of thought we find unity, and at 6 last, when we get to the Self, we know that that Self can only be 7 One. Beyond the vibrations of matter in its gross and subtle
8 aspects, beyond motion there is but One. Even in manifested motion 9 there is only unity. These facts can no more be denied. Modern 10 physics also has demonstrated that the sum total of the energies in 11 the universe is the same throughout. It has also been proved that 12 this sum total of energy exists in two forms. It becomes potential, 13 toned down, and calmed, and next it comes out manifested as all 14 these various forces; again it goes back to the quiet state, and again 15 it manifests. Thus it goes on evolving and involving through 16 eternity. The control of this Prana, as before stated, is what is called 17 Pranayama.

18 The most obvious manifestation of this Prana in the human 19 body is the motion of the lungs. If that stops, as a rule all the other 20 manifestations of force in the body will immediately stop. But there 21 are persons who can train themselves in such a manner that the 22 body will live on, even when this motion has stopped. There are 23 some persons who can bury themselves for days, and yet live 24 without breathing. To reach the subtle we must take the help of the 25 grosser, and so, slowly travel towards the most subtle until we gain 26 our point. Pranayama really means controlling this motion of the 27 lungs, and this motion is associated with the breath. Not that 28 breath is producing it; on the contrary it is producing breath. This 29 motion draws in the air by pump action. The Prana is moving the 30 lungs, the movement of the lungs draws in the air. So Pranayama is 31 not breathing, but controlling that muscular power which moves the 32 lungs. That muscular power which goes out through the nerves to 33 the muscles and from them to the lungs, making them move in a 34 certain manner, is the Prana, which we have to control in the 35 practice of Pranayama. When the Prana has become controlled, 36 then we shall immediately find that all the other actions of the 37 Prana in the body will slowly come under control. I myself have 38 seen men who have controlled almost every muscle of the body; and 39 why not? If I have control over certain muscles, why not over every 40 muscle and nerve of the body? What impossibility is there? At 41 present the control is lost, and the motion has become automatic.
42 We cannot move our ears at will, but we know that animals can. We 43 have not that power because we do not exercise it. This is what is 44 called atavism.

45 Again, we know that motion which has become latent can be 46 brought back to manifestation. By hard work and practice certain 47 motions of the body which are most dormant can be brought back 48 under perfect control. Reasoning thus we find there is no 49 impossibility, but, on the other hand, every probability that each 50 part of the body can be brought under perfect control. This the Yogi 51 does through Pranayama. Perhaps some of you have read that in 52 Pranayama, when drawing in the breath, you must fill your whole

1 body with Prana. In the English translations Prana is given as 2 breath, and you are inclined to ask how that is to be done. The fault 3 is with the translator. Every part of the body can be filled with 4 Prana, this vital force, and when you are able to do that, you can 5 control the whole body. All the sickness and misery felt in the body 6 will be perfectly controlled; not only so, you will be able to control 7 another's body. Everything is infectious in this world, good or bad.
8 If your body be in a certain state of tension, it will have a tendency 9 to produce the same tension in others. If you are strong and 10 healthy, those that live near you will also have the tendency to 11 become strong and healthy, but if you are sick and weak, those 12 around you will have the tendency to become the same. In the case 13 of one man trying to heal another, the first idea is simply 14 transferring his own health to the other. This is the primitive sort of 15 healing. Consciously or unconsciously, health can be transmitted. A 16 very strong man, living with a weak man, will make him a little 17 stronger, whether he knows it or not. When consciously done, it 18 becomes quicker and better in its action. Next come those cases in 19 which a man may not be very healthy himself, yet we know that he 20 can bring health to another. The first man, in such a case, has a 21 little more control over the Prana, and can rouse, for the time 22 being, his Prana, as it were, to a certain state of vibration, and 23 transmit it to another person.

24 There have been cases where this process has been carried 25 on at a distance, but in reality there is no distance in the sense of a 26 break. Where is the distance that has a break? Is there any break 27 between you and the sun? It is a continuous mass of matter, the sun 28 being one part, and you another. Is there a break between one part 29 of a river and another? Then why cannot any force travel? There is 30 no reason against it. Cases of healing from a distance are perfectly 31 true. The Prana can be transmitted to a very great distance; but to 32 one genuine case, there are hundreds of frauds. This process of 33 healing is not so easy as it is thought to be. In the most ordinary 34 cases of such healing you will find that the healers simply take 35 advantage of the naturally healthy state of the human body. An 36 allopath comes and treats cholera patients, and gives them his 37 medicines. The homoeopath comes and gives his medicines, and 38 cures perhaps more than the allopath does, because the 39 homoeopath does not disturb his patients, but allows nature to deal 40 with them. The Faith-healer cures more still, because he brings the 41 strength of his mind to bear, and rouses, through faith, the dormant 42 Prana of the patient.

43 There is a mistake constantly made by Faith-healers: they 44 think that faith directly heals a man. But faith alone does not cover 45 all the ground. There are diseases where the worst symptoms are 46 that the patient never thinks that he has that disease. That 47 tremendous faith of the patient is itself one symptom of the disease, 48 and usually indicates that he will die quickly. In such cases the 49 principle that faith cures does not apply. If it were faith alone that 50 cured, these patients also would be cured. It is by the Prana that 51 real curing comes. The pure man, who has controlled the Prana, 52 has the power of bringing it into a certain state of vibration, which 1 can be conveyed to others, arousing in them a similar vibration. You 2 see that in everyday actions. I am talking to you. What am I trying 3 to do? I am, so to say, bringing my mind to a certain state of 4 vibration, and the more I succeed in bringing it to that state, the 5 more you will be affected by what I say. All of you know that the day

6 I am more enthusiastic, the more you enjoy the lecture; and when I 7 am less enthusiastic, you feel lack of interest.

8 The gigantic will-powers of the world, the world-movers, can 9 bring their Prana into a high state of vibration, and it is so great 10 and powerful that it catches others in a moment, and thousands are 11 drawn towards them, and half the world think as they do. Great 12 prophets of the world had the most wonderful control of the Prana, 13 which gave them tremendous will-power; they had brought their 14 Prana to the highest state of motion, and this is what gave them 15 power to sway the world. All manifestations of power arise from 16 this control. Men may not know the secret, but this is the one
17 explanation. Sometimes in your own body the supply of Prana 18 gravitates more or less to one part; the balance is disturbed, and 19 when the balance of Prana is disturbed, what we call disease is 20 produced.

21 To take away the superfluous Prana, or to supply the Prana 22 that is wanting, will be curing the disease. That again is 23 Pranayama--to learn when there is more or less Prana in one part of 24 the body than there should be. The feelings will become so subtle 25 that the mind will feel that there is less Prana in the toe or the 26 finger than there should be, and will possess the power to supply it.
27 These are among the various functions of Pranayama. They have to 28 be learned slowly and gradually, and as you see, the whole scope of 29 Raja-Yoga is really to teach the control and direction in different 30 planes of the Prana. When a man has concentrated his energies, he 31 masters the Prana that is in his body. When a man is meditating, he 32 is also concentrating the Prana.

33 In an ocean there are huge waves, like mountains, then 34 smaller waves, and still smaller, down to little bubbles, but back of 35 all these is the infinite ocean. The bubble is connected with the 36 infinite ocean at one end, and the huge wave at the other end. So, 37 one may be a gigantic man, and another a little bubble, but each is 38 connected with that infinite ocean of energy, which is the common 39 birthright of every animal that exists. Wherever there is life, the 40 storehouse of infinite energy is behind it. Starting as some fungus, 41 some very minute, microscopic bubble, and all the time drawing 42 from that infinite storehouse of energy, a form is changed slowly 43 and steadily until in course of time it becomes a plant, then an 44 animal, then man, ultimately God. This is attained through millions 45 of aeons, but what is time? An increase of speed, an increase of 46 struggle, is able to bridge the gulf of time. That which naturally 47 takes a long time to accomplish can be shortened by the intensity of 48 the action, says the Yogi. A man may go on slowly drawing in this 49 energy from the infinite mass that exists in the universe, and,
50 perhaps, he will require a hundred thousand years to become a 51 Deva, and then, perhaps, five hundred thousand years to become 52 still higher, and, perhaps, five millions of years to become perfect.

1 Given rapid growth, the time will be lessened. Why is it not 2 possible, with sufficient effort, to reach this very perfection in six 3 months or six years? There is no limit. Reason shows that. If an 4 engine, with a certain amount of coal, runs two miles an hour, it will 5 run the distance in less time with a greater supply of coal. Similarly, 6 why shall not the soul, by intensifying its action, attain perfection in 7 this very life? All beings will at last attain to that goal, we know. But 8 who cares to wait all these millions of aeons? Why not reach it 9 immediately, in this body even, in this human form? Why shall I not 10 get that infinite knowledge, infinite power, now?

11 The ideal of the Yogi, the whole science of Yoga, is directed to 12 the end of teaching men how, by intensifying the power of 13 assimilation, to shorten the time for reaching perfection, instead of 14 slowly advancing from point to point and waiting until the whole 15 human race has become perfect. All the great prophets, saints, and 16 seers of the world--what did they do? In one span of life they lived 17 the whole life of humanity, traversed the whole length of time that it 18 takes ordinary humanity to come to perfection. In one life they 19 perfect themselves; they have no thought for anything else, never 20 live a moment for any other idea, and thus the way is shortened for 21 them. This is what is meant by concentration, intensifying the 22 power of assimilation, thus shortening the time. Raja-Yoga is the 23 science which teaches us how to gain the power of concentration.

24 What has Pranayama to do with spiritualism? Spiritualism is 25 also a manifestation of Pranayama. If it be true that the departed 26 spirits exist, only we cannot see them, it is quite probable that there 27 may be hundreds and millions of them about us we can neither see, 28 feel, nor touch. We may be continually passing and repassing 29 through their bodies, and they do not see or feel us. It is a circle 30 within a circle, universe within universe. We have five senses, and 31 we represent Prana in a certain state of vibration. All beings in the 32 same state of vibration will see one another, but if there are beings 33 who represent Prana in a higher state of vibration, they will not be 34 seen. We may increase the intensity of a light until we cannot see it 35 at all, but there may be beings with eyes so powerful that they can 36 see such light. Again, if its vibrations are very low, we do not see a 37 light, but there are animals that may see it, as cats and owls. Our 38 range of vision is only one plane of the vibrations of this Prana.
39 Take this atmosphere, for instance; it is piled up layer on layer, but 40 the layers nearer to the earth are denser than those above, and as 41 you go higher the atmosphere become finer and finer. Or take the 42 case of the ocean; as you go deeper and deeper the pressure of the 43 water increases, and animals which live at the bottom of the sea 44 can never come up, or they will be broken into pieces.

45 Think of the universe as an ocean of ether, consisting of layer 46 after layer of varying degrees of vibration under the action of 47 Prana; away from the centre the vibrations are less, nearer to it 48 they become quicker and quicker; one order of vibration makes one 49 plane. Then suppose these ranges of vibrations are cut into planes, 50 so many millions of miles one set of vibration, and then so many 51 millions of miles another still higher set of vibration, and so on. It is, 52 therefore, probable, that those who live on the plane of a certain

1 state of vibration will have the power of recognising one another, 2 but will not recognise those above them. Yet, just as by the 3 telescope and the microscope we can increase the scope of our 4 vision, similarly we can by Yoga bring ourselves to the state of 5 vibration of another plane, and thus enable ourselves to see what is 6 going on there. Suppose this room is full of beings whom we do not 7 see. They represent Prana in a certain state of vibration while we 8 represent another. Suppose they represent a quick one, and we the 9 opposite.

10 Prana is the material of which they are composed, as well as 11 we. All are parts of the same ocean of Prana, they differ only in 12 their rate of vibration. If I can bring myself to the quick vibration, 13 this plane will immediately change for me: I shall not see you any 14 more; you vanish and they appear. Some of you, perhaps, know this 15 to be true. All this bringing of the mind into a higher state of 16 vibration is included in one word in Yoga--Samadhi. All these states 17 of higher vibration, superconscious vibrations of the mind, are 18 grouped in that one word, Samadhi, and the lower states of 19 Samadhi give us visions of these beings. The highest grade of 20 Samadhi is when we see the real thing, when we see the material 21 out of which the whole of these grades of beings are composed, and 22 that one lump of clay being known, we know all the clay in the 23 universe.

24 Thus we see that Pranayama includes all that is true of 25 spiritualism even. Similarly, you will find that wherever any sect or 26 body of people is trying to search out anything occult and mystical, 27 or hidden, what they are doing is really this Yoga, this attempt to 28 control the Prana. You will find that wherever there is any 29 extraordinary display of power, it is the manifestation of this Prana.
30 Even the physical sciences can be included in Pranayama. What 31 moves the steam engine? Prana, acting through the steam. What 32 are all these phenomena of electricity and so forth but Prana? What 33 is physical science? The science of Pranayama, by external means.
34 Prana, manifesting itself as mental power, can only be controlled by 35 mental means. That part of Pranayama which attempts to control 36 the physical manifestations of the Prana by physical means is called 37 physical science, and that part which tries to control the 38 manifestation of the Prana as mental force by mental means is 39 called Raja-Yoga.

THE PSYCHIC PRANA

According to the Yogis, there are two nerve currents in the spinal column, called Pingala and Ida, and a hollow canal called Sushumna running through the spinal cord. At the lower end of the hollow canal is what the Yogis call the "Lotus of the Kundalini". They describe it as triangular in form in which, in the symbolical language of the Yogis, there is a power called the Kundalini, coiled up. When that Kundalini awakes, it tries to force a passage through this hollow canal, and as it rises step by step, as it were, layer after layer of the mind becomes open and all the different visions and wonderful powers come to the Yogi. When it reaches the brain, the Yogi is perfectly detached from the body and mind; the soul finds itself free. We know that the spinal cord is composed in a peculiar manner. If we take the figure eight horizontally, there are two parts which are connected in the middle. Suppose you add eight after eight, piled one on top of the other, that will represent the spinal cord. The left is the Ida, the right Pingala, and that hollow canal which runs through the centre of the spinal cord is the Sushumna. Where the spinal cord ends in some of the lumbar vertebrae, a fine fibre issues downwards, and the canal runs up even within that fibre, only much finer. The canal is closed at the lower end, which is situated near what is called the sacral plexus, which, according to modern physiology, is triangular in form. The different plexuses that have their centres in the spinal canal can very well stand for the different "lotuses" of the Yogi.

The Yogi conceives of several centres, beginning with the Muladhara, the basic, and ending with the Sahasrara, the thousand-petalled lotus in the brain. So, if we take these different plexuses as representing these lotuses, the idea of the Yogi can be understood very easily in the language of modern physiology. We know there are two sorts of actions in these nerve currents, one afferent, the other efferent; one sensory and the other motor; one centripetal, and the other centrifugal. One carries the sensations to the brain, and the other from the brain to the outer body. These vibrations are all connected with the brain in the long run. Several other facts we have to remember, in order to clear the way for the explanation which is to come. This spinal cord, at the brain, ends in a sort of bulb, in the medulla, which is not attached to the brain, but floats in a fluid in the brain, so that if there be a blow on the head the force of that blow will be dissipated in the fluid, and will not hurt the bulb. This is an important fact to remember. Secondly, we have also to know that, of all the centres, we have particularly to remember three, the Muladhara (the basic), the Sahasrara (the thousand-petalled lotus of the brain) and the Manipura (the lotus of the navel).

Next we shall take one fact from physics. We all hear of electricity and various other forces connected with it. What electricity is no one knows, but so far as it is known, it is a sort of motion. There are various other motions in the universe; what is the difference between them and electricity? Suppose this table moves--that the molecules which compose this table are moving in different directions; if they are all made to move in the same

1 direction, it will be through electricity. Electric motion makes the 2 molecules of a body move in the same direction. If all the air 3 molecules in a room are made to move in the same direction, it will 4 make a gigantic battery of electricity of the room. Another point 5 from physiology we must remember, that the centre which 6 regulates the respiratory system, the breathing system, has a sort 7 of controlling action over the system of nerve currents.

8 Now we shall see why breathing is practised. In the first 9 place, from rhythmical breathing comes a tendency of all the 10 molecules in the body to move in the same direction. When mind 11 changes into will, the nerve currents change into a motion similar 12 to electricity, because the nerves have been proved to show polarity 13 under the action of electric currents. This shows that when the will 14 is transformed into the nerve currents, it is changed into something 15 like electricity. When all the motions of the body have become 16 perfectly rhythmical, the body has, as it were, become a gigantic 17 battery of will. This tremendous will is exactly what the Yogi wants.
18 This is, therefore, a physiological explanation of the breathing 19 exercise. It tends to bring a rhythmic action in the body, and helps 20 us, through the respiratory centre, to control the other centres. The 21 aim of Pranayama here is to rouse the coiled-up power in the 22 Muladhara, called the Kundalini.

23 Everything that we see, or imagine, or dream, we have to 24 perceive in space. This is the ordinary space, called the Mahakasha, 25 or elemental space. When a Yogi reads the thoughts of other men, 26 or perceives supersensuous objects, he sees them in another sort of 27 space called the Chittakasha, the mental space. When perception 28 has become objectless, and the soul shines in its own nature, it is 29 called the Chidakasha, or knowledge space. When the Kundalini is 30 aroused, and enters the canal of the Sushumna, all the perceptions 31 are in the mental space. When it has reached that end of the canal 32 which opens out into the brain, the objectless perception is in the 33 knowledge space. Taking the analogy of electricity, we find that man 34 can send a current only along a wire, but nature requires no wires 35 to send her tremendous currents.

36 This proves that the wire is not really necessary, but that only 37 our inability to dispense with it compels us to use it.

38 Similarly, all the sensations and motions of the body are being 39 sent into the brain, and sent out of it, through these wires of nerve 40 fibres. The columns of sensory and motor fibres in the spinal cord 41 are the Ida and Pingala of the Yogis. They are the main channels 42 through which the afferent and efferent currents travel. But why 43 should not the mind send news without any wire, or react without 44 any wire? We see this is done in nature. The Yogi says, if you can do 45 that, you have got rid of the bondage of matter. How to do it? If you 46 can make the current pass through the Sushumna, the canal in the 47 middle of the spinal column, you have solved the problem. The mind 48 has made this network of the nervous system, and has to break it, 49 so that no wires will be required to work through. Then alone will 50 all knowledge come to us--no more bondage of body; that is why it 51 is so important that we should get control of that Sushumna. If we 52 can send the mental current through the hollow canal without any

1 nerve fibres to act as wires, the Yogi says, the problem is solved, 2 and he also says it can be done.

3 This Sushumna is in ordinary persons closed up at the lower 4 extremity; no action comes through it. The Yogi proposes a practice 5 by which it can be opened, and the nerve currents made to travel 6 through. When a sensation is carried to a centre, the centre reacts.
7 This reaction, in the case of automatic centres, is followed by 8 motion; in the case of conscious centres it is followed first by 9 perception, and secondly by motion. All perception is the reaction 10 to action from outside. How, then, do perceptions in dreams arise?
11 There is then no action from outside. The sensory motions, 12 therefore, are coiled up somewhere. For instance, I see a city; the 13 perception of that city is from the reaction to the sensations
14 brought from outside objects comprising that city. That is to say, a 15 certain motion in the brain molecules has been set up by the motion 16 in the incarrying nerves, which again are set in motion by external 17 objects in the city. Now, even after a long time I can remember the 18 city. This memory is exactly the same phenomenon, only it is in a 19 milder form. But whence is the action that sets up even the milder 20 form of similar vibrations in the brain? Not certainly from the 21 primary sensations. Therefore it must be that the sensations are 22 coiled up somewhere, and they, by their acting, bring out the mild 23 reaction which we call dream perception.

24 Now the centre where all these residual sensations are, as it 25 were, stored up, is called the Muladhara, the root receptacle, and 26 the coiled-up energy of action is Kundalini, "the coiled up". It is very 27 probable that the residual motor energy is also stored up in the 28 same centre, as, after deep study or meditation on external objects, 29 the part of the body where the Muladhara centre is situated 30 (probably the sacral plexus) gets heated. Now, if this coiled-up 31 energy be roused and made active, and then consciously made to 32 travel up the Sushumna canal, as it acts upon centre after centre, a 33 tremendous reaction will set in. When a minute portion of energy 34 travels along a nerve fibre and causes reaction from centres, the 35 perception is either dream or imagination. But when by the power 36 of long internal meditation the vast mass of energy stored up 37 travels along the Sushumna, and strikes the centres, the reaction is 38 tremendous, immensely superior to the reaction of dream or 39 imagination, immensely more intense than the reaction of sense-40 perception. It is supersensuous perception. And when it reaches the 41 metropolis of all sensations, the brain, the whole brain, as it were, 42 reacts, and the result is the full blaze of illumination, the perception 43 of the Self. As this Kundalini force travels from centre to centre, 44 layer after layer of the mind, as it were, opens up, and this universe 45 is perceived by the Yogi in its fine, or causal form. Then alone the 46 causes of this universe, both as sensation and reaction, are known 47 as they are, and hence comes all knowledge. The causes being 48 known, the knowledge of the effects is sure to follow.

49 Thus the rousing of the Kundalini is the one and only way to 50 attaining Divine Wisdom, superconscious perception, realisation of 51 the spirit. The rousing may come in various ways, through love for 52 God, through the mercy of perfected sages, or through the power of 1 the analytic will of the philosopher. Wherever there was any 2 manifestation of what is ordinarily called supernatural power or 3 wisdom, there a little current of Kundalini must have found its way

4 into the Sushumna. Only, in the vast majority of such cases, people 5 had ignorantly stumbled on some practice which set free a minute 6 portion of the coiled-up Kundalini. All worship, consciously or 7 unconsciously, leads to this end. The man who thinks that he is 8 receiving response to his prayers does not know that the fulfillment 9 comes from his own nature, that he has succeeded by the mental 10 attitude of prayer in waking up a bit of this infinite power which is 11 coiled up within himself. What, thus, men ignorantly worship under 12 various names, through fear and tribulation, the Yogi declares to 13 the world to be the real power coiled up in every being, the mother 14 of eternal happiness, if we but know how to approach her. And Raja-15 Yoga is the science of religion, the rationale of all worship, all 16 prayers, forms, ceremonies, and miracles.

THE CONTROL OF THE PSYCHIC PRANA

We have now to deal with the exercises in Pranayama. We have seen that the first step, according to the Yogis, is to control the motion of the lungs. What we want to do is to feel the finer motions that are going on in the body. Our minds have become externalised, and have lost sight of the fine motions inside. If we can begin to feel them, we can begin to control them. These nerve currents go on all over the body, bringing life and vitality to every muscle, but we do not feel them. The Yogi says we can learn to do so. How? By taking up and controlling the motion of the lungs; when we have done that for a sufficient length of time, we shall be able to control the finer emotions.

We now come to the exercises in Pranayama. Sit upright; the body must be kept straight. The spinal cord, although not attached to the vertebral column, is yet inside of it. If you sit crookedly you disturb this spinal cord, so let it be free. Any time that you sit crookedly and try to meditate you do yourself an injury. The three parts of the body, the chest, the neck, and the head, must be always held straight in one line. You will find that by a little practice this will come to you as easy as breathing. The second thing is to get control of the nerves. We have said that the nerve centre that controls the respiratory organs has a sort of controlling effect on the other nerves, and rhythmical breathing is, therefore, necessary. The breathing that we generally use should not be called breathing at all. It is very irregular. Then there are some natural differences of breathing between men and women.

The first lesson is just to breathe in a measured way, in and out. That will harmonise the system. When you have practised this for some time, you will do well to join to it the repetition of some word as "Om," or any other sacred word. In India we use certain symbolical words instead of counting one, two, three, four. That is why I advise you to join the mental repetition of the "Om," or some other sacred word to the Pranayama. Let the word flow in and out with the breath, rhythmically, harmoniously, and you will find the whole body is becoming rhythmical. Then you will learn what rest is. Compared with it, sleep is not rest. Once this rest comes the most tired nerves will be calmed down, and you will find that you have never before really rested.

The first effect of this practice is perceived in the change of expression of one's face; harsh lines disappear; with calm thought calmness comes over the face. Next comes beautiful voice. I never saw a Yogi with a croaking voice. These signs come after a few months' practice. After practising the above mentioned breathing for a few days, you should take up a higher one. Slowly fill the lungs with breath through the Ida, the left nostril, and at the same time concentrate the mind on the nerve current. You are, as it were, sending the nerve current down the spinal column, and striking violently on the last plexus, the basic lotus which is triangular in form, the seat of the Kundalini. Then hold the current there for some time. Imagine that you are slowly drawing that nerve current with the breath through the other side, the Pingala, then slowly

1 throw it out through the right nostril. This you will find a little 2 difficult to practise. The easiest way is to stop the right nostril with 3 the thumb, and then slowly draw in the breath through the left; 4 then close both nostrils with thumb and forefinger, and imagine that 5 you are sending that current down, and striking the base of the 6 Sushumna; then take the thumb off, and let the breath out through 7 the right nostril. Next inhale slowly through that nostril, keeping 8 the other closed by the forefinger, then close both, as before. The 9 way the Hindus practise this would be very difficult for this country, 10 because they do it from their childhood, and their lungs are 11 prepared for it. Here it is well to begin with four seconds, and 12 slowly increase. Draw in four seconds, hold in sixteen seconds, then 13 throw out in eight seconds. This makes one Pranayama. At the same 14 time think of the basic lotus, triangular in form; concentrate the 15 mind on that centre. The imagination can help you a great deal. The 16 next breathing is slowly drawing the breath in, and then 17 immediately throwing it out slowly, and then stopping the breath 18 out, using the same numbers. The only difference is that in the first 19 case the breath was held in, and in the second, held out. This last is 20 the easier one. The breathing in which you hold the breath in the 21 lungs must not be practised too much. Do it only four times in the 22 morning, and four times in the evening. Then you can slowly 23 increase the time and number. You will find that you have the power 24 to do so, and that you take pleasure in it. So very carefully and 25 cautiously increase as you feel that you have the power, to six 26 instead of four. It may injure you if you practise it irregularly.

27 Of the three processes for the purification of the nerves, 28 described above, the first and the last are neither difficult nor 29 dangerous. The more you practise the first one the calmer you will 30 be. Just think of "Om," and you can practise even while you are 31 sitting at your work. You will be all the better for it. Some day, if you 32 practise hard, the Kundalini will be aroused. For those who practise 33 once or twice a day, just a little calmness of the body and mind will 34 come, and beautiful voice; only for those who can go on further with 35 it will Kundalini be aroused, and the whole of nature will begin to 36 change, and the book of knowledge will open. No more will you 37 need to go to books for knowledge; your own mind will have 38 become your book, containing infinite knowledge. I have already 39 spoken of the Ida and Pingala currents, flowing through either side 40 of the spinal column, and also of the Sushumna, the passage 41 through the centre of the spinal cord. These three are present in 42 every animal; whatever being has a spinal column has these three 43 lines of action. But the Yogis claim that in an ordinary man the 44 Sushumna is closed; its action is not evident while that of the other 45 two is carrying power to different parts of the body.

46 The Yogi alone has the Sushumna open. When this Sushumna 47 current opens, and begins to rise, we get beyond the senses, our 48 minds become supersensuous, superconscious--we get beyond even 49 the intellect, where reasoning cannot reach. To open that 50 Sushumna is the prime object of the Yogi. According to him, along 51 this Sushumna are ranged these centres, or, in more figurative 52 language, these lotuses, as they are called. The lowest one is at the 1 lower end of the spinal cord, and is called Muladhara, the next

2 higher is called Svadhishtana, the third Manipura, the fourth 3 Anahata, the fifth Vishuddha, the sixth Ajna and the last, which is in 4 the brain, is the Sahasrara, or "the thousand-petalled". Of these we 5 have to take cognition just now of two centres only, the lowest, the 6 Muladhara, and the highest, the Sahasrara. All energy has to be 7 taken up from its seat in the Muladhara and brought to the 8 Sahasrara. The Yogis claim that of all the energies that are in the 9 human body the highest is what they call "Ojas". Now this Ojas is 10 stored up in the brain, and the more Ojas is in a man's head, the 11 more powerful he is, the more intellectual, the more spiritually 12 strong. One man may speak beautiful language and beautiful 13 thoughts, but they do not impress people; another man speaks 14 neither beautiful language nor beautiful thoughts, yet his words 15 charm. Every movement of his is powerful. That is the power of 16 Ojas.

17 Now in every man there is more or less of this Ojas stored up.
18 All the forces that are working in the body in their highest become 19 Ojas. You must remember that it is only a question of 20 transformation. The same force which is working outside as 21 electricity or magnetism will become changed into inner force; the 22 same forces that are working as muscular energy will be changed 23 into Ojas. The Yogis say that that part of the human energy which is 24 expressed as sex energy, in sexual thought, when checked and 25 controlled, easily becomes changed into Ojas, and as the Muladhara 26 guides these, the Yogi pays particular attention to that centre. He 27 tries to take up all his sexual energy and convert it into Ojas. It is 28 only the chaste man or woman who can make the Ojas rise and 29 store it in the brain; that is why chastity has always been 30 considered the highest virtue. A man feels that if he is unchaste, 31 spirituality goes away, he loses mental vigour and moral stamina.
32 That is why in all the religious orders in the world which have 33 produced spiritual giants you will always find absolute chastity 34 insisted upon. That is why the monks came into existence, giving up 35 marriage. There must be perfect chastity in thought, word, and 36 deed; without it the practice of Raja-Yoga is dangerous, and may 37 lead to insanity. If people practise Raja-Yoga and at the same time 38 lead an impure life, how can they expect to become Yogis?

PRATYAHARA AND DHARANA

The next step is called Pratyahara. What is this? You know how perceptions come. First of all there are the external instruments, then the internal organs acting in the body through the brain centres, and there is the mind. When these come together and attach themselves to some external object, then we perceive it. At the same time it is a very difficult thing to concentrate the mind and attach it to one organ only; the mind is a slave.

We hear "Be good," and "Be good," and "Be good," taught all over the world. There is hardly a child, born in any country in the world, who has not been told, "Do not steal," "Do not tell a lie," but nobody tells the child how he can help doing them. Talking will not help him. Why should he not become a thief? We do not teach him how not to steal; we simply tell him, "Do not steal." Only when we teach him to control his mind do we really help him. All actions, internal and external, occur when the mind joins itself to certain centres, called the organs. Willingly or unwillingly it is drawn to join itself to the centres, and that is why people do foolish deeds and feel miserable, which, if the mind were under control, they would not do. What would be the result of controlling the mind? It then would not join itself to the centres of perception, and, naturally, feeling and willing would be under control. It is clear so far. Is it possible? It is perfectly possible. You see it in modern times; the faith-healers teach people to deny misery and pain and evil. Their philosophy is rather roundabout, but it is a part of Yoga upon which they have somehow stumbled. Where they succeed in making a person throw off suffering by denying it, they really use a part of Pratyahara, as they make the mind of the person strong enough to ignore the senses. The hypnotists in a similar manner, by their suggestion, excite in the patient a sort of morbid Pratyahara for the time being. The so-called hypnotic suggestion can only act upon a weak mind. And until the operator, by means of fixed gaze or otherwise, has succeeded in putting the mind of the subject in a sort of passive, morbid condition, his suggestions never work.

Now the control of the centres which is established in a hypnotic patient or the patient of faith-healing, by the operator, for a time, is reprehensible, because it leads to ultimate ruin. It is not really controlling the brain centres by the power of one's own will, but is, as it were, stunning the patient's mind for a time by sudden blows which another's will delivers to it. It is not checking by means of reins and muscular strength the mad career of a fiery team, but rather by asking another to deliver heavy blows on the heads of the horses, to stun them for a time into gentleness. At each one of these processes the man operated upon loses a part of his mental energies, till at last, the mind, instead of gaining the power of perfect control, becomes a shapeless, powerless mass, and the only goal of the patient is the lunatic asylum.

Every attempt at control which is not voluntary, not with the controller's own mind, is not only disastrous, but it defeats the end. The goal of each soul is freedom, mastery--freedom from the slavery of matter and thought, mastery of external and internal nature.

1 Instead of leading towards that, every will-current from another, in 2 whatever form it comes, either as direct control of organs, or as 3 forcing to control them while under a morbid condition, only rivets 4 one link more to the already existing heavy chain of bondage of past 5 thoughts, past superstitions. Therefore, beware how you allow 6 yourselves to be acted upon by others. Beware how you
7 unknowingly bring another to ruin. True, some succeed in doing 8 good to many for a time, by giving a new trend to their propensities, 9 but at the same time, they bring ruin to millions by the unconscious 10 suggestions they throw around, rousing in men and women that 11 morbid, passive, hypnotic condition which makes them almost 12 soulless at last. Whosoever, therefore, asks any one to believe 13 blindly, or drags people behind him by the controlling power of his 14 superior will, does an injury to humanity, though he may not intend 15 it.

16 Therefore use your own minds, control body and mind
17 yourselves, remember that until you are a diseased person, no 18 extraneous will can work upon you; avoid everyone, however great 19 and good he may be, who asks you to believe blindly. All over the 20 world there have been dancing and jumping and howling sects, who 21 spread like infection when they begin to sing and dance and 22 preach; they also are a sort of hypnotists. They exercise a singular 23 control for the time being over sensitive persons, alas! often, in the 24 long run, to degenerate whole races. Ay, it is healthier for the 25 individual or the race to remain wicked than be made apparently 26 good by such morbid extraneous control. One's heart sinks to think 27 of the amount of injury done to humanity by such irresponsible yet 28 well-meaning religious fanatics. They little know that the minds 29 which attain to sudden spiritual upheaval under their suggestions, 30 with music and prayers, are simply making themselves passive, 31 morbid, and powerless, and opening themselves to any other 32 suggestion, be it ever so evil. Little do these ignorant, deluded 33 persons dream that whilst they are congratulating themselves upon 34 their miraculous power to transform human hearts, which power 35 they think was poured upon them by some Being above the clouds, 36 they are sowing the seeds of future decay, of crime, of lunacy, and 37 of death. Therefore, beware of everything that take away your 38 freedom. Know that it is dangerous, and avoid it by all the means in 39 your power.

40 He who has succeeded in attaching or detaching his mind to 41 or from the centres at will has succeeded in Pratyahara, which 42 means, "gathering towards," checking the outgoing powers of the 43 mind, freeing it from the thralldom of the senses. When we can do 44 this, we shall really possess character; then alone we shall have 45 taken a long step towards freedom; before that we are mere 46 machines.

47 How hard it is to control the mind! Well has it been compared 48 to the maddened monkey. There was a monkey, restless by his own 49 nature, as all monkeys are. As if that were not enough some one 50 made him drink freely of wine, so that he became still more 51 restless. Then a scorpion stung him. When a man is stung by a 52 scorpion, he jumps about for a whole day; so the poor monkey

1 found his condition worse than ever. To complete his misery a 2 demon entered into him. What language can describe the 3 uncontrollable restlessness of that monkey? The human mind is like 4 that monkey, incessantly active by its own nature; then it becomes 5 drunk with the wine of desire, thus increasing its turbulence. After 6 desire takes possession comes the sting of the scorpion of jealousy 7 at the success of others, and last of all the demon of pride enters 8 the mind, making it think itself of all importance. How hard to 9 control such a mind!

10 The first lesson, then, is to sit for some time and let the mind 11 run on. The mind is bubbling up all the time. It is like that monkey 12 jumping about. Let the monkey jump as much as he can; you simply 13 wait and watch. Knowledge is power, says the proverb, and that is 14 true. Until you know what the mind is doing you cannot control it.
15 Give it the rein; many hideous thoughts may come into it; you will 16 be astonished that it was possible for you to think such thoughts.
17 But you will find that each day the mind's vagaries are becoming 18 less and less violent, that each day it is becoming calmer. In the 19 first few months you will find that the mind will have a great many 20 thoughts, later you will find that they have somewhat decreased, 21 and in a few more months they will be fewer and fewer, until at last 22 the mind will be under perfect control; but we must patiently 23 practise every day. As soon as the steam is turned on, the engine 24 must run; as soon as things are before us we must perceive; so a 25 man, to prove that he is not a machine, must demonstrate that he is 26 under the control of nothing. This controlling of the mind, and not 27 allowing it to join itself to the centres, is Pratyahara. How is this 28 practised? It is a tremendous work, not to be done in a day. Only 29 after a patient, continuous struggle for years can we succeed.

30 After you have practised Pratyahara for a time, take the next 31 step, the Dharana, holding the mind to certain points. What is 32 meant by holding the mind to certain points? Forcing the mind to 33 feel certain parts of the body to the exclusion of others. For 34 instance, try to feel only the hand, to the exclusion of other parts of 35 the body. When the Chitta, or mind-stuff, is confined and limited to a 36 certain place it is Dharana. This Dharana is of various sorts, and 37 along with it, it is better to have a little play of the imagination. For 38 instance, the mind should be made to think of one point in the 39 heart. That is very difficult; an easier way is to imagine a lotus 40 there. That lotus is full of light, effulgent light. Put the mind there.
41 Or think of the lotus in the brain as full of light, or of the different 42 centres in the Sushumna mentioned before.

43 The Yogi must always practise. He should try to live alone; 44 the companionship of different sorts of people distracts the mind; 45 he should not speak much, because to speak distracts the mind; not 46 work much, because too much work distracts the mind; the mind 47 cannot be controlled after a whole day's hard work. One observing 48 the above rules becomes a Yogi. Such is the power of Yoga that 49 even the least of it will bring a great amount of benefit. It will not 50 hurt anyone, but will benefit everyone.

51 First of all, it will tone down nervous excitement, bring 52 calmness, enable us to see things more clearly. The temperament

1 will be better, and the health will be better. Sound health will be 2 one of the first signs, and a beautiful voice. Defects in the voice will 3 be changed. This will be among the first of the many effects that 4 will come. Those who practise hard will get many other signs.
5 Sometimes there will be sounds, as a peal of bells heard at a 6 distance, commingling, and falling on the ear as one continuous 7 sound. Sometimes things will be seen, little specks of light floating 8 and becoming bigger and bigger; and when these things come, 9 know that you are progressing fast.

10 Those who want to be Yogis, and practise hard, must take 11 care of their diet at first. But for those who want only a little 12 practice for everyday business sort of life, let them not eat too 13 much; otherwise they may eat whatever they please. For those who 14 want to make rapid progress, and to practise hard, a strict diet is 15 absolutely necessary. They will find it advantageous to live only on 16 milk and cereals for some months. As the organisation becomes 17 finer and finer, it will be found in the beginning that the least 18 irregularity throws one out of balance. One bit of food more or less 19 will disturb the whole system, until one gets perfect control, and 20 then one will be able to eat whatever one likes.

21 When one begins to concentrate, the dropping of a pin will 22 seem like a thunderbolt going through the brain. As the organs get 23 finer, the perceptions get finer. These are the stages through which 24 we have to pass, and all those who persevere will succeed. Give up 25 all argumentation and other distractions. Is there anything in dry 26 intellectual jargon? It only throws the mind off its balance and 27 disturbs it. Things of subtler planes have to be realised. Will talking 28 do that? So give up all vain talk. Read only those books which have 29 been written by persons who have had realisation.

30 Be like the pearl oyster. There is a pretty Indian fable to the 31 effect that if it rains when the star Svati is in the ascendant, and a 32 drop of rain falls into an oyster, that drop becomes a pearl. The 33 oysters know this, so they come to the surface when that star
34 shines, and wait to catch the precious raindrop. When a drop falls 35 into them, quickly the oysters close their shells and dive down to 36 the bottom of the sea, there to patiently develop the drop into the 37 pearl. We should be like that. First hear, then understand, and then, 38 leaving all distractions, shut your minds to outside influences, and 39 devote yourselves to developing the truth within you. There is the 40 danger of frittering away your energies by taking up an idea only 41 for its novelty, and then giving it up for another that is newer. Take 42 one thing up and do it, and see the end of it, and before you have 43 seen the end, do not give it up. He who can become mad with an 44 idea, he alone sees light. Those that only take a nibble here and a 45 nibble there will never attain anything. They may titillate their 46 nerves for a moment, but there it will end. They will be slaves in the 47 hands of nature, and will never get beyond the senses.

48 Those who really want to be Yogis must give up, once for all, 49 this nibbling at things. Take up one idea. Make that one idea your 50 life--think of it, dream of it, live on that idea. Let the brain, muscles, 51 nerves, every part of your body, be full of that idea, and just leave 52 every other idea alone. This is the way to success, and this is the 1 way great spiritual giants are produced. Others are mere talking 2 machines. If we really want to be blessed, and make others blessed, 3 we must go deeper. The first step is not to disturb the mind, not to 4 associate with persons whose ideas are disturbing. All of you know 5 that certain persons, certain places, certain foods, repel you. Avoid 6 them; and those who want to go to the highest, must avoid all 7 company, good or bad. Practise hard; whether you live or die does 8 not matter. You have to plunge in and work, without thinking of the 9 result. If you are brave enough, in six months you will be a perfect 10 Yogi. But those who take up just a bit of it and a little of everything 11 else make no progress. It is of no use simply to take a course of 12 lessons. To those who are full of Tamas, ignorant and dull--those 13 whose minds never get fixed on any idea, who only crave for 14 something to amuse them--religion and philosophy are simply 15 objects of entertainment. These are the unpersevering. They hear a 16 talk, think it very nice, and then go home and forget all about it. To 17 succeed, you must have tremendous perseverance, tremendous 18 will. "I will drink the ocean," says the persevering soul, "at my will 19 mountains will crumble up." Have that sort of energy, that sort of 20 will, work hard, and you will reach the goal.

DHYANA AND SAMADHI

We have taken a cursory view of the different steps in Raja-Yoga, except the finer ones, the training in concentration, which is the goal, to which Raja-Yoga will lead us. We see, as human beings, that all our knowledge which is called rational is referred to consciousness. My consciousness of this table, and of your presence, makes me know that the table and you are here. At the same time, there is a very great part of my existence of which I am not conscious. All the different organs inside the body, the different parts of the brain--nobody is conscious of these.

When I eat food, I do it consciously; when I assimilate it, I do it unconsciously. When the food is manufactured into blood, it is done unconsciously. When out of the blood all the different parts of my body are strengthened, it is done unconsciously. And yet it is I who am doing all this; there cannot be twenty people in this one body. How do I know that I do it, and nobody else? It may be urged that my business is only in eating and assimilating the food, and that strengthening the body by the food is done for me by somebody else. That cannot be, because it can be demonstrated that almost every action of which we are now unconscious can be brought up to the plane of consciousness. The heart is beating apparently without our control. None of us here can control the heart; it goes on its own way. But by practice men can bring even the heart under control, until it will just beat at will, slowly, or quickly, or almost stop. Nearly every part of the body can be brought under control. What does this show? That the functions which are beneath consciousness are also performed by us, only we are doing it unconsciously. We have, then, two planes in which the human mind works. First is the conscious plane, in which all work is always accompanied with the feeling of egoism. Next comes the unconscious plane, where all work is unaccompanied by the feeling of egoism. That part of mind-work which is unaccompanied with the feeling of egoism is unconscious work, and that part which is accompanied with the feeling of egoism is conscious work. In the lower animals this unconscious work is called instinct. In higher animals, and in the highest of all animals, man, what is called conscious work prevails.

But it does not end here. There is a still higher plane upon which the mind can work. It can go beyond consciousness. Just as unconscious work is beneath consciousness, so there is another work which is above consciousness, and which also is not accompanied with the feeling of egoism. The feeling of egoism is only on the middle plane. When the mind is above or below that line, there is no feeling of "I", and yet the mind works. When the mind goes beyond this line of self-consciousness, it is called Samadhi or superconsciousness. How, for instance, do we know that a man in Samadhi has not gone below consciousness, has not degenerated instead of going higher? In both cases the works are unaccompanied with egoism. The answer is, by the effects, by the results of the work, we know that which is below, and that which is above. When a man goes into deep sleep, he enters a plane beneath consciousness. He works the body all the time, he breathes, he

1 moves the body, perhaps, in his sleep, without any accompanying 2 feeling of ego; he is unconscious, and when he returns from his 3 sleep, he is the same man who went into it. The sum total of the 4 knowledge which he had before he went into the sleep remains the 5 same; it does not increase at all. No enlightenment comes. But 6 when a man goes into Samadhi, if he goes into it a fool, he comes 7 out a sage.

8 What makes the difference? From one state a man comes out 9 the very same man that he went in, and from another state the man 10 comes out enlightened, a sage, a prophet, a saint, his whole 11 character changed, his life changed, illumined. These are the two 12 effects. Now the effects being different, the causes must be 13 different. As this illumination with which a man comes back from 14 Samadhi is much higher than can be got from unconsciousness, or 15 much higher than can be got by reasoning in a conscious state, it 16 must, therefore, be superconsciousness, and Samadhi is called the 17 superconscious state.

18 This, in short, is the idea of Samadhi. What is its application?
19 The application is here. The field of reason, or of the conscious 20 workings of the mind, is narrow and limited. There is a little circle 21 within which human reason must move. It cannot go beyond. Every 22 attempt to go beyond is impossible, yet it is beyond this circle of 23 reason that there lies all that humanity holds most dear. All these 24 questions, whether there is an immortal soul, whether there is a 25 God, whether there is any supreme intelligence guiding this 26 universe or not, are beyond the field of reason. Reason can never 27 answer these questions. What does reason say? It says, "I am 28 agnostic; I do not know either yea or nay." Yet these questions are 29 so important to us. Without a proper answer to them, human life 30 will be purposeless. All our ethical theories, all our moral attitudes, 31 all that is good and great in human nature, have been moulded 32 upon answers that have come from beyond the circle. It is very 33 important, therefore, that we should have answers to these 34 questions. If life is only a short play, if the universe is only a 35 "fortuitous combination of atoms," then why should I do good to 36 another? Why should there be mercy, justice, or fellow-feeling? The 37 best thing for this world would be to make hay while the sun shines, 38 each man for himself. If there is no hope, why should I love my 39 brother, and not cut his throat? If there is nothing beyond, if there 40 is no freedom, but only rigorous dead laws, I should only try to 41 make myself happy here. You will find people saying nowadays that 42 they have utilitarian grounds as the basis of morality. What is this 43 basis? Procuring the greatest amount of happiness to the greatest 44 number. Why should I do this? Why should I not produce the 45 greatest unhappiness to the greatest number, if that serves my 46 purpose? How will utilitarians answer this question? How do you 47 know what is right, or what is wrong? I am impelled by my desire 48 for happiness, and I fulfil it, and it is in my nature; I know nothing 49 beyond. I have these desires, and must fulfil them; why should you 50 complain? Whence come all these truths about human life, about 51 morality, about the immortal soul, about God, about love and 52 sympathy, about being good, and, above all, about being unselfish?

1 All ethics, all human action and all human thought, hang upon 2 this one idea of unselfishness. The whole idea of human life can be 3 put into that one word, unselfishness. Why should we be unselfish?
4 Where is the necessity, the force, the power, of my being unselfish?
5 You call yourself a rational man, a utilitarian; but if you do not show 6 me a reason for utility, I say you are irrational. Show me the reason 7 why I should not be selfish. To ask one to be unselfish may be good 8 as poetry, but poetry is not reason. Show me a reason. Why shall I 9 be unselfish, and why be good? Because Mr. and Mrs. So-and-so say 10 so does not weigh with me. Where is the utility of my being 11 unselfish? My utility is to be selfish if utility means the greatest 12 amount of happiness. What is the answer? The utilitarian can never 13 give it. The answer is that this world is only one drop in an infinite 14 ocean, one link in an infinite chain. Where did those that preached 15 unselfishness, and taught it to the human race, get this idea? We 16 know it is not instinctive; the animals, which have instinct, do not 17 know it. Neither is it reason; reason does not know anything about 18 these ideas. Whence then did they come?

19 We find, in studying history, one fact held in common by all 20 the great teachers of religion the world ever had. They all claim to 21 have got their truths from beyond, only many of them did not know 22 where they got them from. For instance, one would say that an 23 angel came down in the form of a human being, with wings, and 24 said to him, "Hear, O man, this is the message." Another says that a 25 Deva, a bright being, appeared to him. A third says he dreamed that 26 his ancestor came and told him certain things. He did not know 27 anything beyond that. But this is common that all claim that this 28 knowledge has come to them from beyond, not through their 29 reasoning power. What does the science of Yoga teach? It teaches 30 that they were right in claiming that all this knowledge came to 31 them from beyond reasoning, but that it came from within 32 themselves.

33 The Yogi teaches that the mind itself has a higher state of 34 existence, beyond reason, a superconscious state, and when the 35 mind gets to that higher state, then this knowledge, beyond 36 reasoning, comes to man. Metaphysical and transcendental 37 knowledge comes to that man. This state of going beyond reason, 38 transcending ordinary human nature, may sometimes come by 39 chance to a man who does not understand its science; he, as it 40 were, stumbles upon it. When he stumbles upon it, he generally 41 interprets it as coming from outside. So this explains why an 42 inspiration, or transcendental knowledge, may be the same in 43 different countries, but in one country it will seem to come through 44 an angel, and in another through a Deva, and in a third through 45 God. What does it mean? It means that the mind brought the 46 knowledge by its own nature, and that the finding of the knowledge 47 was interpreted according to the belief and education of the person 48 through whom it came. The real fact is that these various men, as it 49 were, stumbled upon this superconscious state.

50 The Yogi says there is a great danger in stumbling upon this 51 state. In a good many cases there is the danger of the brain being 52 deranged, and, as a rule, you will find that all those men, however

1 great they were, who had stumbled upon this superconscious state 2 without understanding it, groped in the dark, and generally had,
3 along with their knowledge, some quaint superstition. They opened 4 themselves to hallucinations. Mohammed claimed that the Angel
5 Gabriel came to him in a cave one day and took him on the heavenly 6 horse, Harak, and he visited the heavens. But with all that,
7 Mohammed spoke some wonderful truths. If you read the Koran, 8 you find the most wonderful truths mixed with superstitions. How 9 will you explain it? That man was inspired, no doubt, but that 10 inspiration was, as it were, stumbled upon. He was not a trained 11 Yogi, and did not know the reason of what he was doing. Think of 12 the good Mohammed did to the world, and think of the great evil
13 that has been done through his fanaticism! Think of the millions 14 massacred through his teachings, mothers bereft of their children, 15 children made orphans, whole countries destroyed, millions upon 16 millions of people killed!

17 So we see this danger by studying the lives of great teachers 18 like Mohammed and others. Yet we find, at the same time, that they 19 were all inspired. Whenever a prophet got into the superconscious 20 state by heightening his emotional nature, he brought away from it 21 not only some truths, but some fanaticism also, some superstition 22 which injured the world as much as the greatness of the teaching 23 helped. To get any reason out of the mass incongruity we call 24 human life, we have to transcend our reason, but we must do it 25 scientifically, slowly, by regular practice, and we must cast off all 26 superstition. We must take up the study of the superconscious state 27 just as any other science. On reason we must have to lay our 28 foundation, we must follow reason as far as it leads, and when 29 reason fails, reason itself will show us the way to the highest plane.
30 When you hear a man say, "I am inspired," and then talk irrationally, 31 reject it. Why? Because these three states--instinct, reason, and 32 superconsciousness, or the unconscious, conscious, and 33 superconscious states--belong to one and the same mind. There are 34 not three minds in one man, but one state of it develops into the 35 others. Instinct develops into reason, and reason into the 36 transcendental consciousness; therefore, not one of the states 37 contradicts the others. Real inspiration never contradicts reason, 38 but fulfills it. Just as you find the great prophets saying, "I come not 39 to destroy but to fulfil," so inspiration always comes to fulfil reason, 40 and is in harmony with it.

41 All the different steps in Yoga are intended to bring us 42 scientifically to the superconscious state, or Samadhi. Furthermore, 43 this is a most vital point to understand, that inspiration is as much 44 in every man's nature as it was in that of the ancient prophets.
45 These prophets were not unique; they were men as you or I. They 46 were great Yogis. They had gained this superconsciousness, and 47 you and I can get the same. They were not peculiar people. The 48 very fact that one man ever reached that state, proves that it is 49 possible for every man to do so. Not only is it possible, but every 50 man must, eventually, get to that state, and that is religion.
51 Experience is the only teacher we have. We may talk and reason all 52 our lives, but we shall not understand a word of truth, until we

1 experience it ourselves. You cannot hope to make a man a surgeon 2 by simply giving him a few books. You cannot satisfy my curiosity to 3 see a country by showing me a map; I must have actual experience.
4 Maps can only create curiosity in us to get more perfect knowledge.
5 Beyond that, they have no value whatever. Clinging to books only 6 degenerates the human mind. Was there ever a more horrible 7 blasphemy than the statement that all the knowledge of God is 8 confined to this or that book? How dare men call God infinite, and 9 yet try to compress Him within the covers of a little book! Millions 10 of people have been killed because they did not believe what the 11 books said, because they would not see all the knowledge of God 12 within the covers of a book. Of course this killing and murdering 13 has gone by, but the world is still tremendously bound up in a belief 14 in books.

15 In order to reach the superconscious state in a scientific 16 manner it is necessary to pass through the various steps of Raja-17 Yoga I have been teaching. After Pratyahara and Dharana, we come 18 to Dhyana, meditation. When the mind has been trained to remain 19 fixed on a certain internal or external location, there comes to it the 20 power of flowing in an unbroken current, as it were, towards that 21 point. This state is called Dhyana. When one has so intensified the 22 power of Dhyana as to be able to reject the external part of 23 perception and remain meditating only on the internal part, the 24 meaning, that state is called Samadhi. The three--Dharana, Dhyana, 25 and Samadhi--together, are called Samyama. That is, if the mind 26 can first concentrate upon an object, and then is able to continue in 27 that concentration for a length of time, and then, by continued 28 concentration, to dwell only on the internal part of the perception of 29 which the object was the effect, everything comes under the control 30 of such a mind.

31 This meditative state is the highest state of existence. So long 32 as there is desire, no real happiness can come. It is only the 33 contemplative, witness-like study of objects that brings to us real 34 enjoyment and happiness. The animal has its happiness in the 35 senses, the man in his intellect, and the god in spiritual 36 contemplation. It is only to the soul that has attained to this 37 contemplative state that the world really becomes beautiful. To him 38 who desires nothing, and does not mix himself up with them, the 39 manifold changes of nature are one panorama of beauty and 40 sublimity.

41 These ideas have to be understood in Dhyana, or meditation.
42 We hear a sound. First, there is the external vibration; second, the 43 nerve motion that carries it to the mind; third, the reaction from the 44 mind, along with which flashes the knowledge of the object which 45 was the external cause of these different changes from the ethereal 46 vibrations to the mental reactions. These three are called in Yoga, 47 Shabda (sound), Artha (meaning), and Jnana (knowledge). In the 48 language of physics and physiology they are called the ethereal 49 vibration, the motion in the nerve and brain, and the mental 50 reaction. Now these, though distinct processes, have become mixed 51 up in such a fashion as to become quite indistinct. In fact, we 52 cannot now perceive any of these, we only perceive their combined

1 effect, what we call the external object. Every act of perception 2 includes these three, and there is no reason why we should not be 3 able to distinguish them.

4 When, by the previous preparations, it becomes strong and 5 controlled, and has the power of finer perception, the mind should 6 be employed in meditation. This meditation must begin with gross 7 objects and slowly rise to finer and finer, until it becomes objectless.
8 The mind should first be employed in perceiving the external causes 9 of sensations, then the internal motions, and then its own reaction.
10 When it has succeeded in perceiving the external causes of 11 sensations by themselves, the mind will acquire the power of 12 perceiving all fine material existences, all fine bodies and forms.
13 When it can succeed in perceiving the motions inside by 14 themselves, it will gain the control of all mental waves, in itself or in 15 others, even before they have translated themselves into physical 16 energy; and when he will be able to perceive the mental reaction by 17 itself, the Yogi will acquire the knowledge of everything, as every 18 sensible object, and every thought is the result of this reaction.
19 Then will he have seen the very foundations of his mind, and it will 20 be under his perfect control. Different powers will come to the Yogi, 21 and if he yields to the temptations of any one of these, the road to 22 his further progress will be barred. Such is the evil of running after 23 enjoyments. But if he is strong enough to reject even these 24 miraculous powers, he will attain to the goal of Yoga, the complete 25 suppression of the waves in the ocean of the mind. Then the glory 26 of the soul, undisturbed by the distractions of the mind, or motions 27 of the body, will shine in its full effulgence; and the Yogi will find 28 himself as he is and as he always was, the essence of knowledge, 29 the immortal, the all-pervading.

30 Samadhi is the property of every human being--nay, every 31 animal. From the lowest animal to the highest angel, some time or 32 other, each one will have to come to that state, and then, and then 33 alone, will real religion begin for him. Until then we only struggle 34 towards that stage. There is no difference now between us and 35 those who have no religion, because we have no experience. What 36 is concentration good for, save to bring us to this experience? Each 37 one of the steps to attain Samadhi has been reasoned out, properly 38 adjusted, scientifically organised, and, when faithfully practised, 39 will surely lead us to the desired end. Then will all sorrows cease, 40 all miseries vanish; the seeds for actions will be burnt, and the soul 41 will be free for ever.

RAJA-YOGA IN BRIEF

The following is a summary of Raja-Yoga freely translated from the Kurma-Purana.

The fire of Yoga burns the cage of sin that is around a man. Knowledge becomes purified and Nirvana is directly obtained. From Yoga comes knowledge; knowledge again helps the Yogi. He who combines in himself both Yoga and knowledge, with him the Lord is pleased. Those that practise Mahayoga, either once a day, or twice a day, or thrice, or always, know them to be gods. Yoga is divided into two parts. One is called Abhava, and the other, Mahayoga. Where one's self is meditated upon as zero, and bereft of quality, that is called Abhava. That in which one sees the self as full of bliss and bereft of all impurities, and one with God, is called Mahayoga. The Yogi, by each one, realises his Self. The other Yogas that we read and hear of, do not deserve to be ranked with the excellent Mahayoga in which the Yogi finds himself and the whole universe as God. This is the highest of all Yogas.

Yama, Niyama, Asana, Pranayama, Pratyahara, Dharana, Dhyana, and Samadhi are the steps in Raja-Yoga, of which non-injury, truthfulness, non-covetousness, chastity, not receiving anything from another are called Yama. This purifies the mind, the Chitta. Never producing pain by thought, word, and deed, in any living being, is what is called Ahimsa, non-injury. There is no virtue higher than non-injury. There is no happiness higher than what a man obtains by this attitude of non-offensiveness, to all creation. By truth we attain fruits of work. Through truth everything is attained. In truth everything is established. Relating facts as they are--this is truth. Not taking others' goods by stealth or by force, is called Asteya, non-covetousness. Chastity in thought, word, and deed, always, and in all conditions, is what is called Brahmacharya. Not receiving any present from anybody, even when one is suffering terribly, is what is called Aparigraha. The idea is, when a man receives a gift from another, his heart becomes impure, he becomes low, he loses his independence, he becomes bound and attached.

The following are helps to success in Yoga and are called Niyama or regular habits and observances; Tapas, austerity; Svadhyaya, study; Santosha, contentment; Shaucha, purity; Ishvara-pranidhana, worshipping God. Fasting, or in other ways controlling the body, is called physical Tapas. Repeating the Vedas and other Mantras, by which the Sattva material in the body is purified, is called study, Svadhyaya. There are three sorts of repetitions of these Mantras. One is called the verbal, another semi-verbal, and the third mental. The verbal or audible is the lowest, and the inaudible is the highest of all. The repetition which is loud is the verbal; the next one is where only the lips move, but no sound is heard. The inaudible repetition of the Mantra, accompanied with the thinking of its meaning, is called the "mental repetition," and is the highest. The sages have said that there are two sorts of purification, external and internal. The purification of the body by water, earth, or other materials is the external purification, as bathing etc. Purification of the mind by truth, and by all the other

1 virtues, is what is called internal purification. Both are necessary. It 2 is not sufficient that a man should be internally pure and externally
3 dirty. When both are not attainable the internal purity is the better, 4 but no one will be a Yogi until he has both. Worship of God is by 5 praise, by thought, by devotion.

6 We have spoken about Yama and Niyama. The next is Asana
7 (posture). The only thing to understand about it is leaving the body 8 free, holding the chest, shoulders, and head straight. Then comes 9 Pranayama. Prana means the vital forces in one's own body, Ayama 10 means controlling them. There are three sorts of Pranayama, the 11 very simple, the middle, and the very high. Pranayama is divided 12 into three parts: filling, restraining, and emptying. When you begin 13 with twelve seconds it is the lowest Pranayama; when you begin 14 with twenty-four seconds it is the middle Pranayama; that 15 Pranayama is the best which begins with thirty-six seconds. In the 16 lowest kind of Pranayama there is perspiration, in the medium kind, 17 quivering of the body, and in the highest Pranayama levitation of 18 the body and influx of great bliss. There is a Mantra called the 19 Gayatri. It is a very holy verse of the Vedas. "We meditate on the 20 glory of that Being who has produced this universe; may He 21 enlighten our minds." Om is joined to it at the beginning and the 22 end. In one Pranayama repeat three Gayatris. In all books they 23 speak of Pranayama being divided into Rechaka (rejecting or 24 exhaling), Puraka (inhaling), and Kumbhaka (restraining, 25 stationary). The Indriyas, the organs of the senses, are acting 26 outwards and coming in contact with external objects. Bringing 27 them under the control of the will is what is called Pratyahara or 28 gathering towards oneself. Fixing the mind on the lotus of the 29 heart, or on the centre of the head, is what is called Dharana.
30 Limited to one spot, making that spot the base, a particular kind of 31 mental waves rises; these are not swallowed up by other kinds of 32 waves, but by degrees become prominent, while all the others
33 recede and finally disappear. Next the multiplicity of these waves 34 gives place to unity and one wave only is left in the mind. This is 35 Dhyana, meditation. When no basis is necessary, when the whole of 36 the mind has become one wave, one-formedness, it is called 37 Samadhi. Bereft of all help from places and centres, only the 38 meaning of the thought is present. If the mind can be fixed on the 39 centre for twelve seconds it will be a Dharana, twelve such 40 Dharanas will be a Dhyana, and twelve such Dhyanas will be a 41 Samadhi.

42 Where there is fire, or in water or on ground which is strewn 43 with dry leaves, where there are many ant-hills, where there are 44 wild animals, or danger, where four streets meet, where there is too 45 much noise, where there are many wicked persons, Yoga must not 46 be practised. This applies more particularly to India. Do not 47 practise when the body feels very lazy or ill, or when the mind is 48 very miserable and sorrowful. Go to a place which is well hidden, 49 and where people do not come to disturb you. Do not choose dirty 50 places. Rather choose beautiful scenery, or a room in your own 51 house which is beautiful. When you practise, first salute all the 52 ancient Yogis, and your own Guru, and God, and then begin.

1 Dhyana is spoken of, and a few examples are given of what to 2 meditate upon. Sit straight, and look at the tip of your nose. Later 3 on we shall come to know how that concentrates the mind, how by 4 controlling the two optic nerves one advances a long way towards 5 the control of the arc of reaction, and so to the control of the will.
6 Here are a few specimens of meditation. Imagine a lotus upon the 7 top of the head, several inches up, with virtue as its centre, and 8 knowledge as its stalk. The eight petals of the lotus are the eight 9 powers of the Yogi. Inside, the stamens and pistils are renunciation.
10 If the Yogi refuses the external powers he will come to salvation. So 11 the eight petals of the lotus are the eight powers, but the internal 12 stamens and pistils are extreme renunciation, the renunciation of 13 all these powers. Inside of that lotus think of the Golden One, the 14 Almighty, the Intangible, He whose name is Om, the Inexpressible, 15 surrounded with effulgent light. Meditate on that. Another 16 meditation is given. Think of a space in your heart, and in the midst 17 of that space think that a flame is burning. Think of that flame as 18 your own soul and inside the flame is another effulgent light, and 19 that is the Soul of your soul, God. Meditate upon that in the heart.
20 Chastity, non-injury, forgiving even the greatest enemy, truth, faith 21 in the Lord, these are all different Vrittis. Be not afraid if you are 22 not perfect in all of these; work, they will come. He who has given 23 up all attachment, all fear, and all anger, he whose whole soul has 24 gone unto the Lord, he who has taken refuge in the Lord, whose 25 heart has become purified, with whatsoever desire he comes to the 26 Lord, He will grant that to him. Therefore worship Him through 27 knowledge, love, or renunciation.

28 "He who hates none, who is the friend of all, who is merciful 29 to all, who has nothing of his own, who is free from egoism, who is 30 even-minded in pain and pleasure, who is forbearing, who is always 31 satisfied, who works always in Yoga, whose self has become 32 controlled, whose will is firm, whose mind and intellect are given up 33 unto Me, such a one is My beloved Bhakta. From whom comes no 34 disturbance, who cannot be disturbed by others, who is free from 35 joy, anger, fear, and anxiety, such a one is My beloved. He who does 36 not depend on anything, who is pure and active, who does not care 37 whether good comes or evil, and never becomes miserable, who has 38 given up all efforts for himself; who is the same in praise or in 39 blame, with a silent, thoughtful mind, blessed with what little 40 comes in his way, homeless, for the whole world is his home, and 41 who is steady in his ideas, such a one is My beloved Bhakta." Such 42 alone become Yogis.

43 There was a great god-sage called Narada. Just as there are 44 sages among mankind, great Yogis, so there are great Yogis among 45 the gods. Narada was a good Yogi, and very great. He travelled 46 everywhere. One day he was passing through a forest, and saw a 47 man who had been meditating until the white ants had built a huge 48 mound round his body--so long had he been sitting in that position.
49 He said to Narada, "Where are you going?" Narada replied, "I am 50 going to heaven." "Then ask God when He will be merciful to me; 51 when I shall attain freedom." Further on Narada saw another man.
52 He was jumping about, singing, dancing, and said, "Oh, Narada,

1 where are you going?" His voice and his gestures were wild.
2 Narada said, "I am going to heaven." "Then, ask when I shall be 3 free." Narada went on. In the course of time he came again by the 4 same road, and there was the man who had been meditating with 5 the ant-hill round him. He said, "Oh, Narada, did you ask the Lord 6 about me?" "Oh, yes." "What did He say?" "The Lord told me that 7 you would attain freedom in four more births." Then the man began 8 to weep and wail, and said, "I have meditated until an ant-hill has 9 grown around me, and I have four more births yet!" Narada went to 10 the other man. "Did you ask my question?" "Oh, yes. Do you see this 11 tamarind tree? I have to tell you that as many leaves as there are on 12 that tree, so many times, you shall be born, and then you shall 13 attain freedom." The man began to dance for joy, and said, "I shall 14 have freedom after such a short time!" A voice came, "My child, you 15 will have freedom this minute." That was the reward for his 16 perseverance. He was ready to work through all those births, 17 nothing discouraged him. But the first man felt that even four more 18 births were too long. Only perseverance, like that of the man who 19 was willing to wait aeons brings about the highest result.

PATANJALI'S YOGA APHORISMS

INTRODUCTION

Before going into the Yoga aphorisms I shall try to discuss one great question, upon which rests the whole theory of religion for the Yogis. It seems the consensus of opinion of the great minds of the world, and it has been nearly demonstrated by researches into physical nature, that we are the outcome and manifestation of an absolute condition, back of our present relative condition, and are going forward, to return to that absolute. This being granted, the question is: Which is better, the absolute or this state? There are not wanting people who think that this manifested state is the highest state of man. Thinkers of great calibre are of the opinion that we are manifestations of undifferentiated being and the differentiated state is higher than the absolute. They imagine that in the absolute there cannot be any quality; that it must be insensate, dull, and lifeless; that only this life can be enjoyed, and, therefore, we must cling to it. First of all we want to inquire into other solutions of life. There was an old solution that man after death remained the same; that all his good sides, minus his evil sides, remained for ever. Logically stated, this means that man's goal is the world; this world carried a stage higher, and eliminated of its evils, is the state they call heaven. This theory, on the face of it, is absurd and puerile, because it cannot be. There cannot be good without evil, nor evil without good. To live in a world where it is all good and no evil is what Sanskrit logicians call a "dream in the air". Another theory in modern times has been presented by several schools, that man's destiny is to go on always improving, always struggling towards, but never reaching the goal. This statement, though apparently very nice, is also absurd, because there is no such thing as motion in a straight line. Every motion is in a circle. If you can take up a stone, and project it into space, and then live long enough, that stone, if it meets with no obstruction, will come back exactly to your hand. A straight line, infinitely projected, must end in a circle. Therefore, this idea that the destiny of man is progressing ever forward and forward, and never stopping, is absurd. Although extraneous to the subject, I may remark that this idea explains the ethical theory that you must not hate, and must love. Because, just as in the case of electricity the modern theory is that the power leaves the dynamo and completes the circle back to the dynamo, so with hate and love; they must come back to the source. Therefore do not hate anybody, because that hatred which comes out from you, must, in the long run, come back to you. If you love, that love will come back to you, completing the circle. It is as certain as can be, that every bit of hatred that goes out of the heart of a man comes back to him in full force, nothing can stop it; similarly every impulse of love comes back to him.

On other and practical grounds we see that the theory of eternal progression is untenable, for destruction is the goal of everything earthly. All our struggles and hopes and fears and joys, what will they lead to? We shall all end in death. Nothing is so

1 certain as this. Where, then, is this motion in a straight line--this 2 infinite progression? It is only going out to a distance, and coming 3 back to the centre from which it started. See how, from nebulae, the 4 sun, moon, and stars are produced; then they dissolve and go back 5 to nebulae. The same is being done everywhere. The plant takes 6 material from the earth, dissolves, and gives it back. Every form in 7 this world is taken out of surrounding atoms and goes back to these 8 atoms. It cannot be that the same law acts differently in different 9 places. Law is uniform. Nothing is more certain than that. If this is 10 the law of nature, it also applies to thought. Thought will dissolve 11 and go back to its origin. Whether we will it or not, we shall have to 12 return to our origin which is called God or Absolute. We all came 13 from God, and we are all bound to go back to God. Call that by any 14 name you like, God, Absolute, or Nature, the fact remains the same.
15 "From whom all this universe comes out, in whom all that is born 16 lives, and to whom all returns." This is one fact that is certain.
17 Nature works on the same plan; what is being worked out in one 18 sphere is repeated in millions of spheres. What you see with the 19 planets, the same will it be with this earth, with men, and with all.
20 The huge wave is a mighty compound of small waves, it may be of 21 millions; the life of the whole world is a compound of millions of 22 little lives, and the death of the whole world is the compound of the 23 deaths of these millions of little beings.

24 Now the question arises: Is going back to God the higher 25 state, or not? The philosophers of the Yoga school emphatically 26 answer that it is. They say that man's present state is a 27 degeneration. There is not one religion on the face of the earth 28 which says that man is an improvement. The idea is that his 29 beginning is perfect and pure, that he degenerates until he cannot 30 degenerate further, and that there must come a time when he 31 shoots upward again to complete the circle. The circle must be 32 described. However low he may go, he must ultimately take the 33 upward bend and go back to the original source, which is God. Man 34 comes from God in the beginning, in the middle he becomes man, 35 and in the end he goes back to God. This is the method of putting it 36 in the dualistic form. The monistic form is that man is God, and 37 goes back to Him again. If our present state is the higher one, then 38 why is there so much horror and misery, and why is there an end to 39 it? If this is the higher state, why does it end?

40 That which corrupts and degenerates cannot be the highest 41 state. Why should it be so diabolical, so unsatisfying? It is only 42 excusable, inasmuch as through it we are taking a higher groove; 43 we have to pass through it in order to become regenerate again.
44 Put a seed into the ground and it disintegrates, dissolves after a 45 time, and out of that dissolution comes the splendid tree. Every soul 46 must disintegrate to become God. So it follows that the sooner we 47 get out of this state we call "man" the better for us. Is it by 48 committing suicide that we get out of this state? Not at all. That will 49 be making it worse. Torturing ourselves, or condemning the world, 50 is not the way to get out. We have to pass through the Slough of 51 Despond, and the sooner we are through, the better. It must always 52 be remembered that man-state is not the highest state.

1 The really difficult part to understand is that this state, the 2 Absolute, which has been called the highest, is not, as some fear, 3 that of the zoophyte or of the stone. According to them, there are 4 only two states of existence, one of the stone, and the other of 5 thought. What right have they to limit existence to these two? Is 6 there not something infinitely superior to thought? The vibrations of 7 light, when they are very low, we do not see; when they become a 8 little more intense, they become light to us; when they become still 9 more intense, we do not see them--it is dark to us. Is the darkness 10 in the end the same darkness as in the beginning? Certainly not; 11 they are different as the two poles. Is the thoughtlessness of the 12 stone the same as the thoughtlessness of God? Certainly not. God 13 does not think; He does not reason. Why should He? Is anything 14 unknown to Him, that He should reason? The stone cannot reason; 15 God does not. Such is the difference. These philosophers think it is 16 awful if we go beyond thought; they find nothing beyond thought.

17 There are much higher states of existence beyond reasoning.
18 It is really beyond the intellect that the first state of religious life is 19 to be found. When you step beyond thought and intellect and all 20 reasoning, then you have made the first step towards God; and that 21 is the beginning of life. What is commonly called life is but an 22 embryo state.

23 The next question will be: What proof is there that the state 24 beyond thought and reasoning is the highest state? In the first 25 place, all the great men of the world, much greater than those that 26 only talk, men who moved the world, men who never thought of any 27 selfish ends whatever, have declared that this life is but a little 28 stage on the way towards Infinity which is beyond. In the second 29 place, they not only say so, but show the way to every one, explain 30 their methods, that all can follow in their steps. In the third place, 31 there is no other way left. There is no other explanation. Taking for 32 granted that there is no higher state, why are we going through this 33 circle all the time; what reason can explain the world? The sensible 34 world will be the limit to our knowledge if we cannot go farther, if 35 we must not ask for anything more. This is what is called 36 agnosticism. But what reason is there to believe in the testimony of 37 the senses? I would call that man a true agnostic who would stand 38 still in the street and die. If reason is all in all, it leaves us no place 39 to stand on this side of nihilism. If a man is agnostic of everything 40 but money, fame, and name, he is only a fraud. Kant has proved 41 beyond all doubt that we cannot penetrate beyond the tremendous 42 dead wall called reason. But that is the very first idea upon which 43 all Indian thought takes its stand, and dares to seek, and succeeds 44 in finding something higher than reason, where alone the 45 explanation of the present state is to be found. This is the value of 46 the study of something that will take us beyond the world. "Thou art 47 our father, and wilt take us to the other shore of this ocean of 48 ignorance." That is the science of religion, nothing else.

CONCENTRATION: ITS SPIRITUAL USES

{Sanskrit}

1. Now concentration is explained.

{Sanskrit}

2. Yoga is restraining the mind-stuff (Chitta) from taking various forms (Vrittis).

A good deal of explanation is necessary here. We have to understand what Chitta is, and what the Vrittis are. I have eyes. Eyes do not see. Take away the brain centre which is in the head, the eyes will still be there, the retinae complete, as also the pictures of objects on them and yet the eyes will not see. So the eyes are only a secondary instrument, not the organ of vision. The organ of vision is in a nerve centre of the brain. The two eyes will not be sufficient. Sometimes a man is asleep with his eyes open. The light is there and the picture is there, but a third thing is necessary--the mind must be joined to the organ. The eye is the external instrument; we need also the brain centre and the agency of the mind. Carriages roll down a street, and you do not hear them. Why? Because your mind has not attached itself to the organ of hearing. First, there is the instrument, then there is the organ, and third, the mind attached to these two. The mind takes the impression farther in, and presents it to the determinative faculty--Buddhi--which reacts. Along with this reaction flashes the idea of egoism. Then this mixture of action and reaction is presented to the Purusha, the real Soul, who perceives an object in this mixture. The organs (Indriyas), together with the mind (Manas), the determinative faculty (Buddhi), and egoism (Ahankara), form the group called the Antahkarana (the internal instrument). They are but various processes in the mind-stuff, called Chitta. The waves of thought in the Chitta are called Vrittis (literally "whirlpool"). What is thought? Thought is a force, as is gravitation or repulsion. From the infinite storehouse of force in nature, the instrument called Chitta takes hold of some, absorbs it and sends it out as thought. Force is supplied to us through food, and out of that food the body obtains the power of motion etc. Others, the finer forces, it throws out in what we call thought. So we see that the mind is not intelligent; yet it appears to be intelligent. Why? Because the intelligent soul is behind it. You are the only sentient being; mind is only the instrument through which you catch the external world. Take this book; as a book it does not exist outside, what exists outside is unknown and unknowable. The unknowable furnishes the suggestion that gives a blow to the mind, and the mind gives out the reaction in the form of a book, in the same manner as when a stone is thrown into the water, the water is thrown against it in the form of waves. The real universe is the occasion of the reaction of the mind. A book form, or an elephant form, or a man form, is not outside; all that we know is our mental reaction from the outer suggestion. "Matter is the permanent possibility of sensations," said John Stuart Mill. It is only the suggestion that is outside. Take an oyster for example. You know how pearls are made. A parasite gets inside the shell and causes irritation, and the oyster throws a sort of 1 enamelling round it, and this makes the pearl. The universe of 2 experience is our own enamel, so to say, and the real universe is the 3 parasite serving as nucleus. The ordinary man will never 4 understand it, because when he tries to do so, he throws out an 5 enamel, and sees only his own enamel. Now we understand what is 6 meant by these Vrittis. The real man is behind the mind; the mind is 7 the instrument in his hands; it is his intelligence that is percolating 8 through the mind. It is only when you stand behind the mind that it 9 becomes intelligent. When man gives it up, it falls to pieces and is 10 nothing. Thus you understand what is meant by Chitta. It is the 11 mind-stuff, and Vrittis are the waves and ripples rising in it when 12 external causes impinge on it. These Vrittis are our universe.

13 The bottom of a lake we cannot see, because its surface is 14 covered with ripples. It is only possible for us to catch a glimpse of 15 the bottom, when the ripples have subsided, and the water is calm.
16 If the water is muddy or is agitated all the time, the bottom will not 17 be seen. If it is clear, and there are no waves, we shall see the 18 bottom. The bottom of the lake is our own true Self; the lake is the 19 Chitta and the waves the Vrittis. Again, the mind is in three states, 20 one of which is darkness, called Tamas, found in brutes and idiots;
21 it only acts to injure. No other idea comes into that state of mind.
22 Then there is the active state of mind, Rajas, whose chief motives 23 are power and enjoyment. "I will be powerful and rule others." Then 24 there is the state called Sattva, serenity, calmness, in which the 25 waves cease, and the water of the mind-lake becomes clear. It is not 26 inactive, but rather intensely active. It is the greatest manifestation 27 of power to be calm. It is easy to be active. Let the reins go, and the 28 horses will run away with you. Anyone can do that, but he who can 29 stop the plunging horses is the strong man. Which requires the 30 greater strength, letting go or restraining? The calm man is not the 31 man who is dull. You must not mistake Sattva for dullness or 32 laziness. The calm man is the one who has control over the mind 33 waves. Activity is the manifestation of inferior strength, calmness, 34 of the superior.

35 The Chitta is always trying to get back to its natural pure 36 state, but the organs draw it out. To restrain it, to check this 37 outward tendency, and to start it on the return journey to the 38 essence of intelligence is the first step in Yoga, because only in this 39 way can the Chitta get into its proper course.

40 Although the Chitta is in every animal, from the lowest to the 41 highest, it is only in the human form that we find it as the intellect.
42 Until the mind-stuff can take the form of intellect it is not possible 43 for it to return through all these steps, and liberate the soul.
44 Immediate salvation is impossible for the cow or the dog, although 45 they have mind, because their Chitta cannot as yet take that form 46 which we call intellect.

47 The Chitta manifests itself in the following forms--scattering, 48 darkening, gathering, one-pointed, and concentrated. The 49 scattering form is activity. Its tendency is to manifest in the form of 50 pleasure or of pain. The darkening form is dullness which tends to 51 injury. The commentator says, the third form is natural to the 52 Devas, the angels, and the first and second to the demons. The 1 gathering form is when it struggles to centre itself. The one-pointed 2 form is when it tries to concentrate, and the concentrated form is 3 what brings us to Samadhi.

4 {Sanskrit}

5 3. At that time (the time of concentration) the seer (Purusha) 6 rests in his own (unmodified) state.

7 As soon as the waves have stopped, and the lake has become 8 quiet, we see its bottom. So with the mind; when it is calm, we see 9 what our own nature is; we do not mix ourselves but remain our 10 own selves.

11 {Sanskrit}

12 4. At other times (other than that of concentration) the seer is 13 identified with the modifications.

14 For instance, someone blames me; this produces a 15 modification, Vritti, in my mind, and I identify myself with it, and 16 the result is misery.

17 {Sanskrit}

18 5. There are five classes of modifications, (some) painful and 19 (others) not painful.

20 {Sanskrit}

21 6. (These are) right knowledge, indiscrimination, verbal 22 delusion, sleep, and memory.

23 {Sanskrit}

24 7. Direct perception, inference, and competent evidence are 25 proofs.

26 When two of our perceptions do not contradict each other, we 27 call it proof. I hear something, and if it contradicts something 28 already perceived, I begin to fight it out, and do not believe it.
29 There are also three kinds of proof. Pratyaksha, direct perception; 30 whatever we see and feel, is proof, if there has been nothing to 31 delude the senses. I see the world; that is sufficient proof that it 32 exists. Secondly, Anumana, inference; you see a sign, and from the 33 sign you come to the thing signified. Thirdly, Aptavakya, the direct 34 evidence of the Yogis, of those who have seen the truth. We are all 35 of us struggling towards knowledge. But you and I have to struggle 36 hard, and come to knowledge through a long tedious process of 37 reasoning, but the Yogi, the pure one, has gone beyond all this.
38 Before his mind, the past, the present, and the future are alike, one 39 book for him to read; he does not require to go through the tedious 40 processes for knowledge we have to; his words are proof, because 41 he sees knowledge in himself. These, for instance, are the authors 42 of the sacred scriptures; therefore the scriptures are proof. If any 43 such persons are living now their words will be proof.

44 Other philosophers go into long discussions about Aptavakya 45 and they say, "What is the proof of their words?" The proof is their 46 direct perception. Because whatever I see is proof, and whatever 47 you see is proof, if it does not contradict any past knowledge. There

1 is knowledge beyond the senses, and whenever it does not 2 contradict reason and past human experience, that knowledge is 3 proof. Any madman may come into this room and say he sees angels 4 around him; that would not be proof. In the first place, it must be 5 true knowledge, and secondly, it must not contradict past 6 knowledge, and thirdly, it must depend upon the character of the 7 man who gives it out. I hear it said that the character of the man is 8 not of so much importance as what he may say; we must first hear 9 what he says. This may be true in other things. A man may be 10 wicked, and yet make an astronomical discovery, but in religion it is 11 different, because no impure man will ever have the power to reach 12 the truths of religion. Therefore we have first of all to see that the 13 man who declares himself to be an Apta is a perfectly unselfish and 14 holy person; secondly, that he has reached beyond the senses; and 15 thirdly, that what he says does not contradict the past knowledge of 16 humanity. Any new discovery of truth does not contradict the past 17 truth, but fits into it. And fourthly, that truth must have a possibility 18 of verification. If a man says, "I have seen a vision," and tells me 19 that I have no right to see it, I believe him not. Everyone must have 20 the power to see it for himself. No one who sells his knowledge is 21 an Apta. All these conditions must be fulfilled; you must first see 22 that the man is pure, and that he has no selfish motive; that he has 23 no thirst for gain or fame. Secondly, he must show that he is 24 superconscious. He must give us something that we cannot get 25 from our senses, and which is for the benefit of the world. Thirdly, 26 we must see that it does not contradict other truths; if it contradicts 27 other scientific truths reject it at once. Fourthly, the man should 28 never be singular; he should only represent what all men can attain.
29 The three sorts of proof are, then, direct sense-perception, 30 inference, and the words of an Apta. I cannot translate this word 31 into English. It is not the word "inspired", because inspiration is 32 believed to come from outside, while this knowledge comes from 33 the man himself. The literal meaning is "attained."

34 {Sanskrit}

35 8. Indiscrimination is false knowledge not established in real 36 nature.

37 The next class of Vrittis that arises is mistaking one thing for 38 another, as a piece of mother-of-pearl is taken for a piece of silver.

39 {Sanskrit}

40 9. Verbal delusion follows from words having no 41 (corresponding) reality.

42 There is another class of Vrittis called Vikalpa. A word is 43 uttered, and we do not wait to consider its meaning; we jump to a 44 conclusion immediately. It is the sign of weakness of the Chitta.
45 Now you can understand the theory of restraint. The weaker the 46 man, the less he has of restraint. Examine yourselves always by that 47 test. When you are going to be angry or miserable, reason it out 48 how it is that some news that has come to you is throwing your 49 mind into Vrittis.

50 {Sanskrit}

1 10. Sleep is a Vritti which embraces the feeling of voidness.

2 The next class of Vrittis is called sleep and dream. When we 3 awake, we know that we have been sleeping; we can only have 4 memory of perception. That which we do not perceive we never can 5 have any memory of.

6 Every reaction is a wave in the lake. Now, if, during sleep, the 7 mind had no waves, it would have no perceptions, positive or 8 negative, and, therefore, we would not remember them. The very 9 reason of our remembering sleep is that during sleep there was a 10 certain class of waves in the mind. Memory is another class of 11 Vrittis which is called Smriti.

12 {Sanskrit}

13 11. Memory is when the (Vrittis of) perceived subjects do not 14 slip away (and through impressions come back to consciousness.

15 Memory can come from direct perception, false knowledge, 16 verbal delusion, and sleep. For instance, you hear a word. That 17 word is like a stone thrown into the lake of the Chitta; it causes a 18 ripple, and that ripple rouses a series of ripples; this is memory. So 19 in sleep. When the peculiar kind of ripple called sleep throws the 20 Chitta into a ripple of memory, it is called a dream. Dream is 21 another form of the ripple which in the waking state is called 22 memory.

24 12. Their control is by practice and non-attachment.

25 The mind, to have non-attachment, must be clear, good, and 26 rational. Why should we practise? Because each action is like the 27 pulsations quivering over the surface of the lake. The vibration dies 28 out, and what is left? The Samskaras, the impressions. When a 29 large number of these impressions are left on the mind, they 30 coalesce and become a habit. It is said, "Habit is second nature", it 31 is first nature also, and the whole nature of man; everything that we 32 are is the result of habit. That gives us consolation, because, if it is 33 only habit, we can make and unmake it at any time. The Samskaras 34 are left by these vibrations passing out of our mind, each one of 35 them leaving its result. Our character is the sum-total of these 36 marks, and according as some particular wave prevails one takes 37 that tone. If good prevails, one becomes good; if wickedness, one 38 becomes wicked; if joyfulness, one becomes happy. The only remedy 39 for bad habits is counter habits; all the bad habits that have left 40 their impressions are to be controlled by good habits. Go on doing 41 good, thinking holy thoughts continuously; that is the only way to 42 suppress base impressions. Never say any man is hopeless, because 43 he only represents a character, a bundle of habits, which can be 44 checked by new and better ones. Character is repeated habits, and 45 repeated habits alone can reform character.

46 {Sanskrit}

47 13. Continuous struggle to keep them (the Vrittis) perfectly 48 restrained is practice.

49 What is practice? The attempt to restrain the mind in Chitta

1 form, to prevent its going out into waves.

2 {Sanskrit}

3 14. It becomes firmly grounded by long constant efforts with 4 great love (for the end to be attained).

5 Restraint does not come in one day, but by long continued
6 practice.

7 {Sanskrit}

8 15. That effect which comes to those who have given up their 9 thirst after objects, either seen or heard, and which wills to control 10 the objects, is non-attachment.

11 The two motive powers of our actions are (1) what we see 12 ourselves, (2) the experience of others. These two forces throw the 13 mind, the lake, into various waves. Renunciation is the power of 14 battling against these forces and holding the mind in check. Their 15 renunciation is what we want. I am passing through a street, and a 16 man comes and takes away my watch. That is my own experience. I 17 see it myself, and it immediately throws my Chitta into a wave, 18 taking the form of anger. Allow not that to come. If you cannot 19 prevent that, you are nothing; if you can, you have Vairagya. Again, 20 the experience of the worldly-minded teaches us that sense-21 enjoyments are the highest ideal. These are tremendous 22 temptations. To deny them, and not allow the mind to come to a 23 wave form with regard to them, is renunciation; to control the 24 twofold motive powers arising from my own experience and from 25 the experience of others, and thus prevent the Chitta from being 26 governed by them, is Vairagya. These should be controlled by me, 27 and not I by them. This sort of mental strength is called 28 renunciation. Vairagya is the only way to freedom.

29 {Sanskrit}

30 16. That is extreme non-attachment which gives up even the 31 qualities, and comes from the knowledge of (the real nature of) the 32 Purusha.

33 It is the highest manifestation of the power of Vairagya when 34 it takes away even our attraction towards the qualities. We have 35 first to understand what the Purusha, the Self, is and what the 36 qualities are. According to Yoga philosophy, the whole of nature 37 consists of three qualities or forces; one is called Tamas, another 38 Rajas, and the third Sattva. These three qualities manifest 39 themselves in the physical world as darkness or inactivity, 40 attraction or repulsion, and equilibrium of the two. Everything that 41 is in nature, all manifestations, are combinations and 42 recombinations of these three forces. Nature has been divided into 43 various categories by the Sankhyas; the Self of man is beyond all 44 these, beyond nature. It is effulgent, pure, and perfect. Whatever of 45 intelligence we see in nature is but the reflection of this Self upon 46 nature. Nature itself is insentient. You must remember that the 47 word nature also includes the mind; mind is in nature; thought is in 48 nature; from thought, down to the grossest form of matter, 49 everything is in nature, the manifestation of nature. This nature has covered the Self of man, and when nature takes away the covering, the self appears in Its own glory. The non-attachment, as described in aphorism 15 (as being control of objects or nature) is the greatest help towards manifesting the Self. The next aphorism defines Samadhi, perfect concentration, which is the goal of the Yogi.

{Sanskrit}

17. The concentration called right knowledge is that which is followed by reasoning, discrimination, bliss, unqualified egoism.

Samadhi is divided into two varieties. One is called the Samprajnata, and the other the Asamprajnata. In the Samprajnata Samadhi come all the powers of controlling nature. It is of four varieties. The first variety is called the Savitarka, when the mind meditates upon an object again and again, by isolating it from other objects. There are two sorts of objects for meditation in the twenty-five categories of the Sankhyas, (1) the twenty-four insentient categories of Nature, and (2) the one sentient Purusha. This part of Yoga is based entirely on Sankhya philosophy, about which I have already told you. As you will remember, egoism and will and mind have a common basis, the Chitta or the mind-stuff, out of which they are all manufactured. The mind-stuff takes in the forces of nature, and projects them as thought. There must be something, again, where both force and matter are one.

This is called Avyakta, the unmanifest state of nature before creation, and to which, after the end of a cycle, the whole of nature returns, to come out again after another period. Beyond that is the Purusha, the essence of intelligence. Knowledge is power, and as soon as we begin to know a thing, we get power over it; so also when the mind begins to meditate on the different elements, it gains power over them. That sort of meditation where the external gross elements are the objects is called Savitarka. Vitarka means question; Savitarka, with question, questioning the elements, as it were, that they may give their truths and their powers to the man who meditates upon them. There is no liberation in getting powers. It is a worldly search after enjoyments, and there is no enjoyment in this life; all search for enjoyment is vain; this is the old, old lesson which man finds so hard to learn. When he does learn it, he gets out of the universe and becomes free. The possession of what are called occult powers is only intensifying the world, and in the end, intensifying suffering. Though as a scientist Patanjali is bound to point out the possibilities of this science, he never misses an opportunity to warn us against these powers.

Again, in the very same meditation, when one struggles to take the elements out of time and space, and think of them as they are, it is called Nirvitarka, without question. When the meditation goes a step higher, and takes the Tanmatras as its object, and thinks of them as in time and space, it is called Savichara, with discrimination; and when in the same meditation one eliminates time and space, and thinks of the fine elements as they are, it is called Nirvichara, without discrimination. The next step is when the elements are given up, both gross and fine, and the object of meditation is the interior organ, the thinking organ. When the thinking organ is thought of as bereft of the qualities of activity and dullness, it is then called Sananda, the blissful Samadhi. When the mind itself is the object of meditation, when meditation becomes very ripe and concentrated, when all ideas of the gross and fine materials are given up, when the Sattva state only of the Ego remains, but differentiated from all other objects, it is called Sasmita Samadhi. The man who has attained to this has attained to what is called in the Vedas "bereft of body". He can think of himself as without his gross body; but he will have to think of himself as with a fine body. Those that in this state get merged in nature without attaining the goal are called Prakritilayas, but those who do not stop even there reach the goal, which is freedom.

{Sanskrit}

18. There is another Samadhi which is attained by the constant practice of cessation of all mental activity, in which the Chitta retains only the unmanifested impressions.

This is the perfect superconscious Asamprajnata Samadhi, the state which gives us freedom. The first state does not give us freedom, does not liberate the soul. A man may attain to all powers, and yet fall again. There is no safeguard until the soul goes beyond nature. It is very difficult to do so, although the method seems easy. The method is to meditate on the mind itself, and whenever thought comes, to strike it down, allowing no thought to come into the mind, thus making it an entire vacuum. When we can really do this, that very moment we shall attain liberation. When persons without training and preparation try to make their minds vacant, they are likely to succeed only in covering themselves with Tamas, the material of ignorance, which make the mind dull and stupid, and leads them to think that they are making a vacuum of the mind. To be able to really do that is to manifest the greatest strength, the highest control. When this state, Asamprajnata, superconsciousness, is reached, the Samadhi becomes seedless. What is meant by that? In a concentration where there is consciousness, where the mind succeeds only in quelling the waves in the Chitta and holding them down, the waves remain in the form of tendencies. These tendencies (or seeds) become waves again, when the time comes. But when you have destroyed all these tendencies, almost destroyed the mind, then the Samadhi becomes seedless; there are no more seeds in the mind out of which to manufacture again and again this plant of life, this ceaseless round of birth and death.

You may ask, what state would that be in which there is no mind, there is no knowledge? What we call knowledge is a lower state than the one beyond knowledge. You must always bear in mind that the extremes look very much alike. If a very low vibration of ether is taken as darkness, an intermediate state as light, very high vibration will be darkness again. Similarly, ignorance is the lowest state, knowledge is the middle state, and beyond knowledge is the highest state, the two extremes of which seem the same. Knowledge itself is a manufactured something, a combination; it is not reality.

1 What is the result of constant practice of this higher 2 concentration? All old tendencies of restlessness and dullness will 3 be destroyed, as well as the tendencies of goodness too. The case is 4 similar to that of the chemicals used to take the dirt and alloy off 5 gold. When the ore is smelted down, the dross is burnt along with 6 the chemicals. So this constant controlling power will stop the 7 previous bad tendencies, and eventually, the good ones also. Those 8 good and evil tendencies will suppress each other, leaving alone the 9 Soul, in its own splendour untrammelled by either good or bad, the 10 omnipresent, omnipotent, and omniscient. Then the man will know 11 that he had neither birth nor death, nor need for heaven or earth.
12 He will know that he neither came nor went, it was nature which 13 was moving, and that movement was reflected upon the soul. The 14 form of the light reflected by the glass upon the wall moves, and the 15 wall foolishly thinks it is moving. So with all of us; it is the Chitta 16 constantly moving making itself into various forms, and we think 17 that we are these various forms. All these delusions will vanish.
18 When that free Soul will command--not pray or beg, but command-- 19 then whatever It desires will be immediately fulfilled; whatever It 20 wants It will be able to do. According to the Sankhya philosophy, 21 there is no God. It says that there can be no God of this universe, 22 because if there were one, He must be a soul, and a soul must be 23 either bound or free. How can the soul that is bound by nature, or 24 controlled by nature, create? It is itself a slave. On the other hand, 25 why should the Soul that is free create and manipulate all these 26 things? It has no desires, so it cannot have any need to create.
27 Secondly, it says the theory of God is an unnecessary one; nature 28 explains all. What is the use of any God? But Kapila teaches that 29 there are many souls, who, though nearly attaining perfection, fall 30 short because they cannot perfectly renounce all powers. Their 31 minds for a time merge in nature, to re-emerge as its masters. Such 32 gods there are. We shall all become such gods, and, according to 33 the Sankhyas, the God spoken of in the Vedas really means one of 34 these free souls. Beyond them there is not an eternally free and 35 blessed Creator of the universe. On the other hand, the Yogis say, 36 "Not so, there is a God; there is one Soul separate from all other 37 souls, and He is the eternal Master of all creation, the ever free, the 38 Teacher of all teachers." The Yogis admit that those whom the 39 Sankhyas call "the merged in nature" also exist. They are Yogis who 40 have fallen short of perfection, and though, for a time, debarred 41 from attaining the goal, remain as rulers of parts of the universe.

42 {Sanskrit}

43 19. (This Samadhi when not followed by extreme non-44 attachment) becomes the cause of the re-manifestation of the gods 45 and of those that become merged in nature.

46 The gods in the Indian systems of philosophy represent 47 certain high offices which are filled successively by various souls.
48 But none of them is perfect.

49 {Sanskrit}

50 20. To others (this Samadhi) comes through faith, energy, 51 memory, concentration, and discrimination of the real.

1 These are they who do not want the position of gods or even 2 that of rulers of cycles. They attain to liberation.

3 {Sanskrit}

4 21. Success is speedy for the extremely energetic.

5 {Sanskrit}

6 22. The success of Yogis differs according as the means they 7 adopt are mild, medium, or intense.

8 {Sanskrit}

9 23. Or by devotion to Ishvara.

10 {Sanskrit}

11 24. Ishvara (the Supreme Ruler) is a special Purusha, 12 untouched by misery, actions, their results, and desires.

13 We must again remember that the Patanjala Yoga philosophy
14 is based upon the Sankhya philosophy; only in the latter there is no 15 place for God, while with the Yogis God has a place. The Yogis, 16 however, do not mention many ideas about God, such as creating.
17 God as the Creator of the universe is not meant by the Ishvara of 18 the Yogis. According to the Vedas, Ishvara is the Creator of the 19 universe; because it is harmonious, it must be the manifestation of 20 one will. The Yogis want to establish a God, but they arrive at Him 21 in a peculiar fashion of their own. They say:

22 {Sanskrit}

23 25. In Him becomes infinite that all-knowingness which in 24 others is (only) a germ.

25 The mind must always travel between two extremes. You can 26 think of limited space, but that very idea gives you also unlimited 27 space. Close your eyes and think of a little space; at the same time 28 that you perceive the little circle, you have a circle round it of 29 unlimited dimensions. It is the same with time. Try to think of a 30 second; you will have, with the same act of perception, to think of 31 time which is unlimited. So with knowledge. Knowledge is only a 32 germ in man, but you will have to think of infinite knowledge 33 around it, so that the very constitution of our mind shows us that 34 there is unlimited knowledge, and the Yogis call that unlimited 35 knowledge God.

36 {Sanskrit}

37 26. He is the Teacher of even the ancient teachers, being to 38 limited by time.

39 It is true that all knowledge is within ourselves, but this has 40 to be called forth by another knowledge. Although the capacity to 41 know is inside us, it must be called out, and that calling out of 42 knowledge can only be done, a Yogi maintains, through another 43 knowledge. Dead, insentient matter never calls out knowledge, it is 44 the action of knowledge that brings out knowledge. Knowing beings 45 must be with us to call forth what is in us, so these teachers were 46 always necessary. The world was never without them, and no 47 knowledge can come without them. God is the Teacher of all

1 teachers, because these teachers, however great they may have 2 been--gods or angels--were all bound and limited by time, while God 3 is not. There are two peculiar deductions of the Yogis. The first is 4 that in thinking of the limited, the mind must think of the unlimited; 5 and that if one part of that perception is true, so also must the other 6 be, for the reason that their value as perceptions of the mind is 7 equal. The very fact that man has a little knowledge shows that God 8 has unlimited knowledge. If I am to take one, why not the other?
9 Reason forces me to take both or reject both. If I believe that there 10 is a man with a little knowledge, I must also admit that there is 11 someone behind him with unlimited knowledge. The second 12 deduction is that no knowledge can come without a teacher. It is 13 true, as the modern philosophers say, that there is something in 14 man which evolves out of him; all knowledge is in man, but certain 15 environments are necessary to call it out. We cannot find any 16 knowledge without teachers. If there are men teachers, god 17 teachers, or angel teachers, they are all limited; who was the 18 teacher before them. We are forced to admit, as a last conclusion, 19 one teacher who is not limited by time; and that One Teacher of 20 infinite knowledge, without beginning or end, is called God.

21 {Sanskrit}

22 27. His manifesting word is Om.

23 Every idea that you have in the mind has a counterpart in a 24 word; the word and the thought are inseparable. The external part 25 of one and the same thing is what we call word, and the internal 26 part is what we call thought. No man can, by analysis, separate 27 thought from word. The idea that language was created by men-- 28 certain men sitting together and deciding upon words, has been 29 proved to be wrong. So long as man has existed there have been 30 words and language. What is the connection between an idea and a 31 word? Although we see that there must always be a word with a 32 thought, it is not necessary that the same thought requires the 33 same word. The thought may be the same in twenty different 34 countries, yet the language is different. We must have a word to 35 express each thought, but these words need not necessarily have 36 the same sound. Sounds will vary in different nations. Our 37 commentator says, "Although the relation between thought and 38 word is perfectly natural, yet it does not mean a rigid connection 39 between one sound and one idea." These sounds vary, yet the 40 relation between the sounds and the thoughts is a natural one. The 41 connection between thoughts and sounds is good only if there be a 42 real connection between the thing signified and the symbol; until 43 then that symbol will never come into general use. A symbol is the 44 manifest of the thing signified, and if the thing signified has 45 already an existence, and if, by experience, we know that the 46 symbol has expressed that thing many times, then we are sure that 47 there is a real relation between them. Even if the things are not 48 present, there will be thousands who will know them by their 49 symbols. There must be a natural connection between the symbol 50 and the thing signified; then, when that symbol is pronounced, it 51 recalls the thing signified. The commentator says the manifesting 52 word of God is Om. Why does he emphasise this word? There are

1 hundreds of words for God. One thought is connected with a 2 thousand words; the idea "God" is connected with hundreds of 3 words, and each one stands as a symbol for God. Very good. But 4 there must be a generalisation among all these words, some 5 substratum, some common ground of all these symbols, and that 6 which is the common symbol will be the best, and will really 7 represent them all. In making a sound we use the larynx and the 8 palate as a sounding board. Is there any material sound of which all 9 other sounds must be manifestations, one which is the most natural 10 sound? Om (Aum) is such a sound, the basis of all sounds. The first 11 letter, A, is the root sound, the key, pronounced without touching 12 any part of the tongue or palate; M represents the last sound in the 13 series, being produced by the closed lips, and the U rolls from the 14 very root to the end of the sounding board of the mouth. Thus, Om 15 represents the whole phenomena of sound-producing. As such, it 16 must be the natural symbol, the matrix of all the various sounds. It 17 denotes the whole range and possibility of all the words that can be 18 made. Apart from these speculations, we see that around this word 19 Om are centred all the different religious ideas in India; all the 20 various religious ideas of the Vedas have gathered themselves 21 round this word Om. What has that to do with America and 22 England, or any other country? Simply this, that the word has been 23 retained at every stage of religious growth in India, and it has been 24 manipulated to mean all the various ideas about God. Monists, 25 dualists, mono-dualists, separatists, and even atheists took up this 26 Om. Om has become the one symbol for the religious aspiration of 27 the vast majority of human beings. Take, for instance, the English 28 word God. It covers only a limited function, and if you go beyond it, 29 you have to add adjectives, to make it Personal, or Impersonal, or 30 Absolute God. So with the words for God in every other language; 31 their signification is very small. This word Om, however, has around 32 it all the various significances. As such it should be accepted by 33 everyone.

34 {Sanskrit}

35 28. The repetition of this (Om) and meditating on its meaning 36 (is the way).

37 Why should there be repetition? We have not forgotten the 38 theory of Samskaras, that the sum-total of impressions lives in the 39 mind. They become more and more latent but remain there, and as 40 soon as they get the right stimulus, they come out. Molecular 41 vibration never ceases. When this universe is destroyed, all the 42 massive vibrations disappear; the sun, moon, stars, and earth, melt 43 down; but the vibrations remain in the atoms. Each atom performs 44 the same function as the big worlds do. So even when the vibrations 45 of the Chitta subside, its molecular vibrations go on, and when they 46 get the impulse, come out again. We can now understand what is 47 meant by repetition. It is the greatest stimulus that can be given to 48 the spiritual Samskaras. "One moment of company with the holy 49 makes a ship to cross this ocean of life." Such is the power of 50 association. So this repetition of Om, and thinking of its meaning, is 51 keeping good company in your own mind. Study, and then meditate 52 on what you have studied. Thus light will come to you, the Self will 1 become manifest.

2 But one must think of Om, and of its meaning too. Avoid evil 3 company, because the scars of old wounds are in you, and evil 4 company is just the thing that is necessary to call them out. In the 5 same way we are told that good company will call out the good 6 impressions that are in us, but which have become latent. There is 7 nothing holier in the world than to keep good company, because the 8 good impressions will then tend to come to the surface.

9 {Sanskrit}

10 29. From that is gained (the knowledge of) introspection, and 11 the destruction of obstacles.

12 The first manifestation of the repetition and thinking of Om is 13 that the introspective power will manifest more and more, all the 14 mental and physical obstacles will begin to vanish. What are the 15 obstacles to the Yogi?

16 {Sanskrit}

17 30. Disease, mental laziness, doubt, lack of enthusiasm, 18 lethargy, clinging to sense-enjoyments, false perception, non-19 attaining concentration, and falling away from the state when 20 obtained, are the obstructing distractions.

21 Disease. This body is the boat which will carry us to the other 22 shore of the ocean of life. It must be taken care of. Unhealthy 23 persons cannot be Yogis. Mental laziness makes us lose all lively 24 interest in the subject, without which there will neither be the will 25 nor the energy to practise. Doubts will arise in the mind about the 26 truth of the science, however strong one's intellectual conviction 27 may be, until certain peculiar psychic experiences come, as hearing 28 or seeing at a distance, etc. These glimpses strengthen the mind 29 and make the student persevere. Falling away...when obtained.
30 Some days or weeks when you are practising, the mind will be calm 31 and easily concentrated, and you will find yourself progressing fast.
32 All of a sudden the progress will stop one day, and you will find 33 yourself, as it were, stranded. Persevere. All progress proceeds by 34 such rise and fall.

35 {Sanskrit}

36 31. Grief, mental distress, tremor of the body, irregular 37 breathing, accompany non-retention of concentration.

38 Concentration will bring perfect repose to mind and body
39 every time it is practised. When the practice has been misdirected, 40 or not enough controlled, these disturbances come. Repetition of 41 Om and self-surrender to the Lord will strengthen the mind, and 42 bring fresh energy. The nervous shakings will come to almost 43 everyone. Do not mind them at all, but keep on practising. Practice 44 will cure them, and make the seat firm.

45 {Sanskrit}

46 32. To remedy this, the practice of one subject (should be 47 made).

48 Making the mind take the form of one object for some time

1 will destroy these obstacles. This is general advice. In the following 2 aphorisms it will be expanded and particularised. As one practice 3 cannot suit everyone, various methods will be advanced, and 4 everyone by actual experience will find out that which helps him 5 most.

6 {Sanskrit}

7 33. Friendship, mercy, gladness, and indifference, being 8 thought of in regard to subjects, happy, unhappy, good, and evil 9 respectively, pacify the Chitta.

10 We must have these four sorts of ideas. We must have 11 friendship for all; we must be merciful towards those that are in 12 misery; when people are happy, we ought to be happy; and to the 13 wicked we must be indifferent. So with all subjects that come 14 before us. If the subject is a good one, we shall feel friendly 15 towards it; if the subject of thought is one that is miserable, we 16 must be merciful towards it. If it is good, we must be glad; if it is 17 evil, we must be indifferent. These attitudes of the mind towards 18 the different subjects that come before it will make the mind 19 peaceful. Most of our difficulties in our daily lives come from being 20 unable to hold our minds in this way. For instance, if a man does 21 evil to us, instantly we want to react evil, and every reaction of evil 22 shows that we are not able to hold the Chitta down; it comes out in 23 waves towards the object, and we lose our power. Every reaction in 24 the form of hatred or evil is so much loss to the mind; and every evil 25 thought or deed of hatred, or any thought of reaction, if it is 26 controlled, will be laid in our favour. It is not that we lose by thus 27 restraining ourselves; we are gaining infinitely more than we 28 suspect. Each time we suppress hatred, or a feeling of anger, it is so 29 much good energy stored up in our favour; that piece of energy will 30 be converted into the higher powers.

31 {Sanskrit}

32 34. By throwing out and restraining the Breath.

33 The word used is Prana. Prana is not exactly breath. It is the 34 name for the energy that is in the universe. Whatever you see in the 35 universe, whatever moves or works, or has life, is a manifestation of 36 this Prana. The sum-total of the energy displayed in the universe is 37 called Prana. This Prana, before a cycle begins, remains in an 38 almost motionless state; and when the cycle begins, this Prana 39 begins to manifest itself. It is this Prana that is manifested as 40 motion--as the nervous motion in human beings or animals; and the 41 same Prana is manifesting as thought, and so on. The whole 42 universe is a combination of Prana and Akasha; so is the human 43 body. Out of Akasha you get the different materials that you feel 44 and see, and out of Prana all the various forces. Now this throwing 45 out and restraining the Prana is what is called Pranayama.
46 Patanjali, the father of the Yoga philosophy, does not give very 47 many particular directions about Pranayama, but later on other 48 Yogis found out various things about this Pranayama, and made of it 49 a great science. With Patanjali it is one of the many ways, but he 50 does not lay much stress on it. He means that you simply throw the 51 air out, and draw it in, and hold it for some time, that is all, and by

1 that, the mind will become a little calmer. But, later on, you will find 2 that out of this is evolved a particular science called Pranayama. We 3 shall hear a little of what these later Yogis have to say.

4 Some of this I have told you before, but a little repetition will 5 serve to fix it in your minds. First, you must remember that this 6 Prana is not the breath; but that which causes the motion of the 7 breath, that which is the vitality of the breath, is the Prana. Again, 8 the word Prana is used for all the senses; they are all called Pranas, 9 the mind is called Prana; and so we see that Prana is force. And yet 10 we cannot call it force, because force is only the manifestation of it.
11 It is that which manifests itself as force and everything else in the 12 way of motion. The Chitta, the mind-stuff, is the engine which draws 13 in the Prana from the surroundings, and manufactures out of Prana 14 the various vital forces--those that keep the body in preservation-- 15 and thought, will, and all other powers. By the above-mentioned 16 process of breathing we can control all the various motions in the 17 body, and the various nerve currents that are running through the 18 body. First we begin to recognise them, and then we slowly get 19 control over them.

20 Now, these later Yogis consider that there are three main 21 currents of this Prana in the human body. One they call Ida, another 22 Pingala, and the third Sushumna. Pingala, according to them, is on 23 the right side of the spinal column, and the Ida on the left, and in 24 the middle of the spinal column is the Sushumna, an empty channel.
25 Ida and Pingala, according to them, are the currents working in 26 every man, and through these currents, we are performing all the 27 functions of life. Sushumna is present in all, as a possibility; but it 28 works only in the Yogi. You must remember that Yoga changes the 29 body. As you go on practising, your body changes; it is not the same 30 body that you had before the practice. That is very rational, and can 31 be explained, because every new thought that we have must make, 32 as it were, a new channel through the brain, and that explains the 33 tremendous conservatism of human nature. Human nature likes to 34 run through the ruts that are already there, because it is easy. If we 35 think, just for example's sake, that the mind is like a needle, and the 36 brain substance a soft lump before it, then each thought that we 37 have makes a street, as it were, in the brain, and this street would 38 close up, but for the grey matter which comes and makes a lining to 39 keep it separate. If there were no grey matter, there would be no 40 memory, because memory means going over these old streets, 41 retracing a thought as it were. Now perhaps you have marked that 42 when one talks on subjects in which one takes a few ideas that are 43 familiar to everyone, and combines and recombines them, it is easy 44 to follow because these channels are present in everyone's brain, 45 and it is only necessary to recur them. But whenever a new subject 46 comes, new channels have to be made, so it is not understood 47 readily. And that is why the brain (it is the brain, and not the people 48 themselves) refuses unconsciously to be acted upon by new ideas. It 49 resists. The Prana is trying to make new channels, and the brain 50 will not allow it. This is the secret of conservatism. The fewer 51 channels there have been in the brain, and the less the needle of 52 the Prana has made these passages, the more conservative will be

1 the brain, the more it will struggle against new thoughts. The more 2 thoughtful the man, the more complicated will be the streets in his 3 brain, and the more easily he will take to new ideas, and 4 understand them. So with every fresh idea, we make a new 5 impression in the brain, cut new channels through the brain-stuff, 6 and that is why we find that in the practice of Yoga (it being an 7 entirely new set of thoughts and motives) there is so much physical 8 resistance at first. That is why we find that the part of religion 9 which deals with the world-side of nature is so widely accepted, 10 while the other part, the philosophy, or the psychology, which deals 11 with the inner nature of man, is so frequently neglected.

12 We must remember the definition of this world of ours; it is 13 only the Infinite Existence projected into the plane of 14 consciousness. A little of the Infinite is projected into 15 consciousness, and that we call our world. So there is an Infinite 16 beyond; and religion has to deal with both--with the little lump we 17 call our world, and with the Infinite beyond. Any religion which 18 deals with one only of these two will be defective. It must deal with 19 both. The part of religion which deals with the part of the Infinite 20 which has come into the plane of consciousness, got itself caught, 21 as it were, in the plane of consciousness, in the cage of time, space, 22 and causation, is quite familiar to us, because we are in that 23 already, and ideas about this world have been with us almost from 24 time immemorial. The part of religion which deals with the Infinite 25 beyond comes entirely new to us, and getting ideas about it 26 produces new channels in the brain, disturbing the whole system, 27 and that is why you find in the practice of Yoga ordinary people are 28 at first turned out of their grooves. In order to lessen these 29 disturbances as much as possible, all these methods are devised by 30 Patanjali, that we may practise any one of them best suited to us.

31 {Sanskrit}

32 35. Those forms of concentration that bring extraordinary 33 sense-perceptions cause perseverance of the mind.

34 This naturally comes with Dharana, concentration; the Yogis 35 say, if the mind becomes concentrated on the tip of the nose, one 36 begins to smell, after a few days, wonderful perfumes. If it becomes 37 concentrated at the root of the tongue, one begins to hear sounds; 38 if on the tip of the tongue, one begins to taste wonderful flavours; if 39 on the middle of the tongue, one feels as if one were coming in 40 contact with something. If one concentrates one's mind on the 41 palate, one begins to see peculiar things. If a man whose mind is 42 disturbed wants to take up some of these practices of Yoga, yet 43 doubts the truth of them, he will have his doubts set at rest when, 44 after a little practice, these things come to him, and he will 45 persevere.

46 {Sanskrit}

47 36. Or (by the meditation on) the Effulgent Light, which is 48 beyond all sorrow.

49 This is another sort of concentration. Think of the lotus of the 50 heart, with petals downwards, and running through it, the 1 Sushumna; take in the breath, and while throwing the breath out 2 imagine that the lotus is turned with the petals upwards, and inside 3 that lotus is an effulgent light. Meditate on that.

4 {Sanskrit}

5 37. Or (by meditation on) the heart that has given up all 6 attachment to sense-objects.

7 Take some holy person, some great person whom you revere, 8 some saint whom you know to be perfectly non-attached, and think 9 of his heart. That heart has become non-attached, and meditate on 10 that heart; it will calm the mind. If you cannot do that, there is the 11 next way:

12 {Sanskrit}

13 38. Or by meditating on the knowledge that comes in sleep.

14 Sometimes a man dreams that he has seen angels coming to 15 him and talking to him, that he is in an ecstatic condition, that he 16 has heard music floating through the air. He is in a blissful 17 condition in that dream, and when he wakes, it makes a deep 18 impression on him. Think of that dream as real, and meditate upon 19 it. If you cannot do that, meditate on any holy thing that pleases 20 you.

21 {Sanskrit}

22 39. Or by the meditation on anything that appeals to one as 23 good.

24 This does not mean any wicked subject, but anything good 25 that you like, any place that you like best, any scenery that you like 26 best, any idea that you like best, anything that will concentrate the 27 mind.

28 {Sanskrit}

29 40. The Yogi's mind thus meditating, becomes unobstructed 30 from the atomic to the infinite.

31 The mind, by this practice, easily contemplates the most 32 minute, as well as the biggest thing. Thus the mind-waves become 33 fainter.

34 {Sanskrit}

35 41. The Yogi whose Vrittis have thus become powerless 36 (controlled) obtains in the receiver, (the instrument of) receiving, 37 and the received (the Self, the mind, and external objects), 38 concentratedness and sameness like the crystal (before different 39 coloured objects).

40 What results from this constant meditation? We must 41 remember how in a previous aphorism Patanjali went into the 42 various states of meditation, how the first would be the gross, the 43 second the fine, and from them the advance was to still finer 44 objects. The result of these meditations is that we can meditate as 45 easily on the fine as on the gross objects. Here the Yogi sees the 46 three things, the receiver, the received, and the receiving 47 instrument, corresponding to the Soul, external objects, and the mind. There are three objects of meditation given us. First, the gross things, as bodies, or material objects; second, fine things, as the mind, the Chitta; and third, the Purusha qualified, not the Purusha itself, but the Egoism. By practice, the Yogi gets established in all these meditations. Whenever he meditates he can keep out all other thoughts; he becomes identified with that on which he meditates. When he meditates, he is like a piece of crystal. Before flowers the crystal becomes almost identified with the flowers. If the flower is red, the crystal looks red, or if the flower is blue, the crystal looks blue.

{Sanskrit}

42. Sound, meaning, and resulting knowledge, being mixed up, is (called) Samadhi with question.

Sound here means vibration, meaning the nerve currents which conduct it; and knowledge, reaction. All the various meditations we have had so far, Patanjali calls Savitarka (meditation with question). Later on he gives us higher and higher Dhyanas. In these that are called "with question," we keep the duality of subject and object, which results from the mixture of word, meaning, and knowledge. There is first the external vibration, the word. This, carried inward by the sense currents, is the meaning. After that there comes a reactionary wave in the Chitta, which is knowledge, but the mixture of these three makes up what we call knowledge. In all the meditations up to this we get this mixture as objects of meditation. The next Samadhi is higher.

{Sanskrit}

43. The Samadhi called "without question" (comes) when the memory is purified, or devoid of qualities, expressing only the meaning (of the meditated object).

It is by the practice of meditation of these three that we come to the state where these three do not mix. We can get rid of them. We will first try to understand what these three are. Here is the Chitta; you will always remember the simile of the mind-stuff to a lake, and the vibration, the word, the sound, like a pulsation coming over it. You have that calm lake in you, and I pronounce a word, "Cow". As soon as it enters through your ears there is a wave produced in your Chitta along with it. So that wave represents the idea of the cow, the form or the meaning as we call it. The apparent cow that you know is really the wave in the mind-stuff that comes as a reaction to the internal and external sound vibrations. With the sound, the wave dies away; it can never exist without a word. You may ask how it is, when we only think of the cow, and do not hear a sound. You make that sound yourself. You are saying "cow" faintly in your mind, and with that comes a wave. There cannot be any wave without this impulse of sound; and when it is not from outside, it is from inside, and when the sound dies, the wave dies. What remains? The result of the reaction, and that is knowledge. These three are so closely combined in our mind that we cannot separate them. When the sound comes, the senses vibrate, and the wave rises in reaction; they follow so closely upon one another that there is no discerning one from the other. When this meditation has been

1 practised for a long time, memory, the receptacle of all impressions, 2 becomes purified, and we are able clearly to distinguish them from 3 one another. This is called Nirvitarka, concentration without 4 question.

5 {Sanskrit}

6 44. By this process, (the concentrations) with discrimination 7 and without discrimination, whose objects are finer, are (also) 8 explained.

9 A process similar to the preceding is applied again; only, the 10 objects to be taken up in the former meditations are gross; in this 11 they are fine.

12 {Sanskrit}

13 45. The finer objects end with the Pradhana.

14 The gross objects are only the elements and everything 15 manufactured out of them. The fine objects begin with the 16 Tanmatras or fine particles. The organs, the mind, egoism, the 17 mind-stuff (the cause of all manifestation), the equilibrium state of 18 Sattva, Rajas, and Tamas materials--called Pradhana (chief), 19 Prakriti (nature), or Avyakta (unmanifest)--are all included within 20 the category of fine objects, the Purusha (the Soul) along being 21 excepted.

23 46. These concentrations are with seed.

24 These do not destroy the seeds of past actions, and thus 25 cannot give liberation, but what they bring to the Yogi is stated in 26 the following aphorism.

27 {Sanskrit}

28 47. The concentration "without discrimination" being purified, 29 the Chitta becomes firmly fixed.

30 {Sanskrit}

31 48. The knowledge in that is called "filled with Truth".

32 The next aphorism will explain this.

33 {Sanskrit}

34 49. The knowledge that is gained from testimony and 35 inference is about common objects. That from the Samadhi just 36 mentioned is of a much higher order, being able to penetrate where 37 inference and testimony cannot go.

38 The idea is that we have to get our knowledge of ordinary 39 objects by direct perception, and by inference therefrom, and from 40 testimony of people who are competent. By "people who are 41 competent," the Yogis always mean the Rishis, or the Seers of the 42 thoughts recorded in the scriptures--the Vedas. According to them, 43 the only proof of the scriptures is that they were the testimony of 44 competent persons, yet they say the scriptures cannot take us to 45 realisation. We can read all the Vedas, and yet will not realise 46 anything, but when we practise their teachings, then we attain to 1 that state which realises what the scriptures say, which penetrates 2 where neither reason nor perception nor inference can go, and 3 where the testimony of others cannot avail. This is what is meant by 4 the aphorism.

5 Realisation is real religion, all the rest is only preparation-- 6 hearing lectures, or reading books, or reasoning is merely 7 preparing the ground; it is not religion. Intellectual assent and 8 intellectual dissent are not religion. The central idea of the Yogis is 9 that just as we come in direct contact with objects of the senses, so 10 religion even can be directly perceived in a far more intense sense.
11 The truths of religion, as God and Soul, cannot be perceived by the 12 external senses. I cannot see God with my eyes, nor can I touch 13 Him with my hands, and we also know that neither can we reason 14 beyond the senses. Reason leaves us at a point quite indecisive; we 15 may reason all our lives, as the world has been doing for thousands 16 of years, and the result is that we find we are incompetent to prove 17 or disprove the facts of religion. What we perceive directly we take 18 as the basis, and upon that basis we reason. So it is obvious that 19 reasoning has to run within these bounds of perception. It can 20 never go beyond. The whole scope of realisation, therefore, is 21 beyond sense-perception. The Yogis say that man can go beyond his 22 direct sense-perception, and beyond his reason also. Man has in 23 him the faculty, the power, of transcending his intellect even, a 24 power which is in every being, every creature. by the practice of 25 Yoga that power is aroused, and then man transcends the ordinary 26 limits of reason, and directly perceives things which are beyond all 27 reason.

28 {Sanskrit}

29 50. The resulting impression from this Samadhi obstructs all 30 other impressions.

31 We have seen in the foregoing aphorism that the only way of 32 attaining to that superconsciousness is by concentration, and we 33 have also seen that what hinders the mind from concentration are 34 the past Samskaras, impressions. All of you have observed that, 35 when you are trying to concentrate your mind, your thoughts 36 wander. When you are trying to think of God, that is the very time 37 these Samskaras appear. At other times they are not so active; but 38 when you want them not, they are sure to be there, trying their best 39 to crowd in your mind. Why should that be so? Why should they be 40 much more potent at the time of concentration? It is because you 41 are repressing them, and they react with all their force. At other 42 times they do not react. How countless these old past impressions 43 must be, all lodged somewhere in the Chitta, ready, waiting like 44 tigers, to jump up! These have to be suppressed that the one idea 45 which we want may arise, to the exclusion of the others. Instead 46 they are all struggling to come up at the same time. These are the 47 various powers of the Samskaras in hindering concentration of the 48 mind. So this Samadhi which has just been given is the best to be 49 practised, on account of its power of suppressing the Samskaras.
50 The Samskara which will be raised by this sort of concentration will 51 be so powerful that it will hinder the action of the others, and hold 52 them in check.

1 {Sanskrit}

2 51. By the restraint of even this (impression, which obstructs 3 all other impressions), all being restrained, comes the "seedless"
4 Samadhi.

5 You remember that our goal is to perceive the Soul itself. We 6 cannot perceive the Soul, because it has got mingled up with 7 nature, with the mind, with the body. The ignorant man thinks his 8 body is the Soul. The learned man thinks his mind is the Soul. But 9 both of them are mistaken. What makes the Soul get mingled up 10 with all this? Different waves in the Chitta rise and cover the Soul; 11 we only see a little reflection of the Soul through these waves; so, if 12 the wave is one of anger, we see the Soul as angry; "I am angry," 13 one says. If it is one of love, we see ourselves reflected in that 14 wave, and say we are loving. If that wave is one of weakness, and 15 the Soul is reflected in it, we think we are weak. These various 16 ideas come from these impressions, these Samskaras covering the 17 Soul. The real nature of the Soul is not perceived as long as there is 18 one single wave in the lake of the Chitta; this real nature will never 19 be perceived until all the waves have subsided. So, first, Patanjali 20 teaches us the meaning of these waves; secondly, the best way to 21 repress them; and thirdly, how to make one wave so strong as to 22 suppress all other waves, fire eating fire as it were. When only one 23 remains, it will be easy to suppress that also, and when that is 24 gone, this Samadhi or concentration is called seedless. It leaves 25 nothing, and the Soul is manifested just as It is, in Its own glory.
26 Then alone we know that the Soul is not a compound; It is the only 27 eternal simple in the universe, and as such, It cannot be born, It 28 cannot die; It is immortal, indestructible, the ever-living essence of 29 intelligence.

CONCENTRATION: ITS PRACTICE

{Sanskrit}

1. Mortification, study, and surrendering fruits of work to God are called Kriya-yoga.

Those Samadhis with which we ended our last chapter are very difficult to attain; so we must take them up slowly. The first step, the preliminary step, is called Kriya-yoga. Literally this means work, working towards Yoga. The organs are the horses, the mind is the rein, the intellect is the charioteer, the soul is the rider, and the body is the chariot. The master of the household, the King, the Self of man, is sitting in this chariot. If the horses are very strong and do not obey the rein, if the charioteer, the intellect, does not know how to control the horses, then the chariot will come to grief. But if the organs, the horses, are well controlled, and if the rein, the mind, is well held in the hands of the charioteer, the intellect, the chariot reaches the goal. What is meant, therefore, by this mortification? Holding the rein firmly while guiding the body and the organs; not letting them do anything they like, but keeping them both under proper control. Study. What is meant by study in this case? No study of novels or story books, but study of those works which teach the liberation of the Soul. Then again this study does not mean controversial studies at all. The Yogi is supposed to have finished his period of controversy. He has had enough of that, and has become satisfied. He only studies to intensify his convictions. Vada and Siddhanta--these are the two sorts of scriptural knowledge--Vada (the argumentative) and Siddhanta (the decisive). When a man is entirely ignorant he takes up the first of these, the argumentative fighting, and reasoning pro and con; and when he has finished that he takes up the Siddhanta, the decisive, arriving at a conclusion. Simply arriving at this conclusion will not do. It must be intensified. Books are infinite in number, and time is short; therefore the secret of knowledge is to take what is essential. Take that and try to live up to it. There is an old Indian legend that if you place a cup of milk and water before a Raja Hamsa (swan), he will take all the milk and leave the water. In that way we should take what is of value in knowledge, and leave the dross. Intellectual gymnastics are necessary at first. We must not go blindly into anything. The Yogi has passed the argumentative state, and has come to a conclusion, which is, like the rocks, immovable. The only thing he now seeks to do is to intensify that conclusion. Do not argue, he says; if one forces arguments upon you, be silent. Do not answer any argument, but go away calmly, because arguments only disturb the mind. The only thing necessary is to train the intellect, what is the use of disturbing it for nothing? The intellect is but a weak instrument, and can give us only knowledge limited by the senses. The Yogi wants to go beyond the senses, therefore intellect is of no use to him. He is certain of this and, therefore, is silent, and does not argue. Every argument throws his mind out of balance, creates a disturbance in the Chitta, and a disturbance is a drawback. Argumentations and searchings of the reason are only by the way. There are much higher things beyond them. The whole of life is not for school boy fights and debating societies.

1 "Surrendering the fruits of work to God" is to take to ourselves 2 neither credit nor blame, but to give up both to the Lord and be at 3 peace.

4 {Sanskrit}

5 2. (It is for) the practice of Samadhi and minimising the pain-
6 bearing obstructions. Most of us make our minds like spoilt 7 children, allowing them to do whatever they want. Therefore it is 8 necessary that Kriya-yoga should be constantly practised, in order 9 to gain control of the mind, and bring it into subjection. The 10 obstructions to Yoga arise from lack of control, and cause us pain.
11 They can only be removed by denying the mind, and holding it in 12 check, through the means of Kriya-yoga.

13 {Sanskrit}

14 3. The pain-bearing obstructions are--ignorance, egoism, 15 attachment, aversion, and clinging to life.

16 These are the five pains, the fivefold tie that binds us down, of 17 which ignorance is the cause and the other four its effects. It is the 18 only cause of all our misery. What else can make us miserable? The 19 nature of the Soul is eternal bliss. What can make it sorrowful 20 except ignorance, hallucination, delusion? All pain of the Soul is 21 simply delusion.

22 {Sanskrit}

23 4. Ignorance is the productive field of all these that follow, 24 whether they are dormant, attenuated, overpowered, or expanded.

25 Ignorance is the cause of egoism, attachment, aversion, and 26 clinging to life. These impressions exist in different states. They are 27 sometimes dormant. You often hear the expression "innocent as a 28 baby," yet in the baby may be the state of a demon or of a god, 29 which will come out by degrees. In the Yogi, these impressions, the 30 Samskaras left by past actions, are attenuated, that is, exist in a 31 very fine state, and he can control them, and not allow them to 32 become manifest. "Overpowered" means that sometimes one set of 33 impressions is held down for a while by those that are stronger, but 34 they come out when that repressing cause is removed. The last 35 state is the "expanded," when the Samskaras, having helpful 36 surroundings, attain to a great activity, either as good or evil.

37 {Sanskrit}

38 5. Ignorance is taking the non-eternal, the impure, the 39 painful, and the non-Self for the eternal, the pure, the happy, and 40 the Atman or Self (respectively).

41 All the different sorts of impressions have one source, 42 ignorance. We have first to learn what ignorance is. All of us think, 43 "I am the body, and not the Self, the pure, the effulgent, the ever 44 blissful," and that is ignorance. We think of man, and see man as 45 body. This is the great delusion.

46 {Sanskrit}

47 6. Egoism is the identification of the seer with the instrument 48 of seeing.

1 The seer is really the Self, the pure one, the ever holy, the 2 infinite, the immortal. This is the Self of man. And what are the 3 instruments? The Chitta or mind-stuff, the Buddhi or determinative 4 faculty, the Manas or mind, and the Indriyas or sense-organs. These 5 are the instruments for him to see the external world, and the 6 identification of the Self with the instruments is what is called the 7 ignorance of egoism. We say, "I am the mind," "I am thought," "I am 8 angry," or "I am happy". How can we be angry and how can we 9 hate? We should identify ourselves with the Self that cannot 10 change. If It is unchangeable, how can It be one moment happy, and 11 one moment unhappy? It is formless, infinite, omnipresent. What 12 can change It? It is beyond all law. What can affect It? Nothing in 13 the universe can produce an effect on It. Yet through ignorance, we 14 identify ourselves with the mind-stuff, and think we feel pleasure or 15 pain.

17 7. Attachment is that which dwells on pleasure.

18 We find pleasure in certain things, and the mind like a current 19 flows towards them; and this following the pleasure centre, as it 20 were, is what is called attachment. We are never attached where 21 we do not find pleasure. We find pleasure in very queer things 22 sometimes, but the principle remains: wherever we find pleasure, 23 there we are attached.

24 {Sanskrit}

25 8. Aversion is that which dwells on pain.

26 That which gives us pain we immediately seek to get away 27 from.

28 {Sanskrit}

29 9. Flowing through its own nature, and established even in 30 the learned, is the clinging to life.

31 This clinging to life you see manifested in every animal. Upon 32 it many attempts have been made to build the theory of a future 33 life, because men are so fond of life that they desire a future life 34 also. Of course it goes without saying that this argument is without 35 much value, but the most curious part of it is, that, in Western 36 countries, the idea that this clinging to life indicates a possibility of 37 future life applies only to men, but does not include animals. In 38 India this clinging to life has been one of the arguments to prove 39 past experience and existence. For instance, if it be true that all our 40 knowledge has come from experience, then it is sure that that 41 which we never experienced we cannot imagine or understand. As 42 soon as chickens are hatched they begin to pick up food. Many 43 times it has been seen, where ducks have been hatched by hens, 44 that, as soon as they came out of the eggs they flew to water, and 45 the mother thought they would be drowned. If experience be the 46 only source of knowledge, where did these chickens learn to pick 47 up food, or the ducklings that the water was their natural element?
48 If you say it is instinct, it means nothing--it is simply giving a word, 49 but is no explanation. What is this instinct? We have many instincts

1 in ourselves. For instance, most of you ladies play the piano, and 2 remember, when you first learned, how carefully you had to put 3 your fingers on the black and white keys, one after the other, but 4 now, after long years of practice, you can talk with your friends
5 while your fingers play mechanically. It has become instinct. So 6 with every work we do; by practice it becomes instinct, it becomes 7 automatic; but so far as we know, all the cases which we now 8 regard as automatic are degenerated reason. In the language of the 9 Yogi, instinct is involved reason. Discrimination becomes involved, 10 and gets to be automatic Samskaras. Therefore it is perfectly 11 logical to think that all we call instinct in this world is simply 12 involved reason. As reason cannot come without experience, all 13 instinct is, therefore, the result of past experience. Chickens fear 14 the hawk, and ducklings love the water; these are both the results 15 of past experience. Then the question is whether that experience 16 belongs to a particular soul, or to the body simply, whether this 17 experience which comes to the duck is the duck's forefathers'
18 experience, or the duck's own experience. Modern scientific men 19 hold that it belongs to the body, but the Yogis hold that it is the 20 experience of the mind, transmitted through the body. This is called 21 the theory of reincarnation.

22 We have seen that all our knowledge, whether we call it 23 perception, or reason, or instinct, must come through that one 24 channel called experience, and all that we now call instinct is the 25 result of past experience, degenerated into instinct and that instinct 26 regenerates into reason again. So on throughout the universe, and 27 upon this has been built one of the chief arguments for 28 reincarnation in India. The recurring experiences of various fears, 29 in course of time, produce this clinging to life. That is why the child 30 is instinctively afraid, because the past experience of pain is there 31 in it. Even in the most learned men, who know that this body will 32 go, and who say "never mind, we have had hundreds of bodies, the 33 soul cannot die"--even in them, with all their intellectual 34 convictions, we still find this clinging on to life. Why is this clinging 35 to life? We have seen that it has become instinctive. In the 36 psychological language of the Yogis it has become a Samskara. The 37 Samskaras, fine and hidden, are sleeping in the Chitta. All this past 38 experience of death, all that which we call instinct, is experience 39 become subconscious. It lives in the Chitta, and is not inactive, but 40 is working underneath.

41 The Chitta-Vrittis, the mind-waves, which are gross, we can 42 appreciate and feel; they can be more easily controlled, but what 43 about the finer instincts? How can they be controlled? When I am 44 angry, my whole mind becomes a huge wave of anger. I feel it, see 45 it, handle it, can easily manipulate it, can fight with it; but I shall 46 not succeed perfectly in the fight until I can get down below to its 47 causes. A man says something very harsh to me, and I begin to feel 48 that I am getting heated, and he goes on till I am perfectly angry 49 and forget myself, identify myself with anger. When he first began 50 to abuse me, I thought, "I am going to be angry". Anger was one 51 thing, and I was another; but when I became angry, I was anger.
52 These feelings have to be controlled in the germ, the root, in their

1 fine forms, before even we have become conscious that they are 2 acting on us. With the vast majority of mankind the fine states of 3 these passions are not even known--the states in which they emerge 4 from subconsciousness. When a bubble is rising from the bottom of 5 the lake, we do not see it, nor even when it is nearly come to the 6 surface; it is only when it bursts and makes a ripple that we know it 7 is there. We shall only be successful in grappling with the waves 8 when we can get hold of them in their fine causes, and until you can 9 get hold of them, and subdue them before they become gross, there 10 is no hope of conquering any passion perfectly. To control our 11 passions we have to control them at their very roots; then alone 12 shall we be able to burn out their very seeds. As fried seeds thrown 13 into the ground will never come up, so these passions will never 14 arise.

15 {Sanskrit}

16 10. The fine Samskaras are to be conquered by resolving 17 them into their causal state.

18 Samskaras are the subtle impressions that manifest
19 themselves into gross forms later on. How are these fine Samskaras 20 to be controlled? By resolving the effect into its cause. When the 21 Chitta, which is an effect, is resolved into its cause, Asmita or 22 Egoism, then only, the fine impressions die along with it. Meditation 23 cannot destroy these.

24 {Sanskrit}

25 11. By meditation, their (gross) modifications are to be 26 rejected.

27 Meditation is one of the great means of controlling the rising 28 of these waves. By meditation you can make the mind subdue these 29 waves, and if you go on practising meditation for days, and months, 30 and years, until it has become a habit, until it will come in spite of 31 yourself, anger and hatred will be controlled and checked.

32 {Sanskrit}

33 12. The "receptacle of works" has its root in these pain-34 bearing obstructions, and their experience is in this visible life, or 35 in the unseen life.

36 By the "receptacle of works" is meant the sum-total of 37 Samskaras. Whatever work we do, the mind is thrown into a wave, 38 and after the work is finished, we think the wave is gone. No. It has 39 only become fine, but it is still there. When we try to remember the 40 work, it comes up again and becomes a wave. So it was there; if 41 not, there would not have been memory. Thus every action, every 42 thought, good or bad, just goes down and becomes fine, and is 43 there stored up. Both happy and unhappy thoughts are called pain-44 bearing obstructions, because according to the Yogis, they, in the 45 long run, bring pain. All happiness which comes from the senses 46 will, eventually, bring pain. All enjoyment will make us thirst for 47 more, and that brings pain as its result. There is no limit to man's 48 desires; he goes on desiring, and when he comes to a point where 49 desire cannot be fulfilled, the result is pain. Therefore the Yogis

1 regard the sum-total of the impressions, good or evil, as pain-
2 bearing obstructions; they obstruct the way to freedom of the Soul.

3 It is the same with the Samskaras, the fine roots of all our 4 works; they are the causes which will again bring effects, either in 5 this life, or in the lives to come. In exceptional cases when these 6 Samskaras are very strong, they bear fruit quickly; exceptional acts 7 of wickedness, or of goodness, bring their fruits even in this life.
8 The Yogis hold that men who are able to acquire a tremendous 9 power of good Samskaras do not have to die, but, even in this life, 10 can change their bodies into god-bodies. There are several such 11 cases mentioned by the Yogis in their books. These men change the 12 very material of their bodies; they re-arrange the molecules in such 13 fashion that they have no more sickness, and what we call death 14 does not come to them. Why should not this be? The physiological 15 meaning of food is assimilation of energy from the sun. The energy 16 has reached the plant, the plant is eaten by an animal, and the 17 animal by man. The science of it is that we take so much energy 18 from the sun, and make it part of ourselves. That being the case, 19 why should there be only one way of assimilating energy? The 20 plant's way is not the same as ours; the earth's process of 21 assimilating energy differs from our own. But all assimilate energy 22 in some form or other. The Yogis say that they are able to assimilate 23 energy by the power of the mind alone, that they can draw in as 24 much of it as they desire without recourse to the ordinary methods.
25 As a spider makes its web out of its own substance, and becomes 26 bound in it, and cannot go anywhere except along the lines of that 27 web, so we have projected out of our own substance this network 28 called the nerves, and we cannot work except through the channels 29 of those nerves. The Yogi says we need not be bound by that.

30 Similarly, we can send electricity to any part of the world, but 31 we have to send it by means of wires. Nature can send a vast mass 32 of electricity without any wires at all. Why cannot we do the same?
33 We can send mental electricity. What we call mind is very much the 34 same as electricity. It is clear that this nerve fluid has some amount 35 of electricity, because it is polarised, and it answers all electrical 36 directions. We can only send our electricity through these nerve 37 channels. Why not send the mental electricity without this aid? The 38 Yogis say it is perfectly possible and practicable, and that when you 39 can do that, you will work all over the universe. You will be able to 40 work with any body anywhere, without the help of the nervous 41 system. When the soul is acting through these channels, we say a 42 man is living, and when these cease to work, a man is said to be 43 dead. But when a man is able to act either with or without these 44 channels, birth and death will have no meaning for him. All the 45 bodies in the universe are made up of Tanmatras, their difference 46 lies in the arrangement of the latter. If you are the arranger, you 47 can arrange a body in one way or another. Who makes up this body 48 but you? Who eats the food? If another ate the food for you, you 49 would not live long. Who makes the blood out of food? You, 50 certainly. Who purifies the blood, and sends it through the veins?
51 You. We are the masters of the body, and we live in it. Only we have 52 lost the knowledge of how to rejuvenate it. We have become

1 automatic, degenerate. We have forgotten the process of arranging 2 its molecules. So, what we do automatically has to be done
3 knowingly. We are the masters and we have to regulate that 4 arrangement; and as soon as we can do that, we shall be able to 5 rejuvenate just as we like, and then we shall have neither birth nor 6 disease nor death.

7 {Sanskrit}

8 13. The root being there, the fruition comes (in the form of) 9 species, life, and experience of pleasure and pain.

10 The roots, the causes, the Samskaras being there, they 11 manifest and form the effects. The cause dying down becomes the 12 effect; the effect getting subtler becomes the cause of the next 13 effect. A tree bears a seed, which becomes the cause of another 14 tree, and so on. All our works now are the effects of past 15 Samskaras; again, these works becoming Samskaras will be the 16 causes of future actions, and thus we go on. So this aphorism says 17 that the cause being there, the fruit must come, in the form of 18 species of beings: one will be a man, another an angel, another an 19 animal, another a demon. Then there are different effects of Karma 20 in life. One man lives fifty years, another a hundred, another dies in 21 two years, and never attains maturity; all these differences in life 22 are regulated by past Karma. One man is born, as it were, for 23 pleasure; if he buries himself in a forest, pleasure will follow him 24 there. Another man, wherever he goes, is followed by pain;
25 everything becomes painful for him. It is the result of their own 26 past. According to the philosophy of the Yogis, all virtuous actions 27 bring pleasure, and all vicious actions bring pain. Any man who 28 does wicked deeds is sure to reap their fruit in the form of pain.

29 {Sanskrit}

30 14. They bear fruit as pleasure or pain, caused by virtue or 31 vice.

32 {Sanskrit}

33 15. To the discriminating, all is, as it were, painful on account 34 of everything bringing pain either as consequence, or as 35 anticipation of loss of happiness, or as fresh craving arising from 36 impressions of happiness, and also as counteraction of qualities.

37 The Yogis say that the man who has discriminating powers, 38 the man of good sense, sees through all that are called pleasure 39 and pain, and knows that they come to all, and that one follows and 40 melts into the other; he sees that men follow an ignis fatuus all 41 their lives, and never succeed in fulfilling their desires. The great 42 king Yudhishtira once said that the most wonderful thing in life is 43 that every moment we see people dying around us, and yet we think 44 we shall never die. Surrounded by fools on every side, we think we 45 are the only exceptions, the only learned men. Surrounded by all 46 sorts of experiences of fickleness, we think our love is the only 47 lasting love. How can that be? Even love is selfish, and the Yogi says 48 that in the end we shall find that even the love of husbands and 49 wives, and children and friends, slowly decays. Decadence seizes 50 everything in this life. It is only when everything, even love, fails,

1 that, with a flash, man finds out how vain, how dream-like is this 2 world. Then he catches a glimpse of Vairagya (renunciation), 3 catches a glimpse of the Beyond. It is only by giving up this world 4 that the other comes; never through holding on to this one. Never 5 yet was there a great soul who had not to reject sense-pleasures 6 and enjoyments to acquire his greatness. The cause of misery is the 7 clash between the different forces of nature, one dragging one way, 8 and another dragging another, rendering permanent happiness
9 impossible.

10 {Sanskrit}

11 16. The misery which is not yet come is to be avoided.

12 Some Karma we have worked out already, some we are 13 working out now in the present, and some are waiting to bear fruit 14 in the future. The first kind is past and gone. The second we will 15 have to work out, and it is only that which is waiting to bear fruit in 16 the future that we can conquer and control, towards which end all 17 our forces should be directed. This is what Patanjali means when he 18 says that Samskaras are to be controlled by resolving them into 19 their causal state.

20 {Sanskrit}

21 17. The cause of that which is to be avoided is the junction of 22 the seer and the seen.

23 Who is the seer? The Self of man, the Purusha. What is the 24 seen? The whole of nature beginning with the mind, down to gross 25 matter. All pleasure and pain arise from the junction between this 26 Purusha and the mind. The Purusha, you must remember, according 27 to this philosophy, is pure; when joined to nature, it appears to feel 28 pleasure or pain by reflection.

29 {Sanskrit}

30 18. The experienced is composed of elements and organs, is 31 of the nature of illumination, action, and inertia, and is for the 32 purpose of experience and release (of the experiencer).

33 The experienced, that is nature, is composed of elements and 34 organs--the elements, gross and fine, which compose the whole of 35 nature, and the organs of the senses, mind, etc.--and is of the 36 nature of illumination (Sattva), action (Rajas), and inertia (Tamas).
37 What is the purpose of the whole of nature? That the Purusha may 38 gain experience. The Purusha has, as it were, forgotten its mighty, 39 godly nature. There is a story that the king of the gods, Indra, once 40 became a pig, wallowing in mire; he had a she-pig and a lot of baby 41 pigs, and was very happy. Then some gods saw his plight, and came 42 to him, and told him, "You are the king of the gods, you have all the 43 gods under your command. Why are you here?" But Indra said, 44 "Never mind; I am all right here; I do not care for heaven, while I 45 have this sow and these little pigs." The poor gods were at their 46 wits' end. After a time they decided to slay all the pigs one after 47 another. When all were dead, Indra began to weep and mourn. Then 48 the gods ripped his pig-body open and he came out of it, and began 49 to laugh, when he realised what a hideous dream he had had--he,

1 the king of the gods, to have become a pig, and to think that that 2 pig-life was the only life! Not only so, but to have wanted the whole 3 universe to come into the pig-life! The Purusha, when it identifies 4 itself with nature, forgets that it is pure and infinite. The Purusha
5 does not love, it is love itself. It does not exist, it is existence itself.
6 The Soul does not know, It is knowledge itself. It is a mistake to say 7 the Soul loves, exists, or knows. Love, existence, and knowledge are 8 not the qualities of the Purusha, but its essence. When they get 9 reflected upon something, you may call them the qualities of that 10 something. They are not the qualities but the essence of the 11 Purusha, the great Atman, the Infinite Being, without birth or 12 death, established in its own glory. It appears to have become so 13 degenerate that if you approach to tell it, "You are not a pig," it 14 begins to squeal and bite.

15 Thus is it with us all in this Maya, this dream world, where it 16 is all misery, weeping and crying, where a few golden balls are 17 rolled, and the world scrambles after them. You were never bound 18 by laws, nature never had a bond for you. That is what the Yogi tells 19 you. Have patience to learn it. And the Yogi shows how, by junction 20 with nature, and identifying itself with the mind and the world, the 21 Purusha thinks itself miserable. Then the Yogi goes on to show you 22 that the way out is through experience. You have to get all this 23 experience, but finish it quickly. We have placed ourselves in this 24 net, and will have to get out. We have got ourselves caught in the 25 trap, and we will have to work out our freedom. So get this 26 experience of husbands, and wives, and friends, and little loves; you 27 will get through them safely if you never forget what you really are.
28 Never forget this is only a momentary state, and that we have to 29 pass through it. Experience is the one great teacher--experience of 30 pleasure and pain--but know it is only experience. It leads, step by 31 step, to that state where all things become small, and the Purusha 32 so great that the whole universe seems as a drop in the ocean and 33 falls off by its own nothingness. We have to go through different 34 experiences, but let us never forget the ideal.

35 {Sanskrit}

36 19. The states of the qualities are the defined, the undefined, 37 the indicated only, and the signless.

38 The system of Yoga is built entirely on the philosophy of the 39 Sankhyas, as I told you before, and here again I shall remind you of 40 the cosmology of the Sankhya philosophy. According to the 41 Sankhyas, nature is both the material and the efficient cause of the 42 universe. In nature there are three sorts of materials, the Sattva, 43 the Rajas, and the Tamas. The Tamas material is all that is dark, all 44 that is ignorant and heavy. The Rajas is activity. The Sattva is 45 calmness, light. Nature, before creation, is called by them Avyakta, 46 undefined, or indiscrete; that is, in which there is no distinction of 47 form or name, a state in which these three materials are held in 48 perfect balance. Then the balance is disturbed, the three materials 49 begin to mingle in various fashions, and the result is the universe.
50 In every man, also, these three materials exist. When the Sattva 51 material prevails, knowledge comes; when Rajas, activity; and when 52 Tamas, darkness, lassitude, idleness, and ignorance. According to 1 the Sankhya theory, the highest manifestation of nature, consisting 2 of the three materials, is what they call Mahat or intelligence, 3 universal intelligence, of which each human intellect is a part. In 4 the Sankhya psychology there is a sharp distinction between 5 Manas, the mind function, and the function of the Buddhi, intellect.

6 The mind function is simply to collect and carry impressions and 7 present them to the Buddhi, the individual Mahat, which 8 determines upon it. Out of Mahat comes egoism, out of which again 9 come the fine materials. The fine materials combine and become 10 the gross materials outside--the external universe. The claim of the 11 Sankhya philosophy is that beginning with the intellect down to a 12 block of stone, all is the product of one substance, different only as 13 finer to grosser states of existence. The finer is the cause, and the 14 grosser is the effect. According to the Sankhya philosophy, beyond 15 the whole of nature is the Purusha, which is not material at all.
16 Purusha is not at all similar to anything else, either Buddhi, or 17 mind, or the Tanmatras, or the gross materials. It is not akin to any 18 one of these, it is entirely separate, entirely different in its nature, 19 and from this they argue that the Purusha must be immortal, 20 because it is not the result of combination. That which is not the 21 result of combination cannot die. The Purushas or souls are infinite 22 in number.

23 Now we shall understand the aphorism that the states of the 24 qualities are defined, undefined, indicated only, and signless. By the 25 "defined" are meant the gross elements, which we can sense. By 26 the "undefined" are meant the very fine materials, the Tanmatras, 27 which cannot be sensed by ordinary men. If you practise Yoga, 28 however, says Patanjali, after a while your perceptions will become 29 so fine that you will actually see the Tanmatras. For instance, you 30 have heard how every man has a certain light about him; every 31 living being emits a certain light, and this, he says, can be seen by 32 the Yogi. We do not all see it, but we all throw out these Tanmatras, 33 just as a flower continuously sends out fine particles which enable 34 us to smell it. Every day of our lives we throw out a mass of good or 35 evil, and everywhere we go the atmosphere is full of these 36 materials. That is how there came to the human mind, 37 unconsciously, the idea of building temples and churches. Why 38 should man build churches in which to worship God?

39 Why not worship Him anywhere? Even if he did not know the 40 reason, man found that the place where people worshipped God 41 became full of good Tanmatras. Every day people go there, and the 42 more they go the holier they get, and the holier that place becomes.
43 If any man who has not much Sattva in him goes there, the place 44 will influence him and arouse his Sattva quality. Here, therefore, is 45 the significance of all temples and holy places, but you must 46 remember that their holiness depends on holy people congregating 47 there. The difficulty with man is that he forgets the original 48 meaning, and puts the cart before the horse. It was men who made 49 these places holy, and then the effect became the cause and made 50 men holy. If the wicked only were to go there, it would become as 51 bad as any other place. It is not the building, but the people that 52 make a church, and that is what we always forget. That is why

1 sages and holy persons, who have much of this Sattva quality, can 2 send it out and exert a tremendous influence day and night on their 3 surroundings. A man may become so pure that his purity will 4 become tangible. Whosoever comes in contact with him becomes 5 pure.

6 Next "the indicated only" means the Buddhi, the intellect.
7 "The indicated only" is the first manifestation of nature; from it all 8 other manifestations proceed. The last is "the signless". There 9 seems to be a great difference between modern science and all 10 religions at this point. Every religion has the idea that the universe 11 comes out of intelligence. The theory of God, taking it in its 12 psychological significance, apart from all ideas of personality, is 13 that intelligence is first in the order of creation, and that out of 14 intelligence comes what we call gross matter. Modern philosophers 15 say that intelligence is the last to come. They say that unintelligent 16 things slowly evolve into animals, and from animals into men. They 17 claim that instead of everything coming out of intelligence, 18 intelligence itself is the last to come. Both the religious and the 19 scientific statements, though seeming directly opposed to each 20 other are true. Take an infinite series, A-B-A-B-A-B, etc. The 21 question is--which is first, A or B? If you take the series as A-B, you 22 will say that A is first, but if you take it as B-A, you will say that B is 23 first. It depends upon the way we look at it. Intelligence undergoes 24 modification and becomes the gross matter, this again merges into 25 intelligence, and thus the process goes on. The Sankhyas, and other 26 religionists, put intelligence first, and the series becomes 27 intelligence, then matter. The scientific man puts his finger on 28 matter, and says matter, then intelligence. They both indicate the 29 same chain. Indian philosophy, however, goes beyond both 30 intelligence and matter, and finds a Purusha, or Self, which is 31 beyond intelligence, of which intelligence is but the borrowed light.

32 {Sanskrit}

33 20. The seer is intelligence only, and though pure, sees 34 through the colouring of the intellect.

35 This is, again, Sankhya philosophy. We have seen from the 36 same philosophy that from the lowest form up to intelligence all is 37 nature; beyond nature are Purushas (souls), which have no 38 qualities. Then how does the soul appear to be happy or unhappy?
39 By reflection. If a red flower is put near a piece of pure crystal, the 40 crystal appears to be red, similarly the appearances of happiness or 41 unhappiness of the soul are but reflections., The soul itself has no 42 colouring. The soul is separate from nature. Nature is one thing, 43 soul another, eternally separate. The Sankhyas say that intelligence 44 is a compound, that it grows and wanes, that it changes, just as the 45 body changes, and that its nature is nearly the same as that of the 46 body. As a finger-nail is to the body, so is body to intelligence. The 47 nail is a part of the body, but it can be pared off hundreds of times, 48 and the body will still last. Similarly, the intelligence lasts aeons, 49 while this body can be "pared off," thrown off. Yet intelligence 50 cannot be immortal because it changes--growing and waning.
51 Anything that changes cannot be immortal. Certainly intelligence is 52 manufactured, and that very fact shows us that there must be

1 something beyond that. It cannot be free, everything connected 2 with matter is in nature, and, therefore, bound for ever. Who is 3 free? The free must certainly be beyond cause and effect. If you say 4 that the idea of freedom is a delusion, I shall say that the idea of 5 bondage is also a delusion. Two facts come into our consciousness, 6 and stand or fall with each other. These are our notions of bondage
7 and freedom. If we want to go through a wall, and our head bumps
8 against that wall, we see we are limited by that wall. At the same 9 time we find a will power, and think we can direct our will 10 everywhere. At every step these contradictory ideas come to us. We 11 have to believe that we are free, yet at every moment we find we 12 are not free. If one idea is a delusion, the other is also a delusion, 13 and if one is true, the other also is true, because both stand upon 14 the same basis--consciousness. The Yogi says, both are true; that we 15 are bound so far as intelligence goes, that we are free so far as the 16 soul is concerned. It is the real nature of man, the soul, the 17 Purusha, which is beyond all law of causation. Its freedom is 18 percolating through layers of matter in various forms, intelligence, 19 mind, etc. It is its light which is shining through all. Intelligence has 20 no light of its own. Each organ has a particular centre in the brain; 21 it is not that all the organs have one centre; each organ is separate.
22 Why do all perceptions harmonise? Where do they get their unity?
23 If it were in the brain, it would be necessary for all the organs, the 24 eyes, the nose, the ears, etc., to have one centre only, while we 25 know for certain that there are different centres for each. Both a 26 man can see and hear at the same time, so a unity must be there at 27 the back of intelligence. Intelligence is connected with the brain, 28 but behind intelligence even stands the Purusha, the unit, where all 29 different sensations and perceptions join and become one. The soul 30 itself is the centre where all the different perceptions converge and 31 become unified. That soul is free, and it is its freedom that tells you 32 every moment that you are free. But you mistake, and mingle that 33 freedom every moment with intelligence and mind. You try to 34 attribute that freedom to the intelligence, and immediately find that 35 intelligence is not free; you attribute that freedom to the body, and 36 immediately nature tells you that you are again mistaken. That is 37 why there is this mingled sense of freedom and bondage at the 38 same time. The Yogi analyses both what is free and what is bound, 39 and his ignorance vanishes. He finds that the Purusha is free, is the 40 essence of that knowledge which, coming through the Buddhi, 41 becomes intelligence, and, as such, is bound.

42 {Sanskrit}

43 21. The nature of the experienced is for him.

44 Nature has no light of its own. As long as the Purusha is 45 present in it, it appears as light. But the light is borrowed; just as 46 the moon's light is reflected. According to the Yogis, all the 47 manifestations of nature are caused by nature itself, but nature has 48 no purpose in view, except to free the Purusha.

49 {Sanskrit}

50 22. Though destroyed for him whose goal has been gained, 51 yet it is not destroyed, being common to others.

1 The whole activity of nature is to make the soul know that it is 2 entirely separate from nature. When the soul knows this, nature has 3 no more attractions for it. But the whole of nature vanishes only for 4 that man who has become free. There will always remain an infinite 5 number of others, for whom nature will go on working.

6 {Sanskrit}

7 23. Junction is the cause of the realisation of the nature of 8 both the powers, the experienced and its Lord.

9 According to this aphorism, both the powers of soul and 10 nature become manifest when they are in conjunction. Then all 11 manifestations are thrown out. Ignorance is the cause of this 12 conjunction. We see every day that the cause of our pain or 13 pleasure is always our joining ourselves with the body. If I were 14 perfectly certain that I am not this body, I should take no notice of 15 heat and cold, or anything of the kind. This body is a combination. It 16 is only a fiction to say that I have one body, you another, and the sun 17 another. The whole universe is one ocean of matter, and you are the 18 name of a little particle, and I of another, and the sun of another. We 19 know that this matter is continuously changing. What is forming the 20 sun one day, the next day may form the matter of our bodies.

21 {Sanskrit}

22 24. Ignorance is its cause.

23 Through ignorance we have joined ourselves with a particular 24 body, and thus opened ourselves to misery. This idea of body is a 25 simple superstition. It is superstition that makes us happy or 26 unhappy. It is superstition caused by ignorance that makes us feel 27 heat and cold, pain and pleasure. It is our business to rise above 28 this superstition, and the Yogi shows us how we can do this. It has 29 been demonstrated that, under certain mental conditions, a man 30 may be burned, yet he will feel no pain. The difficulty is that this 31 sudden upheaval of the mind comes like a whirlwind one minute, 32 and goes away the next. If, however, we gain it through Yoga, we 33 shall permanently attain to the separation of Self from the body.

34 {Sanskrit}

35 25. There being absence of that (ignorance) there is absence 36 of junction, which is the thing-to-be-avoided; that is the 37 independence of the seer.

38 According to yoga philosophy, it is through ignorance that the 39 soul has been joined with nature. The aim is to get rid of nature's 40 control over us. That is the goal of all religions. Each soul is 41 potentially divine. The goal is to manifest this Divinity within, by 42 controlling nature, external and internal. Do this either by work, or 43 worship, or psychic control, or philosophy--by one or more or all of 44 these--and be free. This is the whole of religion. Doctrines, or 45 dogmas, or rituals, or books, or temples, or forms, are but 46 secondary details. The Yogi tries to reach this goal through psychic 47 control. Until we can free ourselves from nature, we are slaves; as 48 she dictates so we must go. The Yogi claims that he who controls 49 mind controls matter also. The internal nature is much higher than 1 the external and much more difficult to grapple with, much more 2 difficult to control. Therefore he who has conquered the internal 3 nature controls the whole universe; it becomes his servant. Raja-

4 Yoga propounds the methods of gaining this control. Forces higher 5 than we know in physical nature will have to be subdued. This body 6 is just the external crust of the mind. They are not two different 7 things; they are just as the oyster and its shell. They are but two 8 aspects of one thing; the internal substance of the oyster takes up 9 matter from outside, and manufactures the shell. In the same way 10 the internal fine forces which are called mind take up gross matter 11 from outside, and from that manufacture this external shell, the 12 body.

13 If, then, we have control of the internal, it is very easy to have 14 control of the external. Then again, these forces are not different. It 15 is not that some forces are physical, and some mental; the physical 16 forces are but the gross manifestations of the fine forces, just as the 17 physical world is but the gross manifestation of the fine world.

18 {Sanskrit}

19 26. The means of destruction of ignorance is unbroken 20 practice of discrimination.

21 This is the real goal of practice--discrimination between the 22 real and the unreal, knowing that the Purusha is not nature, that it 23 is neither matter nor mind, and that because it is not nature, it 24 cannot possibly change. It is only nature which changes, combining 25 and re-combining, dissolving continually. When through constant 26 practice we begin to discriminate, ignorance will vanish, and the 27 Purusha will begin to shine in its real nature--omniscient, 28 omnipotent, omnipresent.

29 {Sanskrit}

30 27. His knowledge is of the sevenfold highest ground.

31 When this knowledge comes, it will come, as it were, in seven 32 grades, one after the other; and when one of these begins, we know 33 that we are getting knowledge. The first to appear will be that we 34 have known what is to be known. The mind will cease to be 35 dissatisfied. While we are aware of thirsting after knowledge, we 36 begin to seek here and there, wherever we think we can get some 37 truth, and failing to find it we become dissatisfied and seek in a 38 fresh direction. All search is vain, until we begin to perceive that 39 knowledge is within ourselves, that no one can help us, that we 40 must help ourselves. When we begin to practise the power of 41 discrimination, the first sign that we are getting near truth will be 42 that that dissatisfied state will vanish. We shall feel quite sure that 43 we have found the truth, and that it cannot be anything else but the 44 truth. Then we may know that the sun is rising, that the morning is 45 breaking for us, and taking courage, we must persevere until the 46 goal is reached. The second grade will be the absence of all pains.
47 It will be impossible for anything in the universe, external or 48 internal, to give us pain. The third will be the attainment of full 49 knowledge. Omniscience will be ours. The fourth will be the 50 attainment of the end of all duty through discrimination. Next will

1 come what is called freedom of the Chitta. We shall realise that all 2 difficulties and struggles, all vacillations of the mind, have fallen 3 down, just as a stone rolls from the mountain top into the valley and 4 never comes up again. The next will be that the Chitta itself will 5 realise that it melts away into its causes whenever we so desire.
6 Lastly we shall find that we are established in our Self, that we 7 have been alone throughout the universe, neither body nor mind 8 was ever related, much less joined, to us. They were working their 9 own way, and we, through ignorance, joined ourselves to them. But 10 we have been alone, omnipotent, omnipresent, ever blessed; our 11 own Self was so pure and perfect that we required none else. We 12 required none else to make us happy, for we are happiness itself.
13 We shall find that this knowledge does not depend on anything else; 14 throughout the universe there can be nothing that will not become 15 effulgent before our knowledge. This will be the last state, and the 16 Yogi will become peaceful and calm, never to feel any more pain, 17 never to be again deluded, never to be touched by misery. He will 18 know he is ever blessed, ever perfect, almighty.

19 {Sanskrit}

20 28. By the practice of the different parts of Yogas the 21 impurities being destroyed, knowledge becomes effulgent up to 22 discrimination.

23 Now comes the practical knowledge. What we have just been 24 speaking about is much higher. It is away above our heads, but it is 25 the ideal. It is first necessary to obtain physical and mental control.
26 Then the realisation will become steady in that ideal. The ideal 27 being known, what remains is to practise the method of reaching it.

28 {Sanskrit}

29 29. Yama, Niyama, Asana, Pranayama, Pratyahara, Dharana, 30 Dhyana, and Samadhi are the eight limbs of Yoga.

31 {Sanskrit}

32 30. Non-killing, truthfulness, non-stealing, continence, and 33 non-receiving are called Yamas.

34 A man who wants to be a perfect Yogi must give up the sex
35 idea. The soul has no sex; why should it degrade itself with sex 36 ideas? Later on we shall understand better why these ideas must be 37 given up. The mind of the man who receives gifts is acted on by the 38 mind of the giver, so the receiver is likely to become degenerated.
39 Receiving gifts is prone to destroy the independence of the mind, 40 and make us slavish. Therefore, receive no gifts.

41 {Sanskrit}

42 31. These, unbroken by time, place, purpose, and caste-rules, 43 are (universal) great vows.

44 These practices--non-killing, truthfulness, non-stealing, 45 chastity, and non-receiving--are to be practised by every man, 46 woman, and child; by every soul, irrespective of nation, country, or 47 position.

48 {Sanskrit}

1 32. Internal and external purification, contentment,
2 mortification, study, and worship of God are the Niyamas.

3 External purification is keeping the body pure; a dirty man 4 will never be a Yogi. There must be internal purification also. That 5 is obtained by the virtues named in I.33. Of course, internal purity 6 is of greater value than external, but both are necessary, and 7 external purity, without internal, is of no good.

8 {Sanskrit}

9 33. To obstruct thoughts which are inimical to Yoga, contrary 10 thoughts should be brought.

11 That is the way to practise the virtues that have been stated.
12 For instance, when a big wave of anger has come into the mind, 13 how are we to control that? Just by raising an opposing wave. Think 14 of love. Sometimes a mother is very angry with her husband, and 15 while in that state, the baby comes in, and she kisses the baby; the 16 old wave dies out and a new wave arises, love for the child. That 17 suppresses the other one. Love is opposite to anger. Similarly, when 18 the idea of stealing comes, non-stealing should be thought of; when 19 the idea of receiving gifts comes, replace it by a contrary thought.

20 {Sanskrit}

21 34. The obstructions to Yoga are killing, falsehood, etc., 22 whether committed, caused, or approved; either through avarice, or 23 anger, or ignorance; whether slight, middling, or great; and they 24 result in infinite ignorance and misery. This is (the method of) 25 thinking the contrary.

26 If I tell a lie, or cause another to tell one, or approve of 27 another doing so, it is equally sinful. If it is a very mild lie, still it is 28 a lie. Every vicious thought will rebound, every thought of hatred 29 which you may have thought, in a cave even, is stored up, and will 30 one day come back to you with tremendous power in the form of 31 some misery here. If you project hatred and jealousy, they will 32 rebound on you with compound interest. No power can avert them; 33 when once you have put them in motion, you will have to bear them.
34 Remembering this will prevent you from doing wicked things.

35 {Sanskrit}

36 35. Non-killing being established, in his presence all enmities 37 cease (in others).

38 If a man gets the ideal of non-injuring others, before him even 39 animals which are by their nature ferocious will become peaceful.
40 The tiger and the lamb will play together before that Yogi. When 41 you have come to that state, then alone you will understand that 42 you have become firmly established in non-injuring.

43 {Sanskrit}

44 36. By the establishment of truthfulness the Yogi gets the 45 power of attaining for himself and others the fruits of work without 46 the works.

47 When this power of truth will be established with you, then 48 even in dream you will never tell an untruth. You will be true in

1 thought, word, and deed. Whatever you say will be truth. You may 2 say to a man, "Be blessed," and that man will be blessed. If a man is 3 diseased, and you say to him, "Be thou cured," he will be cured 4 immediately.

5 {Sanskrit}

6 37. By the establishment of non-stealing all wealth comes to 7 the Yogi.

8 The more you fly from nature, the more she follows you; and 9 if you do not care for her at all, she becomes your slave.

10 {Sanskrit}

11 38. By the establishment of continence energy is gained.

12 The chaste brain has tremendous energy and gigantic will-13 power. Without chastity there can be no spiritual strength.
14 Continence gives wonderful control over mankind. The spiritual 15 leaders of men have been very continent, and this is what gave 16 them power. Therefore the Yogi must be continent.

17 {Sanskrit}

18 39. When he is fixed in non-receiving, he gets the memory of 19 past life.

20 When a man does not receive presents, he does not become 21 beholden to others, but remains independent and free. His mind 22 becomes pure. With every gift, he is likely to receive the evils of the 23 giver. If he does not receive, the mind is purified, and the first 24 power it gets is memory of past life. Then alone the Yogi becomes 25 perfectly fixed in his ideal. He sees that he has been coming and 26 going many times, so he becomes determined that this time he will 27 be free, that he will no more come and go, and be the slave of 28 Nature.

29 {Sanskrit}

30 40. Internal and external cleanliness being established, there 31 arises disgust for one's own body, and non-intercourse with others.

32 When there is real purification of the body, external and 33 internal, there arises neglect of the body, and the idea of keeping it 34 nice vanishes. A face which others call most beautiful will appear to 35 the Yogi as merely animal, if there is not intelligence behind it.
36 What the world calls a very common face he regards as heavenly, if 37 the spirit shines behind it. This thirst after body is the great bane of 38 human life. So the first sign of the establishment of purity is that 39 you do not care to think you are a body. It is only when purity comes 40 that we get rid of the body idea.

41 {Sanskrit}

42 41. There also arises purification of the Sattva, cheerfulness 43 of the mind, concentration, conquest of the organs, and fitness for 44 the realisation of the Self.

45 By the practice of cleanliness, the Sattva material prevails, 46 and the mind becomes concentrated and cheerful. The first sign 47 that you are becoming religious is that you are becoming cheerful.

1 When a man is gloomy, that may be dyspepsia, but it is not religion.
2 A pleasurable feeling is the nature of the Sattva. Everything is 3 pleasurable to the Sattvika man, and when this comes, know that 4 you are progressing in Yoga. All pain is caused by Tamas, so you 5 must get rid of that; moroseness is one of the results of Tamas. The 6 strong, the well-knit, the young, the healthy, the daring alone are fit 7 to be Yogis. To the Yogi everything is bliss, every human face that 8 he sees brings cheerfulness to him. That is the sign of a virtuous 9 man. Misery is caused by sin, and by no other cause. What business 10 have you with clouded faces? It is terrible. If you have a clouded 11 face, do not go out that day, shut yourself up in your room. What 12 right have you to carry this disease out into the world? When your 13 mind has become controlled, you have control over the whole body; 14 instead of being a slave to this machine, the machine is your slave.
15 Instead of this machine being able to drag the soul down, it 16 becomes its greatest helpmate.

17 {Sanskrit}

18 42. From contentment comes superlative happiness.

19 {Sanskrit}

20 43. The result of mortification is bringing powers to the 21 organs and body, by destroying the impurity.

22 The results of mortification are seen immediately, sometimes 23 by heightened powers of vision, hearing things at a distance, and so 24 on.

25 {Sanskrit}

26 44. By repetition of the Mantra comes the realisation of the 27 intended deity.

28 The higher the beings that you want to get the harder is the 29 practice.

30 {Sanskrit}

31 45. By sacrificing all the Ishvara comes Samadhi.

32 By resignation to the Lord, Samadhi becomes perfect.

33 {Sanskrit}

34 46. Posture is that which is firm and pleasant.

35 Now comes Asana, posture. Until you can get a firm seat you 36 cannot practise the breathing and other exercises. Firmness of seat 37 means that you do not feel the body at all. In the ordinary way, you 38 will find that as soon as you sit for a few minutes all sorts of 39 disturbances come into the body; but when you have got beyond the 40 idea of a concrete body, you will lose all sense of the body. You will 41 feel neither pleasure nor pain. And when you take your body up 42 again, it will feel so rested. It is the only perfect rest that you can 43 give to the body. When you have succeeded in conquering the body 44 and keeping it firm, your practice will remain firm, but while you 45 are disturbed by the body, your nerves become disturbed, and you 46 cannot concentrate the mind.

47 {Sanskrit}

1 47. By lessening the natural tendency (for restlessness) and 2 meditating on the unlimited, posture becomes firm and pleasant.

3 We can make the seat firm by thinking of the infinite. We 4 cannot think of the Absolute Infinite, but we can think of the infinite 5 sky.

6 {Sanskrit}

7 48. Seat being conquered, the dualities do not obstruct.

8 The dualities, good and bad, heat and cold, and all the pairs 9 of opposites, will not then disturb you.

10 {Sanskrit}

11 49. Controlling the motion of the exhalation and the 12 inhalation follows after this.

13 When posture has been conquered, then the motion of the 14 Prana is to be broken and controlled. Thus we come to Pranayama, 15 the controlling of the vital forces of the body. Prana is not breath, 16 though it is usually so translated. It is the sum total of the cosmic 17 energy. It is the energy that is in each body, and its most apparent 18 manifestation is the motion of the lungs. This motion is caused by 19 Prana drawing in the breath, and it is what we seek to control in 20 Pranayama. We begin by controlling the breath, as the easiest way 21 of getting control of the Prana.

22 {Sanskrit}

23 50. Its modifications are either external or internal, or 24 motionless, regulated by place, time, and number, either long or 25 short.

26 The three sorts of motion of Pranayama are, one by which we 27 draw the breath in, another by which we throw it out, and the third 28 action is when the breath is held in the lungs, or stopped from 29 entering the lungs. These, again, are varied by place and time. By 30 place is meant that the Prana is held to some particular part of the 31 body. By time is meant how long the Prana should be confined to a 32 certain place, and so we are told how many seconds to keep one 33 motion, and how many seconds to keep another. The result of this 34 Pranayama is Udghata, awakening the Kundalini.

35 {Sanskrit}

36 51. The fourth is restraining the Prana by reflecting on 37 external or internal object.

38 This is the fourth sort of Pranayama, in which the Kumbhaka 39 is brought about by long practice attended with reflection, which is 40 absent in the other three.

41 {Sanskrit}

42 52. From that, the covering to the light of the Chitta is 43 attenuated.

44 The Chitta has, by its own nature, all knowledge. It is made of 45 Sattva particles, but is covered by Rajas and Tamas particles, and 46 by Pranayama this covering is removed.

1 {Sanskrit}

2 53. The mind becomes fit for Dharana.

3 After this covering has been removed, we are able to 4 concentrate the mind.

5 {Sanskrit}

6 54. The drawing in of the organs is by their giving up their 7 own objects and taking the form of the mind-stuff, as it were.

8 The organs are separate states of the mind-stuff. I see a book;
9 the form is not in the book, it is in the mind. Something is outside 10 which calls that form up. The real form is in the Chitta. The organs 11 identify themselves with, and take the form of, whatever comes to 12 them. If you can restrain the mind-stuff from taking these forms, 13 the mind will remain calm. This is called Pratyahara.

14 {Sanskrit}

15 55. Thence arises supreme control of the organs.

16 When the Yogi has succeeded in preventing the organs from 17 taking the forms of external objects, and in making them remain 18 one with the mind-stuff, then comes perfect control of the organs.
19 When the organs are perfectly under control, every muscle and 20 nerve will be under control, because the organs are the centres of 21 all the sensations, and of all actions. These organs are divided into 22 organs of work and organs of sensation. When the organs are 23 controlled, the Yogi can control all feeling and doing; the whole of 24 the body comes under his control. Then alone one begins to feel joy 25 in being born; then one can truthfully say, "Blessed am I that I was 26 born." When that control of the organs is obtained, we feel how 27 wonderful this body really is.

POWERS

We have now come to the chapter in which the Yoga powers are described.

{Sanskrit}

1. Dharana is holding the mind on to some particular object.

Dharana (concentration) is when the mind holds on to some object, either in the body, or outside the body, and keeps itself in that state.

{Sanskrit}

2. An unbroken flow of knowledge in that object is Dhyana.

The mind tries to think of one object, to hold itself to one particular spot, as the top of the head, the heart, etc., and if the mind succeeds in receiving the sensations only through that part of the body, and through no other part, that would be Dharana, and when the mind succeeds in keeping itself in that state for some time, it is called Dhyana (meditation).

{Sanskrit}

3. When that, giving up all forms, reflects only the meaning, it is Samadhi.

That comes when in meditation the form or the external part is given up. Suppose I were meditating on a book, and that I have gradually succeeded in concentrating the mind on it, and perceiving only the internal sensations, the meaning, unexpressed in any form--that state of Dhyana is called Samadhi.

{Sanskrit}

4. (These) three (when practised) in regard to one object is Samyama.

When a man can direct his mind to any particular object and fix it there, and then keep it there for a long time, separating the object from the internal part, this is Samyama; or Dharana, Dhyana, and Samadhi, one following the other, and making one. The form of the thing has vanished, and only its meaning remains in the mind.

{Sanskrit}

5. By the conquest of that comes light of knowledge.

When one has succeeded in making this Samyama, all powers come under his control. This is the great instrument of the Yogi. The objects of knowledge are infinite, and they are divided into the gross, grosser, grossest and the fine, finer, finest and so on. This Samyama should be first applied to gross things, and when you begin to get knowledge of this gross, slowly, by stages, it should be brought to finer things.

{Sanskrit}

6. That should be employed in stages.

This is a note of warning not to attempt to go too fast.

{Sanskrit}

1 7. These three are more internal than those that precede.

2 Before these we had the Pratyahara, the Pranayama, the 3 Asana, the Yama and Niyama; they are external parts of the three-- 4 Dharana, Dhyana and Samadhi. When a man has attained to them, 5 he may attain to omniscience and omnipotence, but that would not 6 be salvation. These three would not make the mind Nirvikalpa, 7 changeless, but would leave the seeds for getting bodies again.
8 Only when the seeds are, as the Yogi says, "fried," do they lose the 9 possibility of producing further plants. These powers cannot fry the 10 seed.

11 {Sanskrit}

12 8. But even they are external to the seedless (Samadhi).

13 Compared with that seedless Samadhi, therefore, even these 14 are external. We have not yet reached the real Samadhi, the 15 highest, but a lower stage, in which this universe still exists as we 16 see it, and in which are all these powers.

17 {Sanskrit}

18 9. By the suppression of the disturbed impressions of the 19 mind, and by the rise of impressions of control, the mind, which 20 persists in that moment of control, is said to attain the controlling 21 modifications.

22 That is to say, in this first state of Samadhi the modifications 23 of the mind have been controlled, but not perfectly, because if they 24 were, there would be no modifications. If there is a modification 25 which impels the mind to rush out through the senses, and the Yogi 26 tries to control it, that very control itself will be a modification. One 27 wave will be checked by another wave, so it will not be real 28 Samadhi in which all the waves subside, as control itself will be a 29 wave. Yet this lower Samadhi is very much nearer to the higher 30 Samadhi than when the mind comes bubbling out.

31 {Sanskrit}

32 10. Its flow becomes steady by habit.

33 The flow of this continuous control of the mind becomes 34 steady when practised day after day, and the mind obtains the 35 faculty of constant concentration.

37 11. Taking in all sorts of objects, and 38 concentrating upon one object, these two powers being 39 destroyed and manifested respectively, the Chitta gets the 40 modification called Samadhi.

41 The mind takes up various objects, runs into all sorts of 42 things. That is the lower state. There is a higher state of the mind, 43 when it takes up one object and excludes all others, of which 44 Samadhi is the result.

45 {Sanskrit}

46 12. The one-pointedness of the Chitta is when the impression

1 that is past and that which is present are similar.

2 How are we to know that the mind has become concentrated?
3 Because the idea of time will vanish. The more time passes
4 unnoticed the more concentrated we are. In common life we see 5 that when we are interested in a book we do not note the time at 6 all; and when we leave the book, we are often surprised to find how 7 many hours have passed. All time will have the tendency to come 8 and stand in the one present. So the definition is given: When the 9 past and present come and stand in one, the mind is said to be 10 concentrated.

11 {Sanskrit}

12 13. By this is explained the threefold transformation of form, 13 time and state, in fine or gross matter and in the organs.

14 By the threefold changes in the mind-stuff as to form, time 15 and state are explained the corresponding changes in gross and 16 subtle matter and in the organs. Suppose there is a lump of gold. It 17 is transformed into a bracelet and again into an earring. These are 18 changes as to form. The same phenomena looked at from the 19 standpoint of time give us change as to time. Again, the bracelet or 20 the earring may be bright or dull, thick or thin, and so on. This is 21 change as to state. Now referring to the aphorisms 9, 11 and 12, 22 the mind-stuff is changing into Vrittis--this is change as to form.
23 That it passes through past, present and future moments of time is 24 change as to time. That the impressions vary as to intensity within 25 one particular period, say, present, is change as to state. The 26 concentrations taught in the preceding aphorisms were to give the 27 Yogi a voluntary control over the transformations of his mind-stuff, 28 which alone will enable him to make the Samyama named in III.4.

29 {Sanskrit}

30 14. That which is acted upon by transformation, either past, 31 present, or yet to be manifested is the qualified.

32 That is to say, the qualified is the substance which is being 33 acted upon by time and by the Samskaras, and getting changed and 34 being manifested always.

35 {Sanskrit}

36 15. The succession of changes is the cause of manifold 37 evolution.

38 {Sanskrit}

39 16. By making Samyama on the three sorts of changes comes 40 the knowledge of past and future.

41 We must not lose sight of the first definition of Samyama.
42 When the mind has attained to that state when it identifies itself 43 with the internal impression of the object, leaving the external, and 44 when, by long practice, that is retained by the mind and the mind 45 can get into that state in a moment, that is Samyama. If a man in 46 that state wants to know the past and future, he has to make a 47 Samyama on the changes in the Samskaras (III.13). Some are 48 working now at present, some have worked out, and some are 1 waiting to work. So by making a Samyama on these he knows the 2 past and future.

3 {Sanskrit}

4 17. By making Samyama on word, meaning and knowledge, 5 which are ordinarily confused, comes the knowledge of all animal 6 sounds.

7 The word represents the external cause, the meaning 8 represents the internal vibration that travels to the brain through 9 the channels of the Indriyas, conveying the external impression to 10 the mind, and knowledge represents the reaction of the mind, with 11 which comes perception. These three, confused, make our sense-12 objects. Suppose I hear a word; there is first the external vibration, 13 next the internal sensation carried to the mind by the organ of 14 hearing, then the mind reacts, and I know the word. The word I 15 know is a mixture of the three-vibration, sensation, and reaction.
16 Ordinarily these three are inseparable; but by practice the Yogi can 17 separate them. When a man has attained to this, if he makes a 18 Samyama on any sound, he understands the meaning which that 19 sound was intended to express, whether it was made by man or by 20 any other animal.

21 {Sanskrit}

22 18. By perceiving the impressions, (comes) the knowledge of 23 past life.

24 Each experience that we have, comes in the form of a wave in 25 the Chitta, and this subsides and becomes finer and finer, but is 26 never lost. It remains there in minute form, and if we can bring this 27 wave up again, it becomes memory. So, if the Yogi can make a 28 Samyama on these past impressions in the mind, he will begin to 29 remember all his past lives.

30 {Sanskrit}

31 19. By making Samyama on the signs in another's body, 32 knowledge of his mind comes.

33 Each man has particular signs on his body, which differentiate 34 him from others; when the Yogi makes a Samyama on these signs 35 he knows the nature of the mind of that person.

36 {Sanskrit}

37 20. But not its contents, that not being the object of the 38 Samyama.

39 He would not know the contents of the mind by making a 40 Samyama on the body. There would be required a twofold 41 Samyama, first on the signs in the body, and then on the mind itself.
42 The Yogi would then know everything that is in that mind.

43 {Sanskrit}

44 21. By making Samyama on the form of the body, the 45 perceptibility of the form being obstructed and the power of 46 manifestation in the eye being separated, the Yogi's body becomes 47 unseen.

1 A Yogi standing in the midst of this room can apparently 2 vanish. He does not really vanish, but he will not be seen by 3 anyone. The form and the body are, as it were, separated. You must 4 remember that this can only be done when the Yogi has attained to 5 that power of concentration when form and the thing formed have 6 been separated. Then he makes a Samyama on that, and the power 7 to perceive forms is obstructed, because the power of perceiving 8 forms comes from the junction of form and the thing formed.

9 {Sanskrit}

10 22. By this the disappearance or concealment of words which 11 are being spoken and such other things are also explained.

12 {Sanskrit}

13 23. Karma is of two kinds--soon to be fructified and late to be 14 fructified. By making Samyama on these, or by the signs called 15 Arishta, portents, the Yogis know the exact time of separation from 16 their bodies.

17 When a Yogi makes a Samyama on his own Karma, upon 18 those impressions in his mind which are now working, and those 19 which are just waiting to work, he knows exactly by those that are 20 waiting when his body will fall. He knows when he will die, at what 21 hour, even at what minute. The Hindus think very much of that 22 knowledge or consciousness of the nearness of death, because it is 23 taught in the Gita that the thoughts at the moment of departure are 24 great powers in determining the next life.

25 {Sanskrit}

26 24. By making Samyama on friendship, mercy, etc. (I.33), the 27 Yogi excels in the respective qualities.

28 {Sanskrit}

29 25. By making Samyama on the strength of the elephant and 30 others, their respective strength comes to the Yogi.

31 When a Yogi has attained to this Samyama and wants 32 strength, he makes a Samyama on the strength of the elephant and 33 gets it. Infinite energy is at the disposal of everyone if he only 34 knows how to get it. The Yogi has discovered the science of getting 35 it.

36 {Sanskrit}

37 26. By making Samyama on the Effulgent Light (I.36), comes 38 the knowledge of the fine, the obstructed, and the remote.

39 When the Yogi makes Samyama on that Effulgent Light in the 40 heart, he sees things which are very remote, things, for instance, 41 that are happening in a distant place, and which are obstructed by 42 mountain barriers, and also things which are very fine.

43 {Sanskrit}

44 27. By making Samyama on the sun, (comes) the knowledge 45 of the world.

46 {Sanskrit}

- 1 28. On the moon, (comes) the knowledge of the cluster of 2 stars.
3 {Sanskrit}
- 4 29. On the pole-star, (comes) the knowledge of the motions of 5 the stars.
6 {Sanskrit}
- 7 30. On the navel circle, (comes) the knowledge of the 8 constitution of the body.
9 {Sanskrit}
- 10 31. On the hollow of the throat, (comes) cessation of hunger.
11 When a man is very hungry, if he can make Samyama on the 12 hollow of the throat, hunger ceases.
13 {Sanskrit}
- 14 32. On the nerve called Kurma, (comes) fixity of the body.
15 When he is practising, the body is not disturbed.
16 {Sanskrit}
- 17 33. On the light emanating from the top of the head, sight of 18 the Siddhas.
19 The Siddhas are beings who are a little above ghosts. When 20 the Yogi concentrates his mind on the top of his head, he will see 21 these Siddhas. The word Siddha does not refer to those men who 22 have become free--a sense in which it is often used.
23 {Sanskrit}
- 24 34. Or by the power of Pratibha, all knowledge.
25 All these can come without any Samyama to the man who has 26 the power of Pratibha (spontaneous enlightenment from purity).
27 When a man has risen to a high state of Pratibha, he has that great 28 light. All things are apparent to him. Everything comes to him 29 naturally without making Samyama.
30 {Sanskrit}
- 31 35. In the heart, knowledge of minds.
32 {Sanskrit}
- 33 36. Enjoyment comes from the non-discrimination of the soul
34 and Sattva which are totally different because the latter's actions 35 are for another. Samyama on the self-centred one gives knowledge 36 of the Purusha.
37 All action of Sattva, a modification of Prakriti characterised 38 by light and happiness, is for the soul. When Sattva is free from 39 egoism and illuminated with the pure intelligence of Purusha, it is 40 called the self-centred one, because in that state it becomes 41 independent of all relations.
42 {Sanskrit}
- 43 37. From that arises the knowledge belonging to Pratibha and

1 (supernatural) hearing, touching, seeing, tasting and smelling.

2 {Sanskrit}

3 38. These are obstacles to Samadhi; but they are powers in 4 the worldly state.

5 To the Yogi knowledge of the enjoyments of the world comes 6 by the junction of the Purusha and the mind. If he wants to make 7 Samyama on the knowledge that they are two different things, 8 nature and soul, he gets knowledge of the Purusha. From that 9 arises discrimination. When he has got that discrimination, he gets 10 the Pratibha, the light of supreme genius. These powers, however, 11 are obstructions to the attainment of the highest goal, the 12 knowledge of the pure Self, and freedom. These are, as it were, to 13 be met in the way; and if the Yogi rejects them, he attains the 14 highest. If he is tempted to acquire these, his further progress is 15 barred.

16 {Sanskrit}

17 39. When the cause of bondage of the Chitta has become 18 loosened, the Yogi, by his knowledge of its channels of activity (the 19 nerves), enters another's body.

20 The Yogi can enter a dead body and make it get up and move, 21 even while he himself is working in another body. Or he can enter a 22 living body and hold that man's mind and organs in check, and for 23 the time being act through the body of that man. That is done by 24 the Yogi coming to this discrimination of Purusha and nature. If he 25 wants to enter another's body, he makes a Samyama on that body 26 and enters it, because, not only is his soul omnipresent, but his 27 mind also, as the Yogi teaches. It is one bit of the universal mind.
28 Now, however, it can only work through the nerve currents in this 29 body, but when the Yogi has loosened himself from these nerve 30 currents, he can work through other things.

31 {Sanskrit}

32 40. By conquering the current called Udana the Yogi does not 33 sink in water or in swamps, he can walk on thorns etc., and can die 34 at will.

35 Udana is the name of the nerve current that governs the 36 lungs and all the upper parts of the body, and when he is master of 37 it, he becomes light in weight. He does not sink in water; he can 38 walk on thorns and sword blades, and stand in fire, and can depart 39 this life when ever he likes.

40 {Sanskrit}

41 41. By the conquest of the current Samana he is surrounded 42 by a blaze of light.

43 Whenever he likes, light flashes from his body.

44 {Sanskrit}

45 42. By making Samyama on the relation between the ear and 46 the Akasha comes divine hearing.

47 There is the Akasha, the ether, and the instrument, the ear.

1 By making Samyama on them the Yogi gets supernormal hearing;
2 he hears everything. Anything spoken or sounded miles away he 3 can hear.

4 {Sanskrit}

5 43. By making Samyama on the relation between the Akasha
6 and the body and becoming light as cotton-wool etc., through 7 meditation on them, the Yogi goes through the skies.

8 This Akasha is the material of this body; it is only Akasha in a 9 certain form that has become the body. If the Yogi makes a 10 Samyama on this Akasha material of his body, it acquires the 11 lightness of Akasha, and he can go anywhere through the air. So in 12 the other case also.

13 {Sanskrit}

14 44. By making Samyama on the "real modifications" of the 15 mind, outside of the body, called great disembodiedness, comes 16 disappearance of the covering to light.

17 The mind in its foolishness thinks that it is working in this 18 body. Why should I be bound by one system of nerves, and put the 19 Ego only in one body, if the mind is omnipresent? There is no reason 20 why I should. The Yogi wants to feel the Ego wherever he likes. The 21 mental waves which arise in the absence of egoism in the body are 22 called "real modifications" or "great disembodiedness". When he 23 has succeeded in making Samyama on these modifications, all 24 covering to light goes away, and all darkness and ignorance vanish.
25 Everything appears to him to be full of knowledge.

26 {Sanskrit}

27 45. By making Samyama on the gross and fine forms of the 28 elements, their essential traits, the inherence of the Gunas in them 29 and on their contributing to the experience of the soul, comes 30 mastery of the elements.

31 The Yogi makes Samyama on the elements, first on the gross, 32 and then on the finer states. This Samyama is taken up more by a 33 sect of the Buddhists. They take a lump of clay and make Samyama 34 on that, and gradually they begin to see the fine materials of which 35 it is composed, and when they have known all the fine materials in 36 it, they get power over that element. So with all the elements. The 37 Yogi can conquer them all.

38 {Sanskrit}

39 46. From that comes minuteness and the rest of the powers, 40 "glorification of the body," and indestructibleness of the bodily 41 qualities.

42 This means that the Yogi has attained the eight powers. He 43 can make himself as minute as a particle, or as huge as a mountain, 44 as heavy as the earth, or as light as the air; he can reach anything 45 he likes, he can rule everything he wants, he can conquer 46 everything he wants, and so on. A lion will sit at his feet like a lamb, 47 and all his desires will be fulfilled at will.

48 {Sanskrit}

1 47. The "glorification of the body" is beauty, complexion, 2 strength, adamant hardness.

3 The body becomes indestructible. Nothing can injure it.
4 Nothing can destroy it until the Yogi wishes. "Breaking the rod of 5 time he lives in this universe with his body." In the Vedas it is 6 written that for that man there is no more disease, death or pain.

7 {Sanskrit}

8 48. By making Samyama on the objectivity and power of 9 illumination of the organs, on egoism, the inherence of the Gunas in 10 them and on their contributing to the experience of the soul, comes 11 the conquest of the organs.

12 In the perception of external objects the organs leave their 13 place in the mind and go towards the object; this is followed by 14 knowledge. Egoism also is present in the act. When the Yogi makes 15 Samyama on these and the other two by gradation, he conquers the 16 organs. Take up anything that you see or feel, a book for instance; 17 first concentrate the mind on it, then on the knowledge that is in 18 the form of a book, and then on the Ego that sees the book, and so 19 on. By that practice all the organs will be conquered.

20 {Sanskrit}

21 49. From that comes to the body the power of rapid 22 movement like the mind, power of the organs independently of the 23 body, and conquest of nature.

24 Just as by the conquest of the elements comes glorified body, 25 so from the conquest of the organs will come the above-mentioned 26 powers.

27 {Sanskrit}

28 50. By making Samyama on the discrimination between the 29 Sattva and the Purusha come omnipotence and omniscience.

30 When nature has been conquered, and the difference 31 between the Purusha and nature realised--that the Purusha is 32 indestructible, pure and perfect--then come omnipotence and 33 omniscience.

34 {Sanskrit}

35 51. By giving up even these powers comes the destruction of 36 the very seed of evil, which leads to Kaivalya.

37 He attains aloneness, independence, and becomes free. When 38 one gives up even the ideas of omnipotence and omniscience, there 39 comes entire rejection of enjoyment, of the temptations from 40 celestial beings. When the Yogi has seen all these wonderful 41 powers, and rejected them, he reaches the goal. What are all these 42 powers? Simply manifestations. They are no better than dreams.
43 Even omnipotence is a dream. It depends on the mind. So long as 44 there is a mind it can be understood, but the goal is beyond even 45 the mind.

46 {Sanskrit}

47 52. The Yogi should not feel allured or flattered by the 1 overtures of celestial beings for fear of evil again.

2 There are other dangers too; gods and other beings come to 3 tempt the Yogi. They do not want anyone to be perfectly free. They 4 are jealous, just as we are, and worse than us sometimes. They are 5 very much afraid of losing their places. Those Yogis who do not 6 reach perfection die and become gods; leaving the direct road they 7 go into one of the side streets, and get these powers. Then, again, 8 they have to be born. But he who is strong enough to withstand 9 these temptations and go straight to the goal, becomes free.

10 {Sanskrit}

11 53. By making Samyama on a particle of time and its 12 precession and succession comes discrimination.

13 How are we to avoid all these things, these Devas, and 14 heavens, and powers? By discrimination, by knowing good from 15 evil. Therefore a Samyama is given by which the power of 16 discrimination can be strengthened. This is by making a Samyama 17 on a particle of time, and the time preceding and following it.

18 {Sanskrit}

19 54. Those things which cannot be differentiated by species, 20 sign, and place, even they will be discriminated by the above
21 Samyama.

22 The misery that we suffer comes from ignorance, from non-23 discrimination between the real and the unreal. We all take the bad 24 for the good, the dream for the reality. Soul is the only reality, and 25 we have forgotten it. Body is an unreal dream, and we think we are 26 all bodies. This non-discrimination is the cause of misery. It is 27 caused by ignorance. When discrimination comes, it brings 28 strength, and then alone can we avoid all these various ideas of 29 body, heavens, and gods. This ignorance arises through 30 differentiating by species, sign, and place. For instance, take a cow.
31 The cow is differentiated from the dog by species. Even with the 32 cows alone how do we make the distinction between one cow and 33 another? By signs. If two objects are exactly similar, they can be 34 distinguished if they are in different places. When objects are so 35 mixed up that even these differentiae will not help us, the power of 36 discrimination acquired by the above-mentioned practice will give 37 us the ability to distinguish them. The highest philosophy of the 38 Yogi is based upon this fact, that the Purusha is pure and perfect, 39 and is the only "simple" that exists in this universe. The body and 40 mind are compounds, and yet we are ever identifying ourselves 41 with them. This is the great mistake that the distinction has been 42 lost. When this power of discrimination has been attained, man sees 43 that everything in this world, mental and physical, is a compound, 44 and, as such, cannot be the Purusha.

45 {Sanskrit}

46 55. The saving knowledge is that knowledge of discrimination 47 which simultaneously covers all objects, in all their variations.

48 Saving, because the knowledge takes the Yogi across the 49 ocean of birth and death. The whole of Prakriti in all its states,

1 subtle and gross, is within the grasp of this knowledge. There is no 2 succession in perception by this knowledge; it takes in all things 3 simultaneously, at a glance.

4 {Sanskrit}

5 56. By the similarity of purity between the Sattva and the 6 Purusha comes Kaivalya.

7 When the soul realises that it depends on nothing in the 8 universe, from gods to the lowest atom, that is called Kaivalya
9 (isolation) and perfection. It is attained when this mixture of purity 10 and impurity called Sattva (intellect) has been made as pure as the 11 Purusha itself; then the Sattva reflects only the unqualified essence 12 of purity, which is the Purusha.

INDEPENDENCE

{Sanskrit}

1. The Siddhis (powers) are attained by birth, chemical means, power of words, mortification, or concentration.

Sometimes a man is born with the Siddhis, powers, of course, those he had earned in his previous incarnation. This time he is born, as it were, to enjoy the fruits of them. It is said of Kapila, the great father of the Sankhya philosophy, that he was a born Siddha, which means literally a man who has attained to success.

The Yogis claim that these powers can be gained by chemical means. All of you know that chemistry originally began as alchemy; men went in search of the philosopher's stone and elixirs of life, and so forth. In India there was a sect called the Rasayanas. Their idea was that ideality, knowledge, spirituality, and religion were all very right, but that the body was the only instrument by which to attain to all these. If the body came to an end every now and again, it would take so much more time to attain to the goal. For instance, a man wants to practise Yoga, or wants to become spiritual. Before he has advanced very far he dies. Then he takes another body and begins again, then dies, and so on. In this way much time will be lost in dying and being born again. If the body could be made strong and perfect, so that it would get rid of birth and death, we should have so much more time to become spiritual. So these Rasayanas say, first make the body very strong. They claim that this body can be made immortal. Their idea is that if the mind manufactures the body, and if it be true that each mind is only one outlet to the infinite energy, there should be no limit to each outlet getting any amount of power from outside. Why is it impossible to keep our bodies all the time? We have to manufacture all the bodies that we ever have. As soon as this body dies, we shall have to manufacture another. If we can do that, why cannot we do it just here and now, without getting out of the present body? The theory is perfectly correct. If it is possible that we live after death, and make other bodies, why is it impossible that we should have the power of making bodies here, without entirely dissolving this body, simply changing it continually? They also thought that in mercury and in sulphur was hidden the most wonderful power, and that by certain preparations of these a man could keep the body as long as he liked. Others believed that certain drugs could bring powers, such as flying through the air. Many of the most wonderful medicines of the present day we owe to the Rasayanas, notably the use of metals in medicine. Certain sects of Yogis claim that many of their principal teachers are still living in their old bodies. Patanjali, the great authority on Yoga, does not deny this.

The power of words. There are certain sacred words called Mantras, which have power, when repeated under proper conditions, to produce these extraordinary powers. We are living in the midst of such a mass of miracles, day and night, that we do not think anything of them. There is no limit to man's power, the power of words and the power of mind.

Mortification. You find that in every religion mortifications

1 and asceticisms have been practised. In these religious conceptions 2 the Hindus always go to the extremes. You will find men with their 3 hands up all their lives, until their hands wither and die. Men keep 4 standing, day and night, until their feet swell, and if they live, the 5 legs become so stiff in this position that they can no more bend 6 them, but have to stand all their lives. I once saw a man who had 7 kept his hands raised in this way, and I asked him how it felt when 8 he did it first. He said it was awful torture. It was such torture that 9 he had to go to a river and put himself in water, and that allayed the 10 pain for a little while. After a month he did not suffer much.
11 Through such practices powers (Siddhis) can be attained.

12 Concentration. Concentration is Samadhi, and that is Yoga 13 proper; that is the principal theme of this science, and it is the 14 highest means. The preceding ones are only secondary, and we 15 cannot attain to the highest through them. Samadhi is the means 16 through which we can gain anything and everything, mental, moral, 17 or spiritual.

18 {Sanskrit}

19 2. The change into another species is by the filling in of 20 nature.

21 Patanjali has advanced the proposition that these powers 22 come by birth, sometimes by chemical means, or through 23 mortification. He also admits that this body can be kept for any 24 length of time. Now he goes on to state what is the cause of the 25 change of the body into another species. He says this is done by the 26 filling in of nature, which he explains in the next aphorism.

27 {Sanskrit}

28 3. Good and bad deeds are not the direct causes in the 29 transformations of nature, but they act as breakers of obstacles to 30 the evolutions of nature: as a farmer breaks the obstacles to the 31 course of water, which then runs down by its own nature.

32 The water for irrigation of fields is already in the canal, only 33 shut in by gates. The farmer opens these gates, and the water flows 34 in by itself, by the law of gravitation. So all progress and power are 35 already in every man; perfection is man's nature, only it is barred in 36 and prevented from taking its proper course. If anyone can take the 37 bar off, in rushes nature. Then the man attains the powers which 38 are his already. Those we call wicked become saints, as soon as the 39 bar is broken and nature rushes in. It is nature that is driving us 40 towards perfection, and eventually she will bring everyone there.
41 All these practices and struggles to become religious are only 42 negative work, to take off the bars, and open the doors to that 43 perfection which is our birthright, our nature.

44 Today the evolution theory of the ancient Yogis will be better 45 understood in the light of modern research. And yet the theory of 46 the Yogis is a better explanation. The two causes of evolution 47 advanced by the moderns, viz. sexual selection and survival of the 48 fittest, are inadequate. Suppose human knowledge to have 49 advanced so much as to eliminate competition, both from the 50 function of acquiring physical sustenance and of acquiring a mate.

1 Then, according to the moderns, human progress will stop and the 2 race will die. The result of this theory is to furnish every oppressor 3 with an argument to calm the qualms of conscience. Men are not 4 lacking, who, posing as philosophers, want to kill out all wicked and 5 incompetent persons (they are, of course, the only judges of 6 competency) and thus preserve the human race! But the great 7 ancient evolutionist, Patanjali, declares that the true secret of 8 evolution is the manifestation of the perfection which is already in 9 every being; that this perfection has been barred and the infinite 10 tide behind is struggling to express itself. These struggles and 11 competitions are but the results of our ignorance, because we do 12 not know the proper way to unlock the gate and let the water in.
13 This infinite tide behind must express itself; it is the cause of all 14 manifestation.

15 Competitions for life or sex-gratification are only momentary, 16 unnecessary, extraneous effects, caused by ignorance. Even when 17 all competition has ceased, this perfect nature behind will make us 18 go forward until everyone has become perfect. Therefore there is 19 no reason to believe that competition is necessary to progress. In 20 the animal the man was suppressed, but as soon as the door was 21 opened, out rushed man. So in man there is the potential god, kept 22 in by the locks and bars of ignorance. When knowledge breaks 23 these bars, the god becomes manifest.

24 {Sanskrit}

25 4. From egoism alone proceed the created minds.

26 The theory of Karma is that we suffer for our good or bad 27 deeds, and the whole scope of philosophy is to reach the glory of 28 man. All the scriptures sing the glory of man, of the soul, and then, 29 in the same breath, they preach Karma. A good deed brings such a 30 result, and a bad deed such another, but if the soul can be acted 31 upon by a good or a bad deed, the soul amounts to nothing. Bad 32 deeds put a bar to the manifestation of the nature of the Purusha;
33 good deeds take the obstacles off, and the glory of the Purusha 34 becomes manifest. The Purusha itself is never changed. Whatever 35 you do never destroys your own glory, your own nature, because the 36 soul cannot be acted upon by anything, only a veil is spread before 37 it, hiding its perfection.

38 With a view to exhausting their Karma quickly, Yogis create 39 Kaya-vyuha, or groups of bodies, in which to work it out. For all 40 these bodies they create minds from egoism. These are called 41 "created minds", in contradistinction to their original minds.

42 {Sanskrit}

43 5. Though the activities of the different created minds are 44 various, the one original mind is the controller of them all.

45 These different minds, which act in these different bodies are 46 called made-minds, and the bodies, made-bodies; that is, 47 manufactured bodies and minds. Matter and mind are like two 48 inexhaustible storehouses. When you become a Yogi, you learn the 49 secret of their control. It was yours all the time, but you had 50 forgotten it. When you become a Yogi, you recollect it. Then you can 1 do anything with it, manipulate it in every way you like. The 2 material out of which a manufactured mind is created is the very 3 same material which is used for the macrocosm. It is not that mind 4 is one thing and matter another, they are different aspects of the 5 same thing. Asmita, egoism, is the material, the fine state of 6 existence out of which these made-minds and made-bodies of the 7 Yogi are manufactured. Therefore, when the Yogi has found the 8 secret of these energies of nature, he can manufacture any number 9 of bodies or minds out of the substance known as egoism.

10 {Sanskrit}

11 6. Among the various Chittas, that which is attained by 12 Samadhi is desireless.

13 Among all the various minds that we see in various men, only 14 that mind which has attained to Samadhi, perfect concentration, is 15 the highest. A man who has attained certain powers through 16 medicines, or through words, or through mortifications, still has 17 desires, but that man who has attained to Samadhi through 18 concentration is alone free from all desires.

19 {Sanskrit}

20 7. Works are neither black nor white for the Yogis; for others 21 they are threefold--black, white, and mixed.

22 When the Yogi has attained perfection, his actions, and the 23 Karma produced by those actions, do not bind him, because he did 24 not desire them. He just works on; he works to do good, and he 25 does good, but does not care for the result, and it will not come to 26 him. But, for ordinary men, who have not attained to the highest 27 state, works are of three kinds, black (evil actions), white (good 28 actions), and mixed.

29 {Sanskrit}

30 8. From these threefold works are manifested in each state 31 only those desires (which are) fitting to that state alone. (The others 32 are held in abeyance for the time being.)

33 Suppose I have made the three kinds of Karma, good, bad, 34 and mixed, and suppose I die and become a god in heaven. The 35 desires in a god body are not the same as the desires in a human 36 body; the god body neither eats nor drinks. What becomes of my 37 past unworked Karmas which produce as their effect the desire to 38 eat and drink? Where would these Karmas go when I become a 39 god? The answer is that desires can only manifest themselves in 40 proper environments. Only those desires will come out for which 41 the environment is fitted; the rest will remain stored up. In this life 42 we have many godly desires, many human desires, many animal 43 desires. If I take a god body, only the good desires will come up, 44 because for them the environments are suitable. And if I take an 45 animal body, only the animal desires will come up, and the good 46 desires will wait. What does this show? That by means of 47 environment we can check these desires. Only that Karma which is 48 suited to and fitted for the environments will come out. This shows 49 that the power of environment is the great check to control even

1 Karma itself.

2 {Sanskrit}

3 9. There is consecutiveness in desires, even though separated 4 by species, space, and time, there being identification of memory 5 and impressions.

6 Experiences becoming fine become impressions; impressions
7 revived become memory. The word memory here includes 8 unconscious co-ordination of past experiences, reduced to 9 impressions, with present conscious action. In each body, the group 10 of impressions acquired in a similar body only becomes the cause of 11 action in that body. The experiences of a dissimilar body are held in 12 abeyance. Each body acts as if it were a descendant of a series of 13 bodies of that species only; thus, consecutiveness of desires is not 14 to be broken.

15 {Sanskrit}

16 10. Thirst for happiness being eternal, desires are without 17 beginning.

18 All experience is preceded by desire for happiness. There was 19 no beginning of experience, as each fresh experience is built upon 20 the tendency generated by past experience; therefore desire is 21 without beginning.

22 {Sanskrit}

23 11. Being held together by cause, effect, support, and objects, 24 in the absence of these is its absence.

25 Desires are held together by cause and effect; if a desire has 26 been raised, it does not die without producing its effect. Then, 27 again, the mind-stuff is the great storehouse, the support of all past 28 desires reduced to Samskara form; until they have worked 29 themselves out, they will not die. Moreover, so long as the senses 30 receive the external objects, fresh desires will arise. If it be possible 31 to get rid of the cause, effect, support, and objects of desire, then 32 alone it will vanish.

33 {Sanskrit}

34 12. The past and future exist in their own nature, qualities 35 having different ways.

36 The idea is that existence never comes out of non-existence.
37 The past and future, though not existing in a manifested form, yet 38 exist in a fine form.

39 {Sanskrit}

40 13. They are manifested or fine, being of the nature of the 41 Gunas.

42 The Gunas are the three substances, Sattva, Rajas, and 43 Tamas, whose gross state is the sensible universe. Past and future 44 arise from the different modes of manifestation of these Gunas.

45 {Sanskrit}

46 14. The unity in things is from the unity in changes.

1 Though there are three substances, their changes being co-
2 ordinated, all objects have their unity.

3 {Sanskrit}

4 15. Since perception and desire vary with regard to the same 5 object, mind and object are of different nature.

6 That is, there is an objective world independent of our minds.
7 This is a refutation of Buddhistic Idealism. Since different people 8 look at the same thing differently, it cannot be a mere imagination 9 of any particular individual.

10 {Sanskrit}

11 16. Things are known or unknown to the mind, being 12 dependent on the colouring which they give to the mind.

13 {Sanskrit}

14 17. The states of the mind are always known, because the 15 lord of the mind, the Purusha, is unchangeable.

16 The whole gist of this theory is that the universe is both 17 mental and material. Both of these are in a continuous state of flux.
18 What is this book? It is a combination of molecules in constant 19 change. One lot is going out, and another coming in; it is a 20 whirlpool, but what makes the unity? What makes it the same book?
21 The changes are rhythmical; in harmonious order they are sending 22 impressions to my mind, and these pieced together make a 23 continuous picture, although the parts are continuously changing.
24 Mind itself is continuously changing.

25 The mind and body are like two layers in the same substance, 26 moving at different rates of speed. Relatively, one being slower and 27 the other quicker, we can distinguish between the two motions. For 28 instance, a train is in motion, and a carriage is moving alongside it.
29 It is possible to find the motion of both these to a certain extent. But 30 still something else is necessary. Motion can only be perceived 31 when there is something else which is not moving. But when two or 32 three things are relatively moving, we first perceive the motion of 33 the faster one, and then that of the slower ones. How is the mind to 34 perceive? It is also in a flux. Therefore another thing is necessary 35 which moves more slowly, then you must get to something in which 36 the motion is still slower, and so on, and you will find no end.
37 Therefore logic compels you to stop somewhere. You must complete 38 the series by knowing something which never changes. Behind this 39 never-ending chain of motion is the Purusha, the changeless, the 40 colourless, the pure. All these impressions are merely reflected 41 upon it, as a magic lantern throws images upon a screen, without in 42 any way tarnishing it.

43 {Sanskrit}

44 18. The mind is not self-luminous, being an object.

45 Tremendous power is manifested everywhere in nature, but it 46 is not self-luminous, not essentially intelligent. The Purusha alone is 47 self-luminous, and gives its light to everything. It is the power of the 48 Purusha that is percolating through all matter and force.

1 {Sanskrit}

2 19. From its being unable to cognise both at the same time.

3 If the mind were self-luminous it would be able to cognise
4 itself and its objects at the same time, which it cannot. When it 5 cognises the object, it cannot reflect on itself. Therefore the 6 Purusha is self-luminous, and the mind is not.

7 {Sanskrit}

8 20. Another cognising mind being assumed, there will be no 9 end to such assumptions, and confusion of memory will be the 10 result.

11 Let us suppose there is another mind which cognises the 12 ordinary mind, then there will have to be still another to cognise the 13 former, and so there will be no end to it. It will result in confusion of 14 memory, there will be no storehouse of memory.

15 {Sanskrit}

16 21. The essence of knowledge (the Purusha) being 17 unchangeable, when the mind takes its form, it becomes conscious.

18 Patanjali says this to make it more clear that knowledge is not 19 a quality of the Purusha. When the mind comes near the Purusha it 20 is reflected, as it were, upon the mind, and the mind, for the time 21 being, becomes knowing and seems as if it were itself the Purusha.

22 {Sanskrit}

23 22. Coloured by the seer and the seen the mind is able to 24 understand everything.

25 On one side of the mind the external world, the seen, is being 26 reflected, and on the other, the seer is being reflected. Thus comes 27 the power of all knowledge to the mind.

28 {Sanskrit}

29 23. The mind, though variegated by innumerable desires, acts 30 for another (the Purusha), because it acts in combination.

31 The mind is a compound of various things and therefore it 32 cannot work for itself. Everything that is a combination in this world 33 has some object for that combination, some third thing for which 34 this combination is going on. So this combination of the mind is for 35 the Purusha.

36 {Sanskrit}

37 24. For the discriminating, the perception of the mind as 38 Atman ceases.

39 Through discrimination the Yogi knows that the Purusha is 40 not mind.

41 {Sanskrit}

42 25. Then, bent on discriminating, the mind attains the 43 previous state of Kaivalya (isolation).

44 Thus the practice of Yoga leads to discriminating power, to 45 clearness of vision. The veil drops from the eyes, and we see things

1 as they are. We find that nature is a compound, and is showing the 2 panorama for the Purusha, who is the witness; that nature is not 3 the Lord, that all the combinations of nature are simply for the sake
4 of showing these phenomena to the Purusha, the enthroned king
5 within. When discrimination comes by long practice, fear ceases, 6 and the mind attains isolation.

7 {Sanskrit}

8 26. The thoughts that arise as obstructions to that are from 9 impressions.

10 All the various ideas that arise, making us believe that we 11 require something external to make us happy, are obstructions to 12 that perfection. The Purusha is happiness and blessedness by its 13 own nature. But that knowledge is covered over by past 14 impressions. These impressions have to work themselves out.

15 {Sanskrit}

16 27. Their destruction is in the same manner as of ignorance, 17 egoism, etc., as said before (II.10).

18 {Sanskrit}

19 28. Even when arriving at the right discriminating knowledge 20 of the essences, he who gives up the fruits, unto him comes, as the 21 result of perfect discrimination, the Samadhi called the cloud of 22 virtue.

23 When the Yogi has attained to this discrimination, all the 24 powers mentioned in the last chapter come to him, but the true Yogi 25 rejects them all. Unto him comes a peculiar knowledge, a particular 26 light, called the Dharma-megha, the cloud of virtue. All the great 27 prophets of the world whom history has recorded had this. They 28 had found the whole foundation of knowledge within themselves.
29 Truth to them had become real. Peace and calmness, and perfect 30 purity became their own nature, after they had given up the 31 vanities of powers.

32 {Sanskrit}

33 29. From that comes cessation of pain and works.

34 When that cloud of virtue has come, then no more is there 35 fear of falling, nothing can drag the Yogi down. No more will there 36 be evils for him. No more pains.

37 {Sanskrit}

38 30. The knowledge, bereft of covering and impurities, 39 becoming infinite, the knowable becomes small.

40 Knowledge itself is there; its covering is gone. One of the 41 Buddhistic scriptures defines what is meant by the Buddha (which 42 is the name of a state) as infinite knowledge, infinite as the sky.
43 Jesus attained to that and became the Christ. All of you will attain 44 to that state. Knowledge becoming infinite, the knowable becomes 45 small. The whole universe, with all its objects of knowledge, 46 becomes as nothing before the Purusha. The ordinary man thinks 47 himself very small, because to him the knowable seems to be 1 infinite.

2 {Sanskrit}

3 31. Then are finished the successive transformations of the 4 qualities, they having attained the end.

5 Then all these various transformations of the qualities, which 6 change from species to species, cease for ever.

7 {Sanskrit}

8 32. The changes that exist in relation to moments and which 9 are perceived at the other end (at the end of a series) are 10 succession.

11 Patanjali here defines the word succession, the changes that 12 exist in relation to moments. While I think, many moments pass, 13 and with each moment there is a change of idea, but I only perceive 14 these changes at the end of a series. This is called succession, but 15 for the mind that has realised omnipresence there is no succession.
16 Everything has become present for it; to it the present alone exists, 17 the past and future are lost. Time stands controlled, all knowledge 18 is there in one second. Everything is known like a flash.

19 {Sanskrit}

20 33. The resolution in the inverse order of the qualities, bereft 21 of any motive of action for the Purusha, is Kaivalya, or it is the 22 establishment of the power of knowledge in its own nature.

23 Nature's task is done, this unselfish task which our sweet 24 nurse, nature, had imposed upon herself. She gently took the self-25 forgetting soul by the hand, as it were, and showed him all the 26 experiences in the universe, all manifestations, bringing him higher 27 and higher through various bodies, till his lost glory came back, and 28 he remembered his own nature. Then the kind mother went back 29 the same way she came, for others who also have lost their way in 30 the trackless desert of life. And thus is she working, without 31 beginning and without end. And thus through pleasure and pain, 32 through good and evil, the infinite river of souls is flowing into the 33 ocean of perfection, of self-realisation.

34 Glory unto those who have realised their own nature. May 35 their blessing be on us all!

Shvetashvatara Upanishad

Chapter II

{Sanskrit}

6. Where the fire is rubbed, where the air is controlled, where the Soma flows over, there a (perfect) mind is created.

{Sanskrit}

8. Placing the body in a straight posture, with the chest, the throat, and the head held erect, making the organs enter the mind, the sage crosses all the fearful currents by means of the raft of Brahman.

{Sanskrit}

9. The man of well-regulated endeavours controls the Prana; and when it has become quieted, breathes out through the nostrils. The persevering sage holds his mind as a charioteer holds the restive horses.

{Sanskrit}

10. In (lonely) places as mountain caves where the floor is even, free of pebbles, fire, or sand, where there are no disturbing noises from men or waterfalls, in auspicious places helpful to the mind and pleasing to the eyes. Yoga is to be practised (mind is to be joined).

{Sanskrit}

11. Like snowfall, smoke, sun, wind, fire, firefly, lightning, crystal, moon, these forms, coming before, gradually manifest the Brahman in Yoga.

{Sanskrit}

12. When the perceptions of Yoga, arising from earth, water, light, fire, ether, have taken place, then Yoga has begun. Unto him does not come disease, nor old age, nor death, who has got a body made up of the fire of Yoga.

{Sanskrit}

13. The first signs of entering Yoga are lightness, health, non-covetousness, clearness of complexion, a beautiful voice, an agreeable odour in the body, and scantiness of excretions.

{Sanskrit}

14. As gold or silver, first covered with earth, and then cleaned, shines full of light, so the embodied man seeing the truth of the Atman as one, attains the goal and becomes sorrowless.

Yajnavalkya quoted by Shankara

{Sanskrit}

1 "After practising the postures as desired, according to rules, 2 then, O Gargi, the man who has conquered the posture will practise
3 Pranayama.

4 "Seated in an easy posture, on a (deer or tiger) skin, placed 5 on Kusha grass, worshipping Ganapati with fruits and sweetmeats, 6 placing the right palm on the left, holding the throat and head in 7 the same line, the lips closed and firm, facing the east or the north, 8 the eyes fixed on the tip of the nose, avoiding too much food or 9 fasting, the Nadis should be purified, without which the practice 10 will be fruitless. Thinking of the (seed-word) 'Hum,' at the junction 11 of Pingala and Ida (the right and the left nostrils), the Ida should be 12 filled with external air in twelve Matras (seconds); then the Yogi 13 meditates on fire in the same place with the word 'Rung,' and while 14 meditating thus, slowly ejects the air through the Pingala (right 15 nostril). Again filling in through the Pingala the air should be slowly 16 ejected through the Ida, in the same way. This should be practised 17 for three or four years, or three or four months, according to the 18 directions of a Guru, in secret (alone in a room), in the early 19 morning, at midday, in the evening, and at midnight (until) the 20 nerves become purified. Lightness of body, clear complexion, good 21 appetite, hearing of the Nada, are the signs of the purification of 22 nerves. Then should be practised Pranayama composed of Rechaka 23 (exhalation), Kumbhaka (retention), and Puraka (inhalation). Joining 24 the Prana with the Apana is Pranayama.

25 "In sixteen Matras filling the body from the head to the feet, 26 in thirty-two Matras the Prana is to be thrown out, and with sixty-27 four the Kumbhaka should be made.

28 "There is another Pranayama in which the Kumbhaka should 29 first be made with sixty-four Matras, then the Prana should be 30 thrown out with sixteen, and the body next filled with sixteen 31 Matras.

32 "By Pranayama impurities of the body are thrown out; by 33 Dharana the impurities of the mind; by Pratyahara impurities of 34 attachment; and by Samadhi is taken off everything that hides the 35 lordship of the Soul."

11. There is no law of place; wherever the mind is concentrated, there worship should be performed.

These several extracts give an idea of what other systems of Indian Philosophy have to say upon Yoga.

SOUL, GOD AND RELIGION

Through the vistas of the past the voice of the centuries is coming down to us; the voice of the sages of the Himalayas and the recluses of the forest; the voice that came to the Semitic races; the voice that spoke through Buddha and other spiritual giants; the voice that comes from those who live in the light that accompanied man in the beginning of the earth--the light that shines wherever man goes and lives with him for ever--is coming to us even now. This voice is like the little rivulets that come from the mountains. Now they disappear, and now they appear again in stronger flow till finally they unite in one mighty majestic flood. The messages that are coming down to us from the prophets and holy men and women of all sects and nations are joining their forces and speaking to us with the trumpet voice of the past. And the first message it brings us is: Peace be unto you and to all religions. It is not a message of antagonism, but of one united religion.

Let us study this message first. At the beginning of this century it was almost feared that religion was at an end. Under the tremendous sledge-hammer blows of scientific research, old superstitions were crumbling away like masses of porcelain. Those to whom religion meant only a bundle of creeds and meaningless ceremonials were in despair; they were at their wit's end. Everything was slipping between their fingers. For a time it seemed inevitable that the surging tide of agnosticism and materialism would sweep all before it. There were those who did not dare utter what they thought. Many thought the case hopeless and the cause of religion lost once and for ever. But the tide has turned and to the rescue has come--what? The study of comparative religions. By the study of different religions we find that in essence they are one.

When I was a boy, this scepticism reached me, and it seemed for a time as if I must give up all hope of religion. But fortunately for me I studied the Christian religion, the Mohammedan, the Buddhistic, and others, and what was my surprise to find that the same foundation principles taught by my religion were also taught by all religions. It appealed to me this way. What is the truth? I asked. Is this world true? Yes. Why? Because I see it. Are the beautiful sounds we just heard (the vocal and instrumental music) true? Yes. Because we heard them. We know that man has a body, eyes, and ears, and he has a spiritual nature which we cannot see. And with his spiritual faculties he can study these different religions and find that whether a religion is taught in the forests and jungles of India or in a Christian land, in essentials all religions are one. This only shows us that religion is a constitutional necessity of the human mind. The proof of one religion depends on the proof of all the rest. For instance, if I have six fingers, and no one else has, you may well say that is abnormal. The same reasoning may be applied to the argument that only one religion is true and all others false. One religion only, like one set of six fingers in the world, would be unnatural. We see, therefore, that if one religion is true, all others must be true. There are differences in non-essentials, but in essentials they are all one. If my five fingers are true, they prove that your five fingers are true too. Wherever man is, he must 1 develop a belief, he must develop his religious nature.

2 And another fact I find in the study of the various religions of 3 the world is that there are three different stages of ideas with 4 regard to the soul and God. In the first place, all religions admit 5 that, apart from the body which perishes, there is a certain part or 6 something which does not change like the body, a part that is 7 immutable, eternal, that never dies; but some of the later religions 8 teach that although there is a part of us that never dies, it had a 9 beginning. But anything that has a beginning must necessarily have 10 an end. We--the essential part of us--never had a beginning, and will 11 never have an end. And above us all, above this eternal nature, 12 there is another eternal Being, without end--God. People talk about 13 the beginning of the world, the beginning of man. The word 14 beginning simply means the beginning of the cycle. It nowhere 15 means the beginning of the whole Cosmos. It is impossible that 16 creation could have a beginning. No one of you can imagine a time 17 of beginning. That which has a beginning must have an end. "Never 18 did I not exist, nor you, nor will any of us ever hereafter cease to 19 be," says the Bhagavad-Gita. Wherever the beginning of creation is 20 mentioned, it means the beginning of a cycle. Your body will meet 21 with death, but your soul, never.

22 Along with this idea of the soul we find another group of ideas
23 in regard to its perfection. The soul in itself is perfect. The Old 24 Testament of the Hebrews admits man perfect at the beginning.
25 Man made himself impure by his own actions. But he is to regain 26 his old nature, his pure nature. Some speak of these things in 27 allegories, fables, and symbols. But when we begin to analyse these 28 statements, we find that they all teach that the human soul is in its 29 very nature perfect, and that man is to regain that original purity.
30 How? By knowing God. Just as the Bible says, "No man can see God 31 but through the Son." What is meant by it? That seeing God is the 32 aim and goal of all human life. The sonship must come before we 33 become one with the Father. Remember that man lost his purity 34 through his own actions. When we suffer, it is because of our own 35 acts; God is not to be blamed for it.

36 Closely connected with these ideas is the doctrine--which was 37 universal before the Europeans mutilated it--the doctrine of 38 reincarnation. Some of you may have heard of and ignored it. This 39 idea of reincarnation runs parallel with the other doctrine of the 40 eternity of the human soul. Nothing which ends at one point can be 41 without a beginning and nothing that begins at one point can be 42 without an end. We cannot believe in such a monstrous impossibility 43 as the beginning of the human soul. The doctrine of reincarnation 44 asserts the freedom of the soul. Suppose there was an absolute 45 beginning. Then the whole burden of this impurity in man falls upon 46 God. The all-merciful Father responsible for the sins of the world! If 47 sin comes in this way, why should one suffer more than another?
48 Why such partiality, if it comes from an all-merciful God? Why are 49 millions trampled underfoot? Why do people starve who never did 50 anything to cause it? Who is responsible? If they had no hand in it, 51 surely, God would be responsible. Therefore the better explanation 52 is that one is responsible for the miseries one suffers. If I set the 1 wheel in motion, I am responsible for the result. And if I can bring 2 misery, I can also stop it. It necessarily follows that we are free.

3 There is no such thing as fate. There is nothing to compel us. What 4 we have done, that we can undo.

5 To one argument in connection with this doctrine I will ask 6 your patient attention, as it is a little intricate. We gain all our 7 knowledge through experience; that is the only way. What we call 8 experiences are on the plane of consciousness. For illustration: A 9 man plays a tune on a piano, he places each finger on each key 10 consciously. He repeats this process till the movement of the fingers 11 becomes a habit. He then plays a tune without having to pay special 12 attention to each particular key. Similarly, we find in regard to 13 ourselves that our tendencies are the result of past conscious 14 actions. A child is born with certain tendencies. Whence do they 15 come? No child is born with a tabula rasa --with a clean, blank 16 page--of a mind. The page has been written on previously. The old 17 Greek and Egyptian philosophers taught that no child came with a 18 vacant mind. Each child comes with a hundred tendencies 19 generated by past conscious actions. It did not acquire these in this 20 life, and we are bound to admit that it must have had them in past 21 lives. The rankest materialist has to admit that these tendencies are 22 the result of past actions, only they add that these tendencies come 23 through heredity. Our parents, grandparents, and great-24 grandparents come down to us through this law of heredity. Now if 25 heredity alone explains this, there is no necessity of believing in the 26 soul at all, because body explains everything. We need not go into 27 the different arguments and discussions on materialism and 28 spiritualism. So far the way is clear for those who believe in an 29 individual soul. We see that to come to a reasonable conclusion we 30 must admit that we have had past lives. This is the belief of the 31 great philosophers and sages of the past and of modern times. Such 32 a doctrine was believed in among the Jews. Jesus Christ believed in 33 it. He says in the Bible, "Before Abraham was, I am." And in 34 another place it is said, "This is Elias who is said to have come."

35 All the different religions which grew among different nations 36 under varying circumstances and conditions had their origin in 37 Asia, and the Asiatics understand them well. When they came out 38 from the motherland, they got mixed up with errors. The most 39 profound and noble ideas of Christianity were never understood in 40 Europe, because the ideas and images used by the writers of the 41 Bible were foreign to it. Take for illustration the pictures of the 42 Madonna. Every artist paints his Madonna according to his own 43 pre-conceived ideas. I have been seeing hundreds of pictures of the 44 Last Supper of Jesus Christ, and he is made to sit at a table. Now, 45 Christ never sat at a table; he squatted with others, and they had a 46 bowl in which they dipped bread--not the kind of bread you eat 47 today. It is hard for any nation to understand the unfamiliar customs 48 of other people. How much more difficult was it for Europeans to 49 understand the Jewish customs after centuries of changes and 50 accretions from Greek, Roman, and other sources! Through all the 51 myths and mythologies by which it is surrounded it is no wonder 52 that the people get very little of the beautiful religion of Jesus, and 1 no wonder that they have made of it a modern shop-keeping 2 religion.

3 To come to our point. We find that all religions teach the 4 eternity of the soul, as well as that its lustre has been dimmed, and 5 that its primitive purity is to be regained by the knowledge of God.
6 What is the idea of God in these different religions? The primary 7 idea of God was very vague. The most ancient nations had different 8 Deities--sun, earth, fire, water. Among the ancient Jews we find 9 numbers of these gods ferociously fighting with each other. Then 10 we find Elohim whom the Jews and the Babylonians worshipped. We 11 next find one God standing supreme. But the idea differed 12 according to different tribes. They each asserted that their God was 13 the greatest. And they tried to prove it by fighting. The one that 14 could do the best fighting proved thereby that its God was the 15 greatest. Those races were more or less savage. But gradually 16 better and better ideas took the place of the old ones. All those old 17 ideas are gone or going into the lumber-room. All those religions 18 were the outgrowth of centuries; not one fell from the skies. Each 19 had to be worked out bit by bit. Next come the monotheistic ideas: 20 belief in one God, who is omnipotent and omniscient, the one God of 21 the universe. This one God is extra-cosmic; he lies in the heavens.
22 He is invested with the gross conceptions of His originators. He has 23 a right side and a left side, and a bird in His hand, and so on and so 24 forth. But one thing we find, that the tribal gods have disappeared 25 for ever, and the one God of the universe has taken their place: the 26 God of gods. Still He is only an extra-cosmic God. He is 27 unapproachable; nothing can come near Him. But slowly this idea 28 has changed also, and at the next stage we find a God immanent in 29 nature.

30 In the New Testament it is taught, "Our Father who art in 31 heaven"--God living in the heavens separated from men. We are 32 living on earth and He is living in heaven. Further on we find the 33 teaching that He is a God immanent in nature; He is not only God in 34 heaven, but on earth too. He is the God in us. In the Hindu 35 philosophy we find a stage of the same proximity of God to us. But 36 we do not stop there. There is the non-dualistic stage, in which man 37 realises that the God he has been worshipping is not only the 38 Father in heaven, and on earth, but that "I and my Father are one."
39 He realises in his soul that he is God Himself, only a lower 40 expression of Him. All that is real in me is He; all that is real in Him 41 is I. The gulf between God and man is thus bridged. Thus we find 42 how, by knowing God, we find the kingdom of heaven within us.

43 In the first or dualistic stage, man knows he is a little 44 personal soul, John, James, or Tom; and he says, "I will be John, 45 James, or Tom to all eternity, and never anything else." As well 46 might the murderer come along and say, "I will remain a murderer 47 for ever." But as time goes on, Tom vanishes and goes back to the 48 original pure Adam.

49 "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Can 50 we see God? Of course not. Can we know God? Of course not. If 51 God can be known, He will be God no longer. Knowledge is 52 limitation. But I and my Father are one: I find the reality in my soul.

1 These ideas are expressed in some religions, and in others only 2 hinted. In some they were expatriated. Christ's teachings are now 3 very little understood in this country. If you will excuse me, I will 4 say that they have never been very well understood.

5 The different stages of growth are absolutely necessary to the 6 attainment of purity and perfection. The varying systems of religion 7 are at bottom founded on the same ideas. Jesus says the kingdom of 8 heaven is within you. Again he says, "Our father who art in 9 Heaven." How do you reconcile the two sayings? In this way: He 10 was talking to the uneducated masses when he said the latter, the 11 masses who were uneducated in religion. It was necessary to speak 12 to them in their own language. The masses want concrete ideas, 13 something the senses can grasp. A man may be the greatest 14 philosopher in the world, but a child in religion. When a man has 15 developed a high state of spirituality he can understand that the 16 kingdom of heaven is within him. That is the real kingdom of the 17 mind. Thus we see that the apparent contradictions and perplexities 18 in every religion mark but different stages of growth. And as such 19 we have no right to blame anyone for his religion. There are stages 20 of growth in which forms and symbols are necessary; they are the 21 language that the souls in that stage can understand.

22 The next idea that I want to bring to you is that religion does 23 not consist in doctrines or dogmas. It is not what you read, nor 24 what dogmas you believe that is of importance, but what you 25 realise. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," yea, 26 in this life. And that is salvation. There are those who teach that 27 this can be gained by the mumbling of words. But no great Master 28 ever taught that external forms were necessary for salvation. The 29 power of attaining it is within ourselves. We live and move in God.
30 Creeds and sects have their parts to play, but they are for children, 31 they last but temporarily. Books never make religions, but religions 32 make books. We must not forget that. No book ever created God, 33 but God inspired all the great books. And no book ever created a 34 soul. We must never forget that. The end of all religions is the 35 realising of God in the soul. That is the one universal religion. If 36 there is one universal truth in all religions, I place it here--in 37 realising God. Ideals and methods may differ, but that is the central 38 point. There may be a thousand different radii, but they all 39 converge to the one centre, and that is the realisation of God:
40 something behind this world of sense, this world of eternal eating 41 and drinking and talking nonsense, this world of false shadows and 42 selfishness. There is that beyond all books, beyond all creeds, 43 beyond the vanities of this world, and it is the realisation of God 44 within yourself. A man may believe in all the churches in the world, 45 he may carry in his head all the sacred books ever written, he may 46 baptise himself in all the rivers of the earth, still, if he has no 47 perception of God, I would class him with the rankest atheist. And a 48 man may have never entered a church or a mosque, nor performed 49 any ceremony, but if he feels God within himself and is thereby 50 lifted above the vanities of the world, that man is a holy man, a 51 saint, call him what you will. As soon as a man stands up and says 52 he is right or his church is right, and all others are wrong, he is

1 himself all wrong. He does not know that upon the proof of all the 2 others depends the proof of his own. Love and charity for the whole 3 human race, that is the test of true religiousness. I do not mean the 4 sentimental statement that all men are brothers, but that one must 5 feel the oneness of human life. So far as they are not exclusive, I 6 see that the sects and creeds are all mine; they are all grand. They 7 are all helping men towards the real religion. I will add, it is good to 8 be born in a church, but it is bad to die there. It is good to be born a 9 child, but bad to remain a child. Churches, ceremonies, and 10 symbols are good for children, but when the child is grown, he must 11 burst the church or himself. We must not remain children for ever.
12 It is like trying to fit one coat to all sizes and growths. I do not 13 deprecate the existence of sects in the world. Would to God there 14 were twenty millions more, for the more there are, there will be a 15 greater field for selection. What I do object to is trying to fit one 16 religion to every case. Though all religions are essentially the same, 17 they must have the varieties of form produced by dissimilar
18 circumstances among different nations. We must each have our own 19 individual religion, individual so far as the externals of it go.

20 Many years ago, I visited a great sage of our own country, a 21 very holy man. We talked of our revealed book, the Vedas, of your 22 Bible, of the Koran, and of revealed books in general. At the close of 23 our talk, this good man asked me to go to the table and take up a 24 book; it was a book which, among other things, contained a forecast 25 of the rainfall during the year. The sage said, "Read that." And I 26 read out the quantity of rain that was to fall. He said, "Now take the 27 book and squeeze it." I did so and he said, "Why, my boy, not a drop 28 of water comes out. Until the water comes out, it is all book, book.
29 So until your religion makes you realise God, it is useless. He who 30 only studies books for religion reminds one of the fable of the ass 31 which carried a heavy load of sugar on its back, but did not know 32 the sweetness of it."

33 Shall we advise men to kneel down and cry, "O miserable 34 sinners that we are!" No, rather let us remind them of their divine 35 nature. I will tell you a story. A lioness in search of prey came upon 36 a flock of sheep, and as she jumped at one of them, she gave birth 37 to a cub and died on the spot. The young lion was brought up in the 38 flock, ate grass, and bleated like a sheep, and it never knew that it 39 was a lion. One day a lion came across the flock and was astonished 40 to see in it a huge lion eating grass and bleating like a sheep. At his 41 sight the flock fled and the lion-sheep with them. But the lion 42 watched his opportunity and one day found the lion-sheep asleep.
43 He woke him up and said, "You are a lion." The other said, "No," 44 and began to bleat like a sheep. But the stranger lion took him to a 45 lake and asked him to look in the water at his own image and see if 46 it did not resemble him, the stranger lion. He looked and 47 acknowledged that it did. Then the stranger lion began to roar and 48 asked him to do the same. The lion-sheep tried his voice and was 49 soon roaring as grandly as the other. And he was a sheep no longer.

50 My friends, I would like to tell you all that you are mighty as 51 lions.

52 If the room is dark, do you go about beating your chest and

1 crying, "It is dark, dark, dark!" No, the only way to get the light is to 2 strike a light, and then the darkness goes. The only way to realise 3 the light above you is to strike the spiritual light within you, and the 4 darkness of sin and impurity will flee away. Think of your higher 5 self, not of your lower.

6 Some questions and answers here followed.

7 Q. A man in the audience said, "If ministers stop preaching 8 hell-fire, they will have no control over their people."

9 A. They had better lose it then. The man who is frightened 10 into religion has no religion at all. Better teach him of his divine 11 nature than of his animal.

12 Q. What did the Lord mean when he said, "The kingdom of 13 heaven is not of this world?"

14 A. That the kingdom of heaven is within us. The Jewish idea 15 was a kingdom of heaven upon this earth. That was not the idea of 16 Jesus.

17 Q. Do you believe we come up from the animals?

18 A. I believe that, by the law of evolution, the higher beings 19 have come up from the lower kingdoms.

20 Q. Do you know of anyone who remembers his previous life?

21 A. I have met some who told me they did remember their 22 previous life. They had reached a point where they could remember 23 their former incarnations.

24 Q. Do you believe in Christ's crucifixion?

25 A. Christ was God incarnate; they could not kill him. That 26 which was crucified was only a semblance, a mirage.

27 Q. If he could have produced such a semblance as that, would 28 not that have been the greatest miracle of all?

29 A. I look upon miracles as the greatest stumbling-blocks in 30 the way of truth. When the disciples of Buddha told him of a man 31 who had performed a so-called miracle--had taken a bowl from a 32 great height without touching it--and showed him the bowl, he took 33 it and crushed it under his feet and told them never to build their 34 faith on miracles, but to look for truth in everlasting principles. He 35 taught them the true inner light--the light of the spirit, which is the 36 only safe light to go by. Miracles are only stumbling-blocks. Let us 37 brush them aside.

38 Q. Do you believe Jesus preached the Sermon on the Mount?

39 A. I do believe he did. But in this matter I have to go by the 40 books as others do, and I am aware that mere book testimony is 41 rather shaky ground. But we are all safe in taking the teachings of 42 the Sermon on the Mount as a guide. We have to take what appeals 43 to our inner spirit. Buddha taught five hundred years before Christ, 44 and his words were full of blessings: never a curse came from his 45 lips, nor from his life; never one from Zoroaster, nor from 46 Confucius.

THE HINDU RELIGION

My religion is to learn. I read my Bible better in the light of your Bible and the dark prophecies of my religion become brighter when compared with those of your prophets. Truth has always been universal. If I alone were to have six fingers on my hand while all of you had only five, you would not think that my hand was the true intent of nature, but rather that it was abnormal and diseased. Just so with religion. If one creed alone were to be true and all the others untrue, you would have a right to say that that religion was diseased; if one religion is true, all the others must be true. Thus the Hindu religion is your property as well as mine. Of the two hundred and ninety millions of people inhabiting India, only two millions are Christians, sixty millions Mohammedans and all the rest are Hindus.

The Hindus found their creed upon the ancient Vedas, a word derived from Vid, "to know". These are a series of books which, to our minds, contain the essence of all religion; but we do not think they alone contain the truths. They teach us the immortality of the soul. In every country and every human breast there is a natural desire to find a stable equilibrium--something that does not change. We cannot find it in nature, for all the universe is nothing but an infinite mass of changes. But to infer from that that nothing unchanging exists is to fall into the error of the Southern school of Buddhists and the Charvakas, which latter believe that all is matter and nothing mind, that all religion is a cheat, and morality and goodness, useless superstitions. The Vedanta philosophy teaches that man is not bound by his five senses. They only know the present, and neither the future nor the past; but as the present signifies both past and future, and all three are only demarcations of time, the present also would be unknown if it were not for something above the senses, something independent of time, which unifies the past and the future in the present.

But what is independent? Not our body, for it depends upon outward conditions; nor our mind, because the thoughts of which it is composed are caused. It is our soul. The Vedas say the whole world is a mixture of independence and dependence, of freedom and slavery, but through it all shines the soul independent, immortal, pure, perfect, holy. For if it is independent, it cannot perish, as death is but a change, and depends upon conditions; if independent, it must be perfect, for imperfection is again but a condition, and therefore dependent. And this immortal and perfect soul must be the same in the highest God as well as in the humblest man, the difference between them being only in the degree in which this soul manifests itself.

But why should the soul take to itself a body? For the same reason that I take a looking-glass--to see myself. Thus, in the body, the soul is reflected. The soul is God, and every human being has a perfect divinity within himself, and each one must show his divinity sooner or later. If I am in a dark room, no amount of protestation will make it any brighter--I must light a match. Just so, no amount of grumbling and wailing will make our imperfect body more perfect.

1 But the Vedanta teaches--call forth your soul, show your divinity.
2 Teach your children that they are divine, that religion is a positive 3 something and not a negative nonsense; that it is not subjection to 4 groans when under oppression, but expansion and manifestation.

5 Every religion has it that man's present and future are 6 modified by the past, and that the present is but the effect of the 7 past. How is it, then, that every child is born with an experience 8 that cannot be accounted for by hereditary transmission? How is it 9 that one is born of good parents, receives a good education and 10 becomes a good man, while another comes from besotted parents 11 and ends on the gallows? How do you explain this inequality 12 without implicating God? Why should a merciful Father set His 13 child in such conditions which must bring forth misery? It is no 14 explanation to say God will make amends later on--God has no 15 blood-money. Then, too, what becomes of my liberty, if this be my 16 first birth? Coming into this world without the experience of a 17 former life, my independence would be gone, for my path would be 18 marked out by the experience of others. If I cannot be the maker of 19 my own fortune, then I am not free. I take upon myself the blame 20 for the misery of this existence, and say I will unmake the evil I 21 have done in another existence. This, then, is our philosophy of the 22 migration of the soul. We come into this life with the experience of 23 another, and the fortune or misfortune of this existence is the result 24 of our acts in a former existence, always becoming better, till at last 25 perfection is reached.

26 We believe in a God, the Father of the universe, infinite and 27 omnipotent. But if our soul at last becomes perfect, it also must 28 become infinite. But there is no room for two infinite unconditional 29 beings, and hence we believe in a Personal God, and we ourselves 30 are He. These are the three stages which every religion has taken.
31 First we see God in the far beyond, then we come nearer to Him 32 and give Him omnipresence so that we live in Him; and at last we 33 recognise that we are He. The idea of an objective God is not 34 untrue--in fact, every idea of God, and hence every religion, is true, 35 as each is but a different stage in the journey, the aim of which is 36 the perfect conception of the Vedas. Hence, too, we not only 37 tolerate, but we Hindus accept every religion, praying in the 38 mosque of the Mohammedans, worshipping before the fire of the 39 Zoroastrians, and kneeling before the cross of the Christians, 40 knowing that all the religions, from the lowest fetishism to the 41 highest absolutism, mean so many attempts of the human soul to 42 grasp and realise the infinite, each determined by the conditions of 43 its birth and association, and each of them marking a stage of 44 progress. We gather all these flowers and bind them with the twine 45 of love, making a wonderful bouquet of worship.

46 If I am God, then my soul is a temple of the Highest, and my 47 every motion should be a worship--love for love's sake, duty for 48 duty's sake, without hope of reward or fear of punishment. Thus my 49 religion means expansion, and expansion means realisation and 50 perception in the highest sense--no mumbling words or 51 genuflections. Man is to become divine, realising the divine more 52 and more from day to day in an endless progress.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

A huge locomotive has rushed on over the line and a small worm that was creeping upon one of the rails saved its life by crawling out of the path of the locomotive. Yet this little worm, so insignificant that it can be crushed in a moment, is a living something, while this locomotive, so huge, so immense, is only an engine, a machine. You say the one has life and the other is only dead matter and all its powers and strength and speed are only those of a dead machine, a mechanical contrivance. Yet the poor little worm which moved upon the rail and which the least touch of the engine would have deprived of its life is a majestic being compared to that huge locomotive. It is a small part of the Infinite and, therefore, it is greater than this powerful engine. Why should that be so? How do we know the living from the dead? The machine mechanically performs all the movements its maker made it to perform, its movements are not those of life. How can we make the distinction between the living and the dead, then? In the living there is freedom, there is intelligence; in the dead all is bound and no freedom is possible, because there is no intelligence. This freedom that distinguishes us from mere machines is what we are all striving for. To be more free is the goal of all our efforts, for only in perfect freedom can there be perfection. This effort to attain freedom underlies all forms of worship, whether we know it or not.

If we were to examine the various sorts of worship all over the world, we would see that the rudest of mankind are worshipping ghosts, demons, and the spirits of their forefathers--serpent worship, worship of tribal gods, and worship of the departed ones. Why do they do this? Because they feel that in some unknown way these beings are greater, more powerful than themselves, and limit their freedom. They, therefore, seek to propitiate these beings in order to prevent them from molesting them, in other words, to get more freedom. They also seek to win favour from these superior beings, to get by gift of the gods what ought to be earned by personal effort.

On the whole, this shows that the world is expecting a miracle. This expectation never leaves us, and however we may try, we are all running after the miraculous and extraordinary. What is mind but that ceaseless inquiry into the meaning and mystery of life? We may say that only uncultivated people are going after all these things, but the question still is there: Why should it be so? The Jews were asking for a miracle. The whole world has been asking for the same these thousands of years. There is, again, the universal dissatisfaction. We make an ideal but we have rushed only half the way after it, when we make a newer one. We struggle hard to attain to some goal and then discover we do not want it. This dissatisfaction we are having time after time, and what is there in the mind if there is to be only dissatisfaction? What is the meaning of this universal dissatisfaction? It is because freedom is every man's goal. He seeks it ever, his whole life is a struggle after it. The child rebels against law as soon as it is born. Its first utterance is a cry, a protest against the bondage in which it finds itself. This longing for freedom produces the idea of a Being who is absolutely

1 free. The concept of God is a fundamental element in the human 2 constitution. In the Vedanta, Sat-chit-ananda (Existence-Knowledge-3 Bliss) is the highest concept of God possible to the mind. It is the 4 essence of knowledge and is by its nature the essence of bliss. We 5 have been stifling that inner voice long enough, seeking to follow 6 law and quiet the human nature, but there is that human instinct to 7 rebel against nature's laws. We may not understand what the 8 meaning is, but there is that unconscious struggle of the human 9 with the spiritual, of the lower with the higher mind, and the 10 struggle attempts to preserve one's separate life, what we call our 11 "individuality".

12 Even hells stand out with this miraculous fact that we are 13 born rebels; and the first fact of life--the intruding of life itself-- 14 against this we rebel and cry out, "No law for us." As long as we 15 obey the laws we are like machines, and on goes the universe, and 16 we cannot break it. Laws as laws become man's nature. The first 17 inkling of life on its higher level is in seeing this struggle within us 18 to break the bond of nature and to be free. "Freedom, O Freedom!
19 Freedom, O Freedom!" is the song of the soul. Bondage, alas, to be 20 bound in nature, seems its fate.

21 Why should there be serpent, or ghost, or demon worship and 22 all these various creeds and forms for having miracles? Why do we 23 say that there is life, there is being in anything? There must be a 24 meaning in all this search, this endeavour to understand life, to 25 explain being. It is not meaningless and vain. It is man's ceaseless 26 endeavour to become free. The knowledge which we now call 27 science has been struggling for thousands of years in its attempt to 28 gain freedom, and people ask for freedom. Yet there is no freedom 29 in nature. It is all law. Still the struggle goes on. Nay, the whole of 30 nature from the very sun to the atoms is under law, and even for 31 man there is no freedom. But we cannot believe it. We have been 32 studying laws from the beginning and yet cannot--nay, will not-- 33 believe that man is under law. The soul cries ever, "Freedom, O 34 Freedom!" With the conception of God as a perfectly free Being, 35 man cannot rest eternally in this bondage. Higher he must go, and 36 unless the struggle were for himself, he would think it too severe.
37 Man says to himself, "I am a born slave, I am bound; nevertheless, 38 there is a Being who is not bound by nature. He is free and Master 39 of nature."

40 The conception of God, therefore, is as essential and as 41 fundamental a part of mind as is the idea of bondage.

42 Both are the outcome of the idea of freedom. There cannot be 43 life, even in the plant, without the idea of freedom. In the plant or in 44 the worm, life has to rise to the individual concept. It is there, 45 unconsciously working, the plant living its life to preserve the 46 variety, principle, or form, not nature. The idea of nature controlling 47 every step onward overrules the idea of freedom. Onward goes the 48 idea of the material world, onward moves the idea of freedom. Still 49 the fight goes on. We are hearing about all the quarrels of creeds 50 and sects, yet creeds and sects are just and proper, they must be 51 there. The chain is lengthening and naturally the struggle 52 increases, but there need be no quarrels if we only knew that we

1 are all striving to reach the same goal.

2 The embodiment of freedom, the Master of nature, is what we 3 call God. You cannot deny Him. No, because you cannot move or 4 live without the idea of freedom. Would you come here if you did 5 not believe you were free? It is quite possible that the biologist can 6 and will give some explanation of this perpetual effort to be free.
7 Take all that for granted, still the idea of freedom is there. It is a 8 fact, as much so as the other fact that you cannot apparently get 9 over, the fact of being under nature.

10 Bondage and liberty, light and shadow, good and evil must be 11 there, but the very fact of the bondage shows also this freedom 12 hidden there. If one is a fact, the other is equally a fact. There must 13 be this idea of freedom. While now we cannot see that this idea of 14 bondage, in uncultivated man, is his struggle for freedom, yet the 15 idea of freedom is there. The bondage of sin and impurity in the 16 uncultivated savage is to his consciousness very small, for his 17 nature is only a little higher than the animal's. What he struggles 18 against is the bondage of physical nature, the lack of physical 19 gratification, but out of this lower consciousness grows and 20 broadens the higher conception of a mental or moral bondage and a 21 longing for spiritual freedom. Here we see the divine dimly shining 22 through the veil of ignorance. The veil is very dense at first and the 23 light may be almost obscured, but it is there, ever pure and 24 undimmed--the radiant fire of freedom and perfection. Man 25 personifies this as the Ruler of the Universe, the One Free Being.
26 He does not yet know that the universe is all one, that the 27 difference is only in degree, in the concept.

28 The whole of nature is worship of God. Wherever there is life, 29 there is this search for freedom and that freedom is the same as 30 God. Necessarily this freedom gives us mastery over all nature and 31 is impossible without knowledge. The more we are knowing, the 32 more we are becoming masters of nature. Mastery alone is making 33 us strong and if there be some being entirely free and master of 34 nature, that being must have a perfect knowledge of nature, must 35 be omnipresent and omniscient. Freedom must go hand in hand 36 with these, and that being alone who has acquired these will be 37 beyond nature.

38 Blessedness, eternal peace, arising from perfect freedom, is 39 the highest concept of religion underlying all the ideas of God in 40 Vedanta--absolutely free Existence, not bound by anything, no 41 change, no nature, nothing that can produce a change in Him. This 42 same freedom is in you and in me and is the only real freedom.

43 God is still, established upon His own majestic changeless 44 Self. You and I try to be one with Him, but plant ourselves upon 45 nature, upon the trifles of daily life, on money, on fame, on human 46 love, and all these changing forms in nature which make for 47 bondage. When nature shines, upon what depends the shining?
48 Upon God and not upon the sun, nor the moon, nor the stars.
49 Wherever anything shines, whether it is the light in the sun or in 50 our own consciousness, it is He. He shining, all shines after Him.

51 Now we have seen that this God is self-evident, impersonal,

1 omniscient, the Knower and Master of nature, the Lord of all. He is 2 behind all worship and it is being done according to Him, whether 3 we know it or not. I go one step further. That at which all marvel, 4 that which we call evil, is His worship too. This is a part of freedom.
5 Nay, I will be terrible even and tell you that, when you are doing 6 evil, the impulse behind is also that freedom. It may have been 7 misguided and misled, but it was there; and there cannot be any life 8 or any impulse unless that freedom be behind it. Freedom breathes 9 in the throb of the universe. Unless there is unity at the universal 10 heart, we cannot understand variety. Such is the conception of the 11 Lord in the Upanishads. Sometimes it rises even higher, presenting 12 to us an ideal before which at first we stand aghast--that we are in 13 essence one with God. He who is the colouring in the wings of the 14 butterfly, and the blossoming of the rose-bud, is the power that is in 15 the plant and in the butterfly. He who gives us life is the power 16 within us. Out of His fire comes life, and the direst death is also His 17 power. He whose shadow is death, His shadow is immortality also.
18 Take a still higher conception. See how we are flying like hunted 19 hares from all that is terrible, and like them, hiding our heads and 20 thinking we are safe. See how the whole world is flying from 21 everything terrible. Once when I was in Varanasi, I was passing 22 through a place where there was a large tank of water on one side 23 and a high wall on the other. It was in the grounds where there 24 were many monkeys. The monkeys of Varanasi are huge brutes and 25 are sometimes surly. They now took it into their heads not to allow 26 me to pass through their street, so they howled and shrieked and 27 clutched at my feet as I passed. As they pressed closer, I began to 28 run, but the faster I ran, the faster came the monkeys and they 29 began to bite at me. It seemed impossible to escape, but just then I 30 met a stranger who called out to me, "Face the brutes." I turned 31 and faced the monkeys, and they fell back and finally fled. That is a 32 lesson for all life--face the terrible, face it boldly. Like the monkeys, 33 the hardships of life fall back when we cease to flee before them. If 34 we are ever to gain freedom, it must be by conquering nature, 35 never by running away. Cowards never win victories. We have to 36 fight fear and troubles and ignorance if we expect them to flee 37 before us.

38 What is death? What are terrors? Do you not see the Lord's 39 face in them? Fly from evil and terror and misery, and they will 40 follow you. Face them, and they will flee. The whole world worships 41 ease and pleasure, and very few dare to worship that which is 42 painful. To rise above both is the idea of freedom. Unless man 43 passes through this gate he cannot be free. We all have to face 44 these. We strive to worship the Lord, but the body rises between, 45 nature rises between Him and us and blinds our vision. We must 46 learn how to worship and love Him in the thunderbolt, in shame, in 47 sorrow, in sin. All the world has ever been preaching the God of 48 virtue. I preach a God of virtue and a God of sin in one. Take Him if 49 you dare--that is the one way to salvation; then alone will come to 50 us the Truth Ultimate which comes from the idea of oneness. Then 51 will be lost the idea that one is greater than another. The nearer we 52 approach the law of freedom, the more we shall come under the 53 Lord, and troubles will vanish. Then we shall not differentiate the 1 door of hell from the gate of heaven, nor differentiate between men 2 and say, "I am greater than any being in the universe." Until we see 3 nothing in the world but the Lord Himself, all these evils will beset 4 us and we shall make all these distinctions; because it is only in the 5 Lord, in the Spirit, that we are all one; and until we see God 6 everywhere, this unity will not exist for us.

7 Two birds of beautiful plumage, inseparable companions, sat
8 upon the same tree, one on the top and one below. The beautiful 9 bird below was eating the fruits of the tree, sweet and bitter, one 10 moment a sweet one and another a bitter. The moment he ate a 11 bitter fruit, he was sorry, but after a while he ate another and when 12 it too was bitter, he looked up and saw the other bird who ate 13 neither the sweet nor the bitter, but was calm and majestic, 14 immersed in his own glory. And then the poor lower bird forgot and 15 went on eating the sweet and bitter fruits again, until at last he ate 16 one that was extremely bitter; and then he stopped again and once 17 more looked up at the glorious bird above. Then he came nearer 18 and nearer to the other bird; and when he had come near enough, 19 rays of light shone upon him and enveloped him, and he saw he was 20 transformed into the higher bird. He became calm, majestic, free, 21 and found that there had been but one bird all the time on the tree.
22 The lower bird was but the reflection of the one above. So we are in 23 reality one with the Lord, but the reflection makes us seem many, 24 as when the one sun reflects in a million dew-drops and seems a 25 million tiny suns. The reflection must vanish if we are to identify 26 ourselves with our real nature which is divine. The universe itself 27 can never be the limit of our satisfaction. That is why the miser 28 gathers more and more money, that is why the robber robs, the 29 sinner sins, that is why you are learning philosophy. All have one 30 purpose. There is no other purpose in life, save to reach this 31 freedom. Consciously or unconsciously, we are all striving for 32 perfection. Every being must attain to it.

33 The man who is groping through sin, through misery, the man 34 who is choosing the path through hells, will reach it, but it will take 35 time. We cannot save him. Some hard knocks on his head will help 36 him to turn to the Lord. The path of virtue, purity, unselfishness, 37 spirituality, becomes known at last and what all are doing 38 unconsciously, we are trying to do consciously. The idea is 39 expressed by St. Paul, "The God that ye ignorantly worship, Him 40 declare I unto you." This is the lesson for the whole world to learn.
41 What have these philosophies and theories of nature to do, if not to 42 help us to attain to this one goal in life? Let us come to that 43 consciousness of the identity of everything and let man see himself 44 in everything. Let us be no more the worshippers of creeds or sects 45 with small limited notions of God, but see Him in everything in the 46 universe. If you are knowers of God, you will everywhere find the 47 same worship as in your own heart.

48 Get rid, in the first place, of all these limited ideas and see 49 God in every person--working through all hands, walking through 50 all feet, and eating through every mouth. In every being He lives, 51 through all minds He thinks. He is self-evident, nearer unto us than 52 ourselves. To know this is religion, is faith, and may it please the 1 Lord to give us this faith! When we shall feel that oneness, we shall 2 be immortal. We are physically immortal even, one with the 3 universe. So long as there is one that breathes throughout the 4 universe, I live in that one. I am not this limited little being, I am

5 the universal. I am the life of all the sons of the past. I am the soul
6 of Buddha, of Jesus, of Mohammed. I am the soul of the teachers, 7 and I am all the robbers that robbed, and all the murderers that 8 were hanged, I am the universal. Stand up then; this is the highest 9 worship. You are one with the universe. That only is humility--not 10 crawling upon all fours and calling yourself a sinner. That is the 11 highest evolution when this veil of differentiation is torn off. The 12 highest creed is Oneness. I am so-and-so is a limited idea, not true 13 of the real "I". I am the universal; stand upon that and ever worship 14 the highest through the highest form, for God is Spirit and should 15 be worshipped in spirit and in truth. Through lower forms of 16 worship, man's material thoughts rise to spiritual worship and the 17 Universal Infinite One is at last worshipped in and through the 18 spirit. That which is limited is material. The Spirit alone is infinite.
19 God is Spirit, is infinite; man is Spirit and, therefore, infinite, and 20 the Infinite alone can worship the Infinite. We will worship the 21 Infinite; that is the highest spiritual worship.

22 The grandeur of realising these ideas, how difficult it is! I 23 theorise, talk, philosophise; and the next moment something comes 24 against me, and I unconsciously become angry, I forget there is 25 anything in the universe but this little limited self, I forget to say, "I 26 am the Spirit, what is this trifle to me? I am the Spirit." I forget it is 27 all myself playing, I forget God, I forget freedom.

28 Sharp as the blade of a razor, long and difficult and hard to 29 cross, is the way to freedom. The sages have declared this again 30 and again. Yet do not let these weaknesses and failures bind you.
31 The Upanishads have declared, "Arise! Awake! and stop not until 32 the goal is reached." We will then certainly cross the path, sharp as 33 it is like the razor, and long and distant and difficult though it be.
34 Man becomes the master of gods and demons. No one is to blame 35 for our miseries but ourselves. Do you think there is only a dark cup 36 of poison if man goes to look for nectar? The nectar is there and is 37 for every man who strives to reach it. The Lord Himself tells us, 38 "Give up all these paths and struggles. Do thou take refuge in Me. I 39 will take thee to the other shore, be not afraid." We hear that from 40 all the scriptures of the world that come to us. The same voice
41 teaches us to say, "Thy will be done upon earth, as it is in heaven," 42 for "Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory." It is 43 difficult, all very difficult. I say to myself, "This moment I will take 44 refuge in Thee, O Lord. Unto Thy love I will sacrifice all, and on 45 Thine altar I will place all that is good and virtuous. My sins, my 46 sorrows, my actions, good and evil, I will offer unto Thee; do Thou 47 take them and I will never forget." One moment I say, "Thy will be 48 done," and the next moment something comes to try me and I 49 spring up in a rage. The goal of all religions is the same, but the 50 language of the teachers differs. The attempt is to kill the false "I", 51 so that the real "I", the Lord, will reign. "I the Lord thy God am a 52 jealous God. Thou shalt have no other gods before me," say the 1 Hebrew scriptures. God must be there all alone. We must say, "Not 2 I, but Thou," and then we should give up everything but the Lord.

3 He, and He alone, should reign. Perhaps we struggle hard, and yet 4 the next moment our feet slip, and then we try to stretch out our 5 hands to Mother. We find we cannot stand alone. Life is infinite, one 6 chapter of which is, "Thy will be done," and unless we realise all the 7 chapters we cannot realise the whole. "Thy will be done"--every 8 moment the traitor mind rebels against it, yet it must be said, again 9 and again, if we are to conquer the lower self. We cannot serve a 10 traitor and yet be saved. There is salvation for all except the traitor 11 and we stand condemned as traitors, traitors against our own 12 selves, against the majesty of Mother, when we refuse to obey the 13 voice of our higher Self. Come what will, we must give our bodies 14 and minds up to the Supreme Will. Well has it been said by the 15 Hindu philosopher, "If man says twice, 'Thy will be done,' he 16 commits sin." "Thy will be done," what more is needed, why say it 17 twice? What is good is good. No more shall we take it back. "Thy 18 will be done on earth as it is in heaven, for Thine is the kingdom 19 and the power and the glory for evermore."

VEDIC RELIGIOUS IDEALS

What concerns us most is the religious thought--on soul and God and all that appertains to religion. We will take the Samhitas. These are collections of hymns forming, as it were, the oldest Aryan literature, properly speaking, the oldest literature in the world. There may have been some scraps of literature of older date here and there, older than that even, but not books, or literature properly so called. As a collected book, this is the oldest the world has, and herein is portrayed the earliest feeling of the Aryans, their aspirations, the questions that arose about their manners and methods, and so on. At the very outset we find a very curious idea. These hymns are sung in praise of different gods, Devas as they are called, the bright ones. There is quite a number of them. One is called Indra, another Varuna, another Mitra, Parjanya, and so on. Various mythological and allegorical figures come before us one after the other--for instance, Indra the thunderer, striking the serpent who has withheld the rains from mankind. Then he lets fly his thunderbolt, the serpent is killed, and rain comes down in showers. The people are pleased, and they worship Indra with oblations. They make a sacrificial pyre, kill some animals, roast their flesh upon spits, and offer that meat to Indra. And they had a popular plant called Soma. What plant it was nobody knows now; it has entirely disappeared, but from the books we gather that, when crushed, it produced a sort of milky juice, and that was fermented; and it can also be gathered that this fermented Soma juice was intoxicating. This also they offered to Indra and the other gods, and they also drank it themselves. Sometimes they drank a little too much, and so did the gods. Indra on occasions got drunk. There are passages to show that Indra at one time drank so much of this Soma juice that he talked irrelevant words. So with Varuna. He is another god, very powerful, and is in the same way protecting his votaries, and they are praising him with libations of Soma. So is the god of war, and so on. But the popular idea that strikes one as making the mythologies of the Samhitas entirely different from the other mythologies is, that along with every one of these gods is the idea of an infinity. This infinite is abstracted, and sometimes described as Aditya. At other times it is affixed, as it were, to all the other gods. Take, for example, Indra. In some of the books you will find that Indra has a body, is very strong, sometimes is wearing golden armour, and comes down, lives and eats with his votaries, fights the demons, fights the snakes, and so on. Again, in one hymn we find that Indra has been given a very high position; he is omnipresent and omnipotent, and Indra sees the heart of every being. So with Varuna. This Varuna is god of the air and is in charge of the water, just as Indra was previously; and then, all of a sudden, we find him raised up and said to be omnipresent, omnipotent, and so on. I will read one passage about this Varuna in his highest form, and you will understand what I mean. It has been translated into English poetry, so it is better that I read it in that form.

The mighty Lord on high our deeds, as if at hand, espies;

The gods know all men do, though men would fain their acts disguise;

1 Whoever stands, whoever moves, or steals from place to 2 place,

3 Or hides him in his secret cell--the gods his movements trace.

4 Wherever two together plot, and deem they are alone,

5 King Varuna is there, a third, and all their schemes are 6 known.

7 This earth is his, to him belong those vast and boundless 8 skies;

9 Both seas within him rest, and yet in that small pool he lies,

10 Whoever far beyond the sky should think his way to wing.

11 He could not there elude the grasp of Varuna the King.

12 His spies, descending from the skies, glide all this world 13 around;

14 Their thousand eyes all-scanning sweep to earth's remotest 15 bound.

16 So we can multiply examples about the other gods; they all 17 come, one after the other, to share the same fate--they first begin as 18 gods, and then they are raised to this conception as the Being in 19 whom the whole universe exists, who sees every heart, who is the 20 ruler of the universe. And in the case of Varuna, there is another 21 idea, just the germ of one idea which came, but was immediately 22 suppressed by the Aryan mind, and that was the idea of fear. In 23 another place we read they are afraid they have sinned and ask 24 Varuna for pardon. These ideas were never allowed, for reasons you 25 will come to understand later on, to grow on Indian soil, but the 26 germs were there sprouting, the idea of fear, and the idea of sin.
27 This is the idea, as you all know, of what is called monotheism. This 28 monotheism, we see, came to India at a very early period.
29 Throughout the Samhitas, in the first and oldest part, this 30 monotheistic idea prevails, but we shall find that it did not prove 31 sufficient for the Aryans; they threw it aside, as it were, as a very 32 primitive sort of idea and went further on, as we Hindus think. Of 33 course in reading books and criticisms on the Vedas written by 34 Europeans, the Hindu cannot help smiling when he reads, that the 35 writings of our authors are saturated with this previous education 36 alone. Persons who have sucked in as their mother's milk the idea 37 that the highest ideal of God is the idea of a Personal God, naturally 38 dare not think on the lines of these ancient thinkers of India, when 39 they find that just after the Samhitas, the monotheistic idea with 40 which the Samhita portion is replete was thought by the Aryans to 41 be useless and not worthy of philosophers and thinkers, and that 42 they struggled hard for a more philosophical and transcendental 43 idea. The monotheistic idea was much too human for them, 44 although they gave it such descriptions as "The whole universe 45 rests in Him" and "Thou art the keeper of all hearts." The Hindus 46 were bold, to their great credit be it said, bold thinkers in all their 47 ideas, so bold that one spark of their thought frightens the so-called 48 bold thinkers of the West. Well has it been said by Prof. Max Muller 49 about these thinkers that they climbed up to the heights where

1 their lungs only could breathe, and where those of other beings
2 would have burst. These brave people followed reason wherever it 3 led them, no matter at what cost, never caring if all their best 4 superstitions were smashed to pieces, never caring what society
5 would think about them, or talk about them; but what they thought 6 was right and true, they preached and they talked.

7 Before going into all these speculations of the ancient Vedic 8 sages, we will first refer to one or two very curious instances in the 9 Vedas. The peculiar fact--that these gods are taken up, as it were, 10 one after the other, raised and sublimated, till each has assumed 11 the proportions of the infinite Personal God of the Universe--calls 12 for an explanation. Prof. Max Muller creates for it a new name, as 13 he thinks it peculiar to the Hindus: he calls it "Henotheism". We 14 need not go far for the explanation. It is within the book. A few 15 steps from the very place where we find those gods being raised 16 and sublimated, we find the explanation also. The question arises 17 how the Hindu mythologies should be so unique, so different from 18 all others. In Babylonian or Greek mythologies we find one god 19 struggling upwards, and he assumes a position and remains there, 20 while the other gods die out. Of all the Molochs, Jehovah becomes 21 supreme, and the other Molochs are forgotten, lost for ever; he is 22 the God of gods. So, too, of all the Greek gods, Zeus comes to the 23 front and assumes big proportions, becomes the God of the 24 Universe, and all the other gods become degraded into minor 25 angels. This fact was repeated in later times. The Buddhists and the 26 Jains raised one of their prophets to the Godhead, and all the other 27 gods they made subservient to Buddha, or to Jina. This is the world-28 wide process, but there we find an exception, as it were. One god is 29 praised, and for the time being it is said that all the other gods obey 30 his commands, and the very one who is said to be raised up by 31 Varuna, is himself raised up, in the next book, to the highest 32 position. They occupy the position of the Personal God in turns. But 33 the explanation is there in the book, and it is a grand explanation, 34 one that has given the theme to all subsequent thought in India, 35 and one that will be the theme of the whole world of religions:
36 "Ekam Sat Vipra Bahudha Vadanti--That which exists is One; sages 37 call It by various names." In all these cases where hymns were 38 written about all these gods, the Being perceived was one and the 39 same; it was the perceiver who made the difference. It was the 40 hymnist, the sage, the poet, who sang in different languages and 41 different words, the praise of one and the same Being. "That which 42 exists is One; sages call It by various names." Tremendous results 43 have followed from that one verse. Some of you, perhaps, are 44 surprised to think that India is the only country where there never 45 has been a religious persecution, where never was any man 46 disturbed for his religious faith. Theists or atheists, monists, 47 dualists, monotheists are there and always live unmolested.
48 Materialists were allowed to preach from the steps of Brahminical 49 temples, against the gods, and against God Himself; they went 50 preaching all over the land that the idea of God was a mere 51 superstition, and that gods, and Vedas, and religion were simply 52 superstitions invented by the priests for their own benefit, and they 53 were allowed to do this unmolested. And so, wherever he went,

1 Buddha tried to pull down every old thing sacred to the Hindus to 2 the dust, and Buddha died of ripe old age. So did the Jains, who 3 laughed at the idea of God. "How can it be that there is a God?"
4 they asked; "it must be a mere superstition." So on, endless 5 examples there are. Before the Mohammedan wave came into 6 India, it was never known what religious persecution was; the 7 Hindus had only experienced it as made by foreigners on 8 themselves. And even now it is a patent fact how much Hindus have 9 helped to build Christian churches, and how much readiness there 10 is to help them. There never has been bloodshed. Even heterodox 11 religions that have come out of India have been likewise affected; 12 for instance, Buddhism. Buddhism is a great religion in some 13 respects, but to confuse Buddhism with Vedanta is without 14 meaning; anyone may mark just the difference that exists between 15 Christianity and the Salvation Army. There are great and good 16 points in Buddhism, but these great points fell into hands which 17 were not able to keep them safe. The jewels which came from 18 philosophers fell into the hands of mobs, and the mobs took up their 19 ideas. They had a great deal of enthusiasm, some marvellous ideas, 20 great and humanitarian ideas, but, after all, there is something else 21 that is necessary--thought and intellect--to keep everything safe.
22 Wherever you see the most humanitarian ideas fall into the hands 23 of the multitude, the first result, you may notice, is degradation. It 24 is learning and intellect that keep things sure. Now this Buddhism 25 went as the first missionary religion to the world, penetrated the 26 whole of the civilised world as it existed at that time, and never was 27 a drop of blood shed for that religion. We read how in China the 28 Buddhist missionaries were persecuted, and thousands were 29 massacred by two or three successive emperors, but after that, 30 fortune favoured the Buddhists, and one of the emperors offered to 31 take vengeance of the persecutors, but the missionaries refused. All 32 that we owe to this one verse. That is why I want you to remember 33 it: "Whom they call Indra, Mitra, Varuna--That which exists is One; 34 sages call It by various names."

35 It was written, nobody knows at what date, it may be 8,000
36 years ago, in spite of all modern scholars may say, it may be 9,000 37 years ago. Not one of these religious speculations is of modern 38 date, but they are as fresh today as they were when they were 39 written, or rather, fresher, for at that distant date man was not so 40 civilised as we know him now. He had not learnt to cut his brother's 41 throat because he differed a little in thought from himself; he had 42 not deluged the world in blood, he did not become demon to his 43 own brother. In the name of humanity he did not massacre whole 44 lots of mankind then. Therefore these words come to us today very 45 fresh, as great stimulating, life-giving words, much fresher than 46 they were when they were written: "That which exists is One; sages 47 call It by various names." We have to learn yet that all religions, 48 under whatever name they may be called, either Hindu, Buddhist, 49 Mohammedan, or Christian, have the same God, and he who 50 derides any one of these derides his own God.

51 That was the solution they arrived at. But, as I have said, this 52 ancient monotheistic idea did not satisfy the Hindu mind. It did not

1 go far enough, it did not explain the visible world: a ruler of the 2 world does not explain the world--certainly not. A ruler of the 3 universe does not explain the universe, and much less an external 4 ruler, one outside of it. He may be a moral guide, the greatest 5 power in the universe, but that is no explanation of the universe; 6 and the first question that we find now arising, assuming 7 proportions, is the question about the universe: "Whence did it 8 come?" "How did it come?" "How does it exist?" Various hymns are 9 to be found on this question struggling forward to assume form, 10 and nowhere do we find it so poetically, so wonderfully expressed 11 as in the following hymn:

12 "Then there was neither aught nor naught, nor air, nor sky, 13 nor anything. What covered all? Where rested all? Then death was 14 not, nor deathlessness, nor change to night and day." The 15 translation loses a good deal of the poetical beauty. "Then death 16 was not, nor deathlessness, nor change to night and day"; the very 17 sound of the Sanskrit is musical. "That existed, that breath, 18 covering as it were, that God's existence; but it did not begin to 19 move." It is good to remember this one idea that it existed 20 motionless, because we shall find how this idea sprouts up 21 afterwards in the cosmology, how according to the Hindu 22 metaphysics and philosophy, this whole universe is a mass of 23 vibrations, as it were, motions; and there are periods when this 24 whole mass of motions subsides and becomes finer and finer, 25 remaining in that state for some time. That is the state described in 26 this hymn. It existed unmoved, without vibration, and when this 27 creation began, this began to vibrate and all this creation came out 28 of it, that one breath, calm, self-sustained, naught else beyond it.

29 "Gloom existed first." Those of you who have ever been in 30 India or any tropical country, and have seen the bursting of the 31 monsoon, will understand the majesty of these words. I remember 32 three poets' attempts to picture this. Milton says, "No light, but 33 rather darkness visible." Kalidasa says, "Darkness which can be 34 penetrated with a needle," but none comes near this Vedic 35 description, "Gloom hidden in gloom." Everything is parching and 36 sizzling, the whole creation seems to be burning away, and for days 37 it has been so, when one afternoon there is in one corner of the 38 horizon a speck of cloud, and in less than half an hour it has 39 extended unto the whole earth, until, as it were, it is covered with 40 cloud, cloud over cloud, and then it bursts into a tremendous deluge 41 of rain. The cause of creation was described as will. That which 42 existed at first became changed into will, and this will began to 43 manifest itself as desire. This also we ought to remember, because 44 we find that this idea of desire is said to be the cause of all we have.
45 This idea of will has been the corner-stone of both the Buddhist and 46 the Vedantic system, and later on, has penetrated into German 47 philosophy and forms the basis of Schopenhauer's system of 48 philosophy. It is here we first hear of it.

49 "Now first arose desire, the primal seed of mind.

50 Sages, searching in their hearts by wisdom, found the bond,

51 Between existence and non-existence."

1 It is a very peculiar expression; the poet ends by saying that 2 "perhaps He even does not know." We find in this hymn, apart from 3 its poetical merits, that this questioning about the universe has 4 assumed quite definite proportions, and that the minds of these 5 sages must have advanced to such a state, when all sorts of 6 common answers would not satisfy them. We find that they were 7 not even satisfied with this Governor above. There are various other 8 hymns where the same idea comes in, about how this all came, and 9 just as we have seen, when they were trying to find a Governor of 10 the universe, a Personal God, they were taking up one Deva after 11 another, raising him up to that position, so now we shall find that in 12 various hymns one or other idea is taken up, and expanded 13 infinitely and made responsible for everything in the universe. One 14 particular idea is taken as the support, in which everything rests 15 and exists, and that support has become all this. So on with various 16 ideas. They tried this method with Prana, the life principle. They 17 expanded the idea of the life principle until it became universal and 18 infinite. It is the life principle that is supporting everything; not only 19 the human body, but it is the light of the sun and the moon, it is the 20 power moving everything, the universal motive energy. Some of 21 these attempts are very beautiful, very poetical. Some of them as, 22 "He ushers the beautiful morning," are marvellously lyrical in the 23 way they picture things. Then this very desire, which, as we have 24 just read, arose as the first primal germ of creation, began to be 25 stretched out, until it became the universal God. But none of these 26 ideas satisfied.

27 Here the idea is sublimated and finally abstracted into a 28 personality. "He alone existed in the beginning; He is the one Lord 29 of all that exists; He supports this universe; He who is the author of 30 souls, He who is the author of strength, whom all the gods worship, 31 whose shadow is life, whose shadow is death; whom else shall we 32 worship? Whose glory the snow-tops of the Himalayas declare, 33 whose glory the oceans with all their waters proclaim." So on it 34 goes, but, as I told you just now, this idea did not satisfy them.

35 At last we find a very peculiar position. The Aryan mind had 36 so long been seeking an answer to the question from outside. They 37 questioned everything they could find, the sun, the moon, and stars, 38 and they found all they could in this way. The whole of nature at 39 best could teach them only of a personal Being who is the Ruler of 40 the universe; it could teach nothing further. In short, out of the 41 external world we can only get the idea of an architect, that which 42 is called the Design Theory. It is not a very logical argument, as we 43 all know; there is something childish about it, yet it is the only little 44 bit of anything we can know about God from the external world, 45 that this world required a builder. But this is no explanation of the 46 universe. The materials of this world were before Him, and this God 47 wanted all these materials, and the worst objection is that He must 48 be limited by the materials. The builder could not have made a 49 house without the materials of which it is composed. Therefore he 50 was limited by the materials; he could only do what the materials 51 enabled him to. Therefore the God that the Design Theory gives is 52 at best only an architect, and a limited architect of the universe; He

1 is bound and restricted by the materials; He is not independent at 2 all. That much they had found out already, and many other minds
3 would have rested at that. In other countries the same thing 4 happened; the human mind could not rest there; the thinking, 5 grasping minds wanted to go further, but those that were backward 6 got hold of them and did not allow them to grow. But fortunately 7 these Hindu sages were not the people to be knocked on the head; 8 they wanted to get a solution, and now we find that they were 9 leaving the external for the internal. The first thing that struck them 10 was, that it is not with the eyes and the senses that we perceive 11 that external world, and know anything about religion; the first 12 idea, therefore, was to find the deficiency, and that deficiency was 13 both physical and moral, as we shall see. You do not know, says one 14 of these sages, the cause of this universe; there has arisen a 15 tremendous difference between you and me--why? Because you 16 have been talking sense things and are satisfied with sense-objects 17 and with the mere ceremonials of religion, while I have known the 18 Purusha beyond.

19 Along with this progress of spiritual ideas that I am trying to 20 trace for you, I can only hint to you a little about the other factor in 21 the growth, for that has nothing to do with our subject, therefore I 22 need not enlarge upon it--the growth of rituals. As those spiritual 23 ideas progressed in arithmetical progression, so the ritualistic ideas 24 progressed in geometrical progression. The old superstitions had by 25 this time developed into a tremendous mass of rituals, which grew 26 and grew till it almost killed the Hindu life. And it is still there, it 27 has got hold of and permeated every portion of our life and made us 28 born slaves. Yet, at the same time, we find a fight against this 29 advance of ritual from the very earliest days. The one objection 30 raised there is this, that love for ceremonials, dressing at certain 31 times, eating in a certain way, and shows and mummeries of 32 religion like these are only external religion, because you are 33 satisfied with the senses and do not want to go beyond them. This is 34 a tremendous difficulty with us, with every human being. At best 35 when we want to hear of spiritual things our standard is the senses; 36 or a man hears things about philosophy, and God, and 37 transcendental things, and after hearing about them for days, he 38 asks: After all, how much money will they bring, how much sense-39 enjoyment will they bring? For his enjoyment is only in the senses, 40 quite naturally. But that satisfaction in the senses, says our sage, is 41 one of the causes which have spread the veil between truth and 42 ourselves. Devotion to ceremonials, satisfaction in the senses, and 43 forming various theories, have drawn a veil between ourselves and 44 truth. This is another great landmark, and we shall have to trace 45 this ideal to the end, and see how it developed later on into that 46 wonderful theory of Maya of the Vedanta, how this veil will be the 47 real explanation of the Vedanta, how the truth was there all the 48 time, it was only this veil that had covered it.

49 Thus we find that the minds of these ancient Aryan thinkers
50 had begun a new theme. They found out that in the external world 51 no search would give an answer to their question. They might seek 52 in the external world for ages, but there would be no answer to 1 their questions. So they fell back upon this other method; and 2 according to this, they were taught that these desires of the senses, 3 desires for ceremonials and externalities have caused a veil to come 4 between themselves and the truth, and that this cannot be removed 5 by any ceremonial. They had to fall back on their own minds, and 6 analyse the mind to find the truth in themselves. The outside world 7 failed and they turned back upon the inside world, and then it

8 became the real philosophy of the Vedanta; from here the Vedanta 9 philosophy begins. It is the foundation-stone of Vedanta philosophy.
10 As we go on, we find that all its inquiries are inside. From the very 11 outset they seemed to declare--look not for the truth in any religion; 12 it is here in the human soul, the miracle of all miracles--in the 13 human soul, the emporium of all knowledge, the mine of all 14 existence--seek here. What is not here cannot be there. And they 15 found out step by step that that which is external is but a dull 16 reflection at best of that which is inside. We shall see how they 17 took, as it were, this old idea of God, the Governor of the universe, 18 who is external to the universe, and first put Him inside the 19 universe. He is not a God outside, but He is inside; and they took 20 Him from there into their own hearts. Here He is, in the heart of 21 man, the Soul of our souls, the Reality in us.

22 Several great ideas have to be understood, in order to grasp 23 properly the workings of the Vedanta philosophy. In the first place it 24 is not philosophy in the sense we speak of the philosophy of Kant 25 and Hegel. It is not one book, or the work of one man. Vedanta is 26 the name of a series of books written at different times. Sometimes 27 in one of these productions there will be fifty different things.
28 Neither are they properly arranged; the thoughts, as it were, have 29 been jotted down. Sometimes in the midst of other extraneous 30 things, we find some wonderful idea. But one fact is remarkable, 31 that these ideas in the Upanishads would be always progressing. In 32 that crude old language, the working of the mind of every one of 33 the sages has been, as it were, painted just as it went; how the 34 ideas are at first very crude, and they become finer and finer till 35 they reach the goal of the Vedanta, and this goal assumes a 36 philosophical name. Just at first it was a search after the Devas, the 37 bright ones, and then it was the origin of the universe, and the very 38 same search is getting another name, more philosophical, clearer-- 39 the unity of all things--"Knowing which everything else becomes 40 known."

THE VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY

The Vedanta philosophy, as it is generally called at the present day, really comprises all the various sects that now exist in India. Thus there have been various interpretations, and to my mind they have been progressive, beginning with the dualistic or Dvaita and ending with the non-dualistic or Advaita. The word Vedanta literally means the end of the Vedas--the Vedas being the scriptures of the Hindus. Sometimes in the West by the Vedas are meant only the hymns and rituals of the Vedas. But at the present time these parts have almost gone out of use, and usually by the word Vedas in India, the Vedanta is meant. All our commentators, when they want to quote a passage from the scriptures, as a rule, quote from the Vedanta, which has another technical name with the commentators--the Shrutis. Now, all the books known by the name of the Vedanta were not entirely written after the ritualistic portions of the Vedas. For instance, one of them--the Isha Upanishad--forms the fortieth chapter of the Yajur-veda, that being one of the oldest parts of the Vedas. There are other Upanishads which form portions of the Brahmanas or ritualistic writings; and the rest of the Upanishads are independent, not comprised in any of the Brahmanas or other parts of the Vedas; but there is no reason to suppose that they were entirely independent of other parts, for, as we well know, many of these have been lost entirely and many of the Brahmanas have become extinct. So it is quite possible that the independent Upanishads belonged to some Brahmanas, which in course of time fell into disuse, while the Upanishads remained. These Upanishads are also called Forest Books or Aranyakas.

The Vedanta, then, practically forms the scriptures of the Hindus, and all systems of philosophy that are orthodox have to take it as their foundation. Even the Buddhists and Jains, when it suits their purpose, will quote a passage from the Vedanta as authority. All schools of philosophy in India, although they claim to have been based upon the Vedas, took different names for their systems. The last one, the system of Vyasa, took its stand upon the doctrines of the Vedas more than the previous systems did, and made an attempt to harmonise the preceding philosophies, such as the Sankhya and the Nyaya, with the doctrines of the Vedanta. So it is especially called the Vedanta philosophy; and the Sutras or aphorisms of Vyasa are, in modern India, the basis of the Vedanta philosophy. Again, these Sutras of Vyasa have been variously explained by different commentators. In general there are three sorts of commentators in India now; from their interpretations have arisen three systems of philosophy and sects. One is dualistic, or Dvaita; a second is the qualified non-dualistic, or Vishishtadvaita; and a third is the non-dualistic, or Advaita. Of these the dualistic and the qualified non-dualistic include the largest number of the Indian people. The non-dualists are comparatively few in number. Now I will try to lay before you the ideas that are contained in all these three sects; but before going on, I will make one remark--that these different Vedanta systems have one common psychology, and that is, the psychology of the Sankhya system. The Sankhya psychology is very much like the psychologies of the Nyaya and 1 Vaisheshika systems, differing only in minor particulars.

2 All the Vedantists agree on three points. They believe in God,
3 in the Vedas as revealed, and in cycles. We have already considered 4 the Vedas. The belief about cycles is as follows: All matter 5 throughout the universe is the outcome of one primal matter called 6 Akasha; and all force, whether gravitation, attraction or repulsion, 7 or life, is the outcome of one primal force called Prana. Prana 8 acting on Akasha is creating or projecting the universe. At the 9 beginning of a cycle, Akasha is motionless, unmanifested. Then 10 Prana begins to act, more and more, creating grosser and grosser 11 forms out of Akasha--plants, animals, men, stars, and so on. After an 12 incalculable time this evolution ceases and involution begins, 13 everything being resolved back through finer and finer forms into 14 the original Akasha and Prana, when a new cycle follows. Now 15 there is something beyond Akasha and Prana. Both can be resolved 16 into a third thing called Mahat--the Cosmic Mind. This Cosmic Mind 17 does not create Akasha and Prana, but changes itself into them.

18 We will now take up the beliefs about mind, soul, and God.
19 According to the universally accepted Sankhya psychology, in 20 perception--in the case of vision, for instance--there are, first of all, 21 the instruments of vision, the eyes. Behind the instruments--the 22 eyes--is the organ of vision or Indriya--the optic nerve and its 23 centres--which is not the external instrument, but without which the 24 eyes will not see. More still is needed for perception. The mind or 25 Manas must come and attach itself to the organ. And besides this, 26 the sensation must be carried to the intellect or Buddhi--the 27 determinative, reactive state of the mind. When the reaction comes 28 from Buddhi, along with it flashes the external world and egoism.
29 Here then is the will; but everything is not complete. Just as every 30 picture, being composed of successive impulses of light, must be 31 united on something stationary to form a whole, so all the ideas in 32 the mind must be gathered and projected on something that is 33 stationary--relatively to the body and mind--that is, on what is called 34 the Soul or Purusha or Atman.

35 According to the Sankhya philosophy, the reactive state of the 36 mind called Buddhi or intellect is the outcome, the change, or a 37 certain manifestation of the Mahat or Cosmic Mind. The Mahat 38 becomes changed into vibrating thought; and that becomes in one 39 part changed into the organs, and in the other part into the fine 40 particles of matter. Out of the combination of all these, the whole of 41 this universe is produced. Behind even Mahat, the Sankhya 42 conceives of a certain state which is called Avyakta or 43 unmanifested, where even the manifestation of mind is not present, 44 but only the causes exists. It is also called Prakriti. Beyond this 45 Prakriti, and eternally separate from it, is the Purusha, the soul of 46 the Sankhya which is without attributes and omnipresent. The 47 Purusha is not the doer but the witness. The illustration of the 48 crystal is used to explain the Purusha. The latter is said to be like a 49 crystal without any colour, before which different colours are 50 placed, and then it seems to be coloured by the colours before it, 51 but in reality it is not. The Vedantists reject the Sankhya ideas of 52 the soul and nature. They claim that between them there is a huge

1 gulf to be bridged over. On the one hand the Sankhya system comes 2 to nature, and then at once it has to jump over to the other side and 3 come to the soul, which is entirely separate from nature. How can 4 these different colours, as Sankhya called them, be able to act on 5 that soul which by its nature is colourless? So the Vedantists, from 6 the very first, affirm that this soul and this nature are one. Even the 7 dualistic Vedantists admit that the Atman or God is not only the 8 efficient cause of this universe, but also the material cause. But 9 they only say so in so many words. They do not really mean it, for 10 they try to escape from their conclusions, in this way: They say 11 there are three existences in this universe--God, soul, and nature.
12 Nature and soul are, as it were, the body of God, and in this sense it 13 may be said that God and the whole universe are one. But this 14 nature and all these various souls remain different from each other 15 through all eternity. Only at the beginning of a cycle do they 16 become manifest; and when the cycle ends, they become fine, and 17 remain in a fine state. The Advaita Vedantists--the non-dualists-- 18 reject this theory of the soul, and, having nearly the whole range of 19 the Upanishads in their favour, build their philosophy entirely upon 20 them. All the books contained in the Upanishads have one subject, 21 one task before them--to prove the following theme: "Just as by the 22 knowledge of one lump of clay we have the knowledge of all the 23 clay in the universe, so what is that, knowing which we know 24 everything in the universe?" The idea of the Advaitists is to 25 generalise the whole universe into one--that something which is 26 really the whole of this universe. And they claim that this whole 27 universe is one, that it is one Being manifesting itself in all these 28 various forms. They admit that what the Sankhya calls nature 29 exists, but say that nature is God. It is this Being, the Sat, which has 30 become converted into all this--the universe, man, soul, and 31 everything that exists. Mind and Mahat are but the manifestations 32 of that one Sat. But then the difficulty arises that this would be 33 pantheism. How came that Sat which is unchangeable, as they 34 admit (for that which is absolute is unchangeable), to be changed 35 into that which is changeable, and perishable? The Advaitists here 36 have a theory which they call Vivarta Vada or apparent 37 manifestation. According to the dualists and the Sankhyas, the whole 38 of this universe is the evolution of primal nature. According to some 39 of the Advaitists and some of the dualists, the whole of this universe 40 is evolved from God. And according to the Advaitists proper, the 41 followers of Shankaracharya, the whole universe is the apparent
42 evolution of God. God is the material cause of this universe, but not 43 really, only apparently. The celebrated illustration used is that of the 44 rope and the snake, where the rope appeared to be the snake, but 45 was not really so. The rope did not really change into the snake.
46 Even so this whole universe as it exists is that Being. It is 47 unchanged, and all the changes we see in it are only apparent.
48 These changes are caused by Desha, Kala, and Nimitta (space, 49 time, and causation), or, according to a higher psychological 50 generalisation, by Nama and Rupa (name and form). It is by name 51 and form that one thing is differentiated from another. The name 52 and form alone cause the difference. In reality they are one and the 53 same. Again, it is not, the Vedantists say, that there is something as 1 phenomenon and something as noumenon. The rope is changed into 2 the snake apparently only; and when the delusion ceases, the snake 3 vanishes. When one is in ignorance, he sees the phenomenon and 4 does not see God. When he sees God, this universe vanishes

5 entirely for him. Ignorance or Maya, as it is called, is the cause of 6 all this phenomenon--the Absolute, the Unchangeable, being taken 7 as this manifested universe. This Maya is not absolute zero, nor 8 non-existence. It is defined as neither existence nor non-existence.
9 It is not existence, because that can be said only of the Absolute, 10 the Unchangeable, and in this sense, Maya is non-existence. Again, 11 it cannot be said it is non-existence; for if it were, it could never 12 produce the phenomenon. So it is something which is neither; and 13 in the Vedanta philosophy it is called Anirvachaniya or 14 inexpressible. Maya, then, is the real cause of this universe. Maya 15 gives the name and form to what Brahman or God gives the 16 material; and the latter seems to have been transformed into all 17 this. The Advaitists, then have no place for the individual soul. They 18 say individual souls are created by Maya. In reality they cannot 19 exist. If there were only one existence throughout, how could it be 20 that I am one, and you are one, and so forth? We are all one, and 21 the cause of evil is the perception of duality. As soon as I begin to 22 feel that I am separate from this universe, then first comes fear, and 23 then comes misery. "Where one hears another, one sees another, 24 that is small. Where one does not see another, where one does not 25 hear another, that is the greatest, that is God. In that greatest is 26 perfect happiness. In small things there is no happiness."

27 According to the Advaita philosophy, then, this differentiation 28 of matter, these phenomena, are, as it were, for a time, hiding the 29 real nature of man; but the latter really has not been changed at all.
30 In the lowest worm, as well as in the highest human being, the 31 same divine nature is present. The worm form is the lower form in 32 which the divinity has been more overshadowed by Maya; that is 33 the highest form in which it has been least overshadowed. Behind 34 everything the same divinity is existing, and out of this comes the 35 basis of morality. Do not injure another. Love everyone as your own 36 self, because the whole universe is one. In injuring another, I am 37 injuring myself; in loving another, I am loving myself. From this also 38 springs that principle of Advaita morality which has been summed 39 up in one word--self-abnegation. The Advaitist says, this little 40 personalised self is the cause of all my misery. This individualised 41 self, which makes me different from all other beings brings hatred 42 and jealousy and misery, struggle and all other evils. And when this 43 idea has been got rid of, all struggle will cease, all misery vanish.
44 So this is to be given up. We must always hold ourselves ready, even 45 to give up our lives for the lowest beings. When a man has become 46 ready even to give up his life for a little insect, he has reached the 47 perfection which the Advaitist wants to attain; and at that moment 48 when he has become thus ready, the veil of ignorance falls away 49 from him, and he will feel his own nature. Even in this life, he will 50 feel that he is one with the universe. For a time, as it were, the 51 whole of this phenomenal world will disappear for him, and he will 52 realise what he is. But so long as the Karma of this body remains, 53 he will have to live. This state, when the veil has vanished and yet

1 the body remains for some time, is what the Vedantists call the 2 Jivanmukti, the living freedom. If a man is deluded by a mirage for 3 some time, and one day the mirage disappears--if it comes back 4 again the next day, or at some future time, he will not be deluded.
5 Before the mirage first broke, the man could not distinguish 6 between the reality and the deception. But when it has once 7 broken, as long as he has organs and eyes to work with, he will see 8 the image, but will no more be deluded. That fine distinction 9 between the actual world and the mirage he has caught, and the 10 latter cannot delude him any more. So when the Vedantist has 11 realised his own nature, the whole world has vanished for him. It 12 will come back again, but no more the same world of misery. The 13 prison of misery has become changed into Sat, Chit, Ananda-- 14 Existence Absolute, Knowledge Absolute, Bliss Absolute--and the 15 attainment of this is the goal of the Advaita Philosophy.

REASON AND RELIGION

(Delivered in England)

A sage called Narada went to another sage named Sanatkumara to learn about truth, and Sanatkumara inquired what he had studied already. Narada answered that he had studied the Vedas, Astronomy, and various other things, yet he had got no satisfaction. Then there was a conversation between the two, in the course of which Sanatkumara remarked that all this knowledge of the Vedas, of Astronomy, and of Philosophy, was but secondary; sciences were but secondary. That which made us realise the Brahman was supreme, the highest knowledge. This idea we find in every religion, and that is why religion always claimed to be supreme knowledge. Knowledge of the sciences covers, as it were, only part of our lives, but the knowledge which religion brings to us is eternal, as infinite as the truth it preaches. Claiming this superiority, religions have many times looked down, unfortunately, on all secular knowledge, and not only so, but many times have refused to be justified by the aid of secular knowledge. In consequence, all the world over there have been fights between secular knowledge and religious knowledge, the one claiming infallible authority as its guide, refusing to listen to anything that secular knowledge has to say on the point, the other, with its shining instrument of reason, wanting to cut to pieces everything religion could bring forward. This fight has been and is still waged in every country. Religions have been again and again defeated, and almost exterminated. The worship of the goddess of Reason during the French Revolution was not the first manifestation of that phenomenon in the history of humanity, it was a re-enactment of what had happened in ancient times, but in modern times it has assumed greater proportions. The physical sciences are better equipped now than formerly, and religions have become less and less equipped. The foundations have been all undermined, and the modern man, whatever he may say in public, knows in the privacy of his heart that he can no more "believe". Believing certain things because an organised body of priests tells him to believe, believing because it is written in certain books, believing because his people like him to believe, the modern man knows to be impossible for him. There are, of course, a number of people who seem to acquiesce in the so-called popular faith, but we also know for certain that they do not think. Their idea of belief may be better translated as "not-thinking-carelessness". This fight cannot last much longer without breaking to pieces all the buildings of religion.

The question is: Is there a way out? To put it in a more concrete form: Is religion to justify itself by the discoveries of reason, through which every other science justifies itself? Are the same methods of investigation, which we apply to sciences and knowledge outside, to be applied to the science of Religion? In my opinion this must be so, and I am also of the opinion that the sooner it is done the better. If a religion is destroyed by such investigations, it was then all the time useless, unworthy superstition; and the sooner it goes the better. I am thoroughly convinced that its destruction would be the best thing that could

1 happen. All that is dross will be taken off, no doubt, but the 2 essential parts of religion will emerge triumphant out of this 3 investigation. Not only will it be made scientific--as scientific, at 4 least, as any of the conclusions of physics or chemistry--but will 5 have greater strength, because physics or chemistry has no internal 6 mandate to vouch for its truth, which religion has.

7 People who deny the efficacy of any rationalistic investigation 8 into religion seem to me somewhat to be contradicting themselves.
9 For instance, the Christian claims that his religion is the only true 10 one, because it was revealed to so-and-so. The Mohammedan 11 makes the same claim for his religion; his is the only true one, 12 because it was revealed to so-and-so. But the Christian says to the 13 Mohammedan, "Certain parts of your ethics do not seem to be 14 right. For instance, your books say, my Mohammedan friend, that an 15 infidel maybe converted to the religion of Mohammed by force, and 16 if he will not accept the Mohammedan religion he may be killed;
17 and any Mohammedan who kills such an infidel will get a sure entry 18 into heaven, whatever may have been his sins or misdeeds." The 19 Mohammedan will retort by saying, "It is right for me to do so, 20 because my book enjoins it. It will be wrong on my part not to say 21 so." The Christian says, "But my book does not say so." The 22 Mohammedan replies, "I do not know; I am not bound by the 23 authority of your book; my book says, 'Kill all infidels'. How do you 24 know which is right and which is wrong? Surely what is written in 25 my book is right and what your book says, 'Do not kill,' is wrong.
26 You also say the same thing, my Christian friend; you say that what 27 Jehovah declared to the Jews is right to do, and what he forbade 28 them to do is wrong. So say I, Allah declared in my book that 29 certain things should be done, and that certain things should not be 30 done, and that is all the test of right and wrong." In spite of that the 31 Christian is not satisfied; he insists on a comparison of the morality 32 of the Sermon on the Mount with the morality of the Koran. How is 33 this to be decided? Certainly not by the books, because the books, 34 fighting between themselves, cannot be the judges. Decidedly then 35 we have to admit that there is something more universal than these 36 books, something higher than all the ethical codes that are in the 37 world, something which can judge between the strength of 38 inspirations of different nations. Whether we declare it boldly, 39 clearly, or not--it is evident that here we appeal to reason.

40 Now, the question arises if this light of reason is able to judge 41 between inspiration and inspiration, and if this light can uphold its 42 standard when the quarrel is between prophet and prophet, if it has 43 the power of understanding anything whatsoever of religion. If it 44 has not, nothing can determine the hopeless fight of books and 45 prophets which has been going on through ages; for it means that 46 all religions are mere lies, hopelessly contradictory, without any 47 constant idea of ethics. The proof of religion depends on the truth 48 of the constitution of man, and not on any books. These books are 49 the outgoings, the effects of man's constitution; man made these 50 books. We are yet to see the books that made man. Reason is 51 equally an effect of that common cause, the constitution of man, 52 where our appeal must be. And yet, as reason alone is directly

1 connected with this constitution, it should be resorted to, as long as 2 it follows faithfully the same. What do I mean by reason? I mean 3 what every educated man or woman is wanting to do at the present 4 time, to apply the discoveries of secular knowledge to religion. The 5 first principle of reasoning is that the particular is explained by the 6 general, the general by the more general, until we come to the 7 universal. For instance, we have the idea of law. If something 8 happens and we believe that it is the effect of such and such a law, 9 we are satisfied; that is an explanation for us. What we mean by 10 that explanation is that it is proved that this one effect, which had 11 dissatisfied us, is only one particular of a general mass of 12 occurrences which we designate by the word "law". When one 13 apple fell, Newton was disturbed; but when he found that all apples 14 fell, it was gravitation, and he was satisfied. This is one principle of 15 human knowledge. I see a particular being, a human being, in the 16 street. I refer him to the bigger conception of man, and I am 17 satisfied; I know he is a man by referring him to the more general.
18 So the particulars are to be referred to the general, the general to 19 the more general, and everything at last to the universal, the last 20 concept that we have, the most universal--that of existence.
21 Existence is the most universal concept.

22 We are all human beings; that is to say, each one of us, as it
23 were, a particular part of the general concept, humanity. A man, 24 and a cat, and a dog, are all animals. These particular examples, as 25 man, or dog, or cat, are parts of a bigger and more general concept, 26 animal. The man, and the cat, and the dog, and the plant, and the 27 tree, all come under the still more general concept, life. Again, all 28 these, all beings and all materials, come under the one concept of 29 existence, for we all are in it. This explanation merely means 30 referring the particular to a higher concept, finding more of its 31 kind. The mind, as it was has stored up numerous classes of such 32 generalisations. It is, as it were, full of pigeon-holes where all these 33 ideas are grouped together, and whenever we find a new thing the 34 mind immediately tries to find out its type in one of these pigeon-35 holes. If we find it, we put the new thing in there and are satisfied, 36 and we are said to have known the thing. This is what is meant by 37 knowledge, and no more. And if we do not find that there is 38 something like it, we are dissatisfied, and have to wait until we find 39 a further classification for it, already existing in the mind.
40 Therefore, as I have already pointed out, knowledge is more or less 41 classification. There is something more. A second explanation of 42 knowledge is that the explanation of a thing must come from inside 43 and not from outside. There had been the belief that, when a man 44 threw up a stone and it fell, some demon dragged it down. Many 45 occurrences which are really natural phenomena are attributed by 46 people to unnatural beings. That a ghost dragged down the stone 47 was an explanation that was not in the thing itself, it was an 48 explanation from outside; but the second explanation of gravitation 49 is something in the nature of the stone; the explanation is coming 50 from inside. This tendency you will find throughout modern 51 thought; in one word, what is meant by science is that the 52 explanations of things are in their own nature, and that no external 53 beings or existences are required to explain what is going on in the 1 universe. The chemist never requires demons, or ghosts, or 2 anything of that sort, to explain his phenomena. The physicist never 3 requires anyone of these to explain the things he knows, nor does 4 any other scientist. And this is one of the features of science which I 5 mean to apply to religion. In this religions are found wanting and 6 that is why they are crumbling into pieces. Every science wants its 7 explanations from inside, from the very nature of things; and the 8 religions are not able to supply this. There is an ancient theory of a 9 personal deity entirely separate from the universe, which has been 10 held from the very earliest time. The arguments in favour of this 11 have been repeated again and again, how it is necessary to have a 12 God entirely separate from the universe, an extra-cosmic deity, who 13 has created the universe out of his will, and is conceived by religion 14 to be its ruler. We find, apart from all these arguments, the 15 Almighty God painted as the All-merciful, and at the same time, 16 inequalities remain in the world. These things do not concern the 17 philosopher at all, but he says the heart of the thing was wrong; it 18 was an explanation from outside, and not inside. What is the cause 19 of the universe? Something outside of it, some being who is moving 20 this universe! And just as it was found insufficient to explain the 21 phenomenon of the falling stone, so this was found insufficient to 22 explain religion. And religions are falling to pieces, because they 23 cannot give a better explanation than that.

24 Another idea connected with this, the manifestation of the 25 same principle, that the explanation of everything comes from 26 inside it, is the modern law of evolution. The whole meaning of 27 evolution is simply that the nature of a thing is reproduced, that the 28 effect is nothing but the cause in another form, that all the 29 potentialities of the effect were present in the cause, that the whole 30 of creation is but an evolution and not a creation. That is to say, 31 every effect is a reproduction of a preceding cause, changed only by 32 the circumstances, and thus it is going on throughout the universe, 33 and we need not go outside the universe to seek the causes of these 34 changes; they are within. It is unnecessary to seek for any cause 35 outside. This also is breaking down religion. What I mean by 36 breaking down religion is that religions that have held on to the 37 idea of an extra-cosmic deity, that he is a very big man and nothing 38 else, can no more stand on their feet; they have been pulled down, 39 as it were.

40 Can there be a religion satisfying these two principles? I think 41 there can be. In the first place we have seen that we have to satisfy 42 the principle of generalisation. The generalisation principle ought 43 to be satisfied along with the principle of evolution. We have to 44 come to an ultimate generalisation, which not only will be the most 45 universal of all generalisations, but out of which everything else 46 must come. It will be of the same nature as the lowest effect; the 47 cause, the highest, the ultimate, the primal cause, must be the 48 same as the lowest and most distant of its effects, a series of 49 evolutions. The Brahman of the Vedanta fulfils that condition, 50 because Brahman is the last generalisation to which we can come.
51 It has no attributes but is Existence, Knowledge, and Bliss-- 52 Absolute. Existence, we have seen, is the very ultimate

1 generalisation which the human mind can come to. Knowledge does 2 not mean the knowledge we have, but the essence of that, that 3 which is expressing itself in the course of evolution in human 4 beings or in other animals as knowledge. The essence of that 5 knowledge is meant, the ultimate fact beyond, if I may be allowed 6 to say so, even consciousness. That is what is meant by knowledge 7 and what we see in the universe as the essential unity of things. To 8 my mind, if modern science is proving anything again and again, it 9 is this, that we are one--mentally, spiritually, and physically. It is 10 wrong to say we are even physically different. Supposing we are 11 materialists, for argument's sake, we shall have to come to this, 12 that the whole universe is simply an ocean of matter, of which you 13 and I are like little whirlpools. Masses of matter are coming into 14 each whirlpool, taking the whirlpool form, and coming out as matter 15 again. The matter that is in my body may have been in yours a few 16 years ago, or in the sun, or may have been the matter in a plant, 17 and so on, in a continuous state of flux. What is meant by your body 18 and my body? It is the oneness of the body. So with thought. It is an 19 ocean of thought, one infinite mass, in which your mind and my 20 mind are like whirlpools. Are you not seeing the effect now, how my 21 thoughts are entering into yours, and yours into mine? The whole of 22 our lives is one; we are one, even in thought. Coming to a still 23 further generalisation, the essence of matter and thought is their 24 potentiality of spirit; this is the unity from which all have come, and 25 that must essentially be one. We are absolutely one; we are 26 physically one, we are mentally one, and as spirit, it goes without 27 saying, that we are one, if we believe in spirit at all. This oneness is 28 the one fact that is being proved every day by modern science. To 29 proud man it is told: You are the same as that little worm there; 30 think not that you are something enormously different from it; you 31 are the same. You have been that in a previous incarnation, and the 32 worm has crawled up to this man state, of which you are so proud.
33 This grand preaching, the oneness of things, making us one with 34 everything that exists, is the great lesson to learn, for most of us 35 are very glad to be made one with higher beings, but nobody wants 36 to be made one with lower beings. Such is human ignorance, that if 37 anyone's ancestors were men whom society honoured, even if they 38 were brutish, if they were robbers, even robber barons, everyone of 39 us would try to trace our ancestry to them; but if among our 40 ancestors we had poor, honest gentlemen, none of us wants to trace 41 our ancestry to them. But the scales are falling from our eyes, truth 42 is beginning to manifest itself more and more, and that is a great 43 gain to religion. That is exactly the teaching of the Advaita, about 44 which I am lecturing to you. The Self is the essence of this universe, 45 the essence of all souls; He is the essence of your own life, nay, 46 "Thou are That". You are one with this universe. He who says he is 47 different from others, even by a hair's breadth, immediately 48 becomes miserable. Happiness belongs to him who knows this 49 oneness, who knows he is one with this universe.

50 Thus we see that the religion of the Vedanta can satisfy the 51 demands of the scientific world, by referring it to the highest 52 generalisation and to the law of evolution. That the explanation of a 53 thing comes from within itself is still more completely satisfied by

1 Vedanta. The Brahman, the God of the Vedanta, has nothing outside 2 of Himself; nothing at all. All this indeed is He: He is in the 3 universe: He is the universe Himself. "Thou art the man, Thou art 4 the woman, Thou art the young man walking in the pride of youth, 5 Thou art the old man tottering in his step." He is here. Him we see 6 and feel: in Him we live, and move, and have our being. You have 7 that conception in the New Testament. It is that idea, God 8 immanent in the universe, the very essence, the heart, the soul of 9 things. He manifests Himself, as it were, in this universe. You and I 10 are little bits, little points, little channels, little expressions, all 11 living inside of that infinite ocean of Existence, Knowledge, and 12 Bliss. The difference between man and man, between angels and 13 man, between man and animals, between animals and plants, 14 between plants and stones is not in kind, because everyone from 15 the highest angel to the lowest particle of matter is but an 16 expression of that one infinite ocean, and the difference is only in 17 degree. I am a low manifestation, you may be a higher, but in both 18 the materials are the same. You and I are both outlets of the same 19 channel, and that is God; as such, your nature is God, and so is 20 mine. You are of the nature of God by your birthright; so am I. You 21 may be an angel of purity, and I may be the blackest of demons.
22 Nevertheless, my birthright is that infinite ocean of Existence, 23 Knowledge, and Bliss. So is yours. You have manifested yourself 24 more today. Wait; I will manifest myself more yet, for I have it all 25 within me. No extraneous explanation is sought; none is asked for.
26 The sum-total of this whole universe is God Himself. Is God then 27 matter? No, certainly not, for matter is that God perceived by the 28 five senses; that God as perceived through the intellect is mind; and 29 when the spirit sees, He is seen as spirit. He is not matter, but 30 whatever is real in matter is He. Whatever is real in this chair is 31 He, for the chair requires two things to make it. Something was 32 outside which my senses brought to me, and to which my mind 33 contributed something else, and the combination of these two is the 34 chair. That which existed eternally, independent of the senses and 35 of the intellect, was the Lord Himself. Upon Him the senses are 36 painting chairs, and tables, and rooms, and houses, and worlds, and 37 moons, and suns, and stars, and everything else. How is it, then, 38 that we all see this same chair, that we are all alike painting these 39 various things on the Lord, on this Existence, Knowledge, and Bliss?
40 It need not be that all paint the same way, but those who paint the 41 same way are on the same plane of existence and therefore they 42 see one another's paintings as well as one another. There may be 43 millions of beings between you and me who do not paint the Lord in 44 the same way, and them and their paintings we do not see.

45 On the other hand, as you all know, the modern physical 46 researches are tending more and more to demonstrate that what is 47 real is but the finer; the gross is simply appearance. However that 48 may be, we have seen that if any theory of religion can stand the 49 test of modern reasoning, it is the Advaita, because it fulfils its two 50 requirements. It is the highest generalisation, beyond even 51 personality, generalisation which is common to every being. A 52 generalisation ending in the Personal God can never be universal, 53 for, first of all, to conceive of a Personal God we must say, He is all-

1 merciful, all-good. But this world is a mixed thing, some good and 2 some bad. We cut off what we like, and generalise that into a
3 Personal God! Just as you say a Personal God is this and that, so you 4 have also to say that He is not this and not that. And you will always 5 find that the idea of a Personal God has to carry with it a personal 6 devil. That is how we clearly see that the idea of a Personal God is 7 not a true generalisation, we have to go beyond, to the Impersonal.
8 In that the universe exists, with all its joys and miseries, for 9 whatever exists in it has all come from the Impersonal. What sort of 10 a God can He be to whom we attribute evil and other things? The 11 idea is that both good and evil are different aspects, or 12 manifestations of the same thing. The idea that they were two was 13 a very wrong idea from the first, and it has been the cause of a 14 good deal of the misery in this world of ours--the idea that right and 15 wrong are two separate things, cut and dried, independent of each 16 other, that good and evil are two eternally separable and separate 17 things. I should be very glad to see a man who could show me 18 something which is good all the time, and something which is bad 19 all the time. As if one could stand and gravely define some 20 occurrences in this life of ours as good and good alone, and some 21 which are bad and bad alone. That which is good today may be evil 22 tomorrow. That which is bad today may be good tomorrow. What is 23 good for me may be bad for you. The conclusion is, that like every 24 other thing, there is an evolution in good and evil too. There is 25 something which in its evolution, we call, in one degree, good, and 26 in another, evil. The storm that kills my friend I call evil, but that 27 may have saved the lives of hundreds of thousands of people by 28 killing the bacilli in the air. They call it good, but I call it evil. So 29 both good and evil belong to the relative world, to phenomena. The 30 Impersonal God we propose is not a relative God; therefore it 31 cannot be said that It is either good or bad, but that It is something 32 beyond, because It is neither good nor evil. Good, however, is a 33 nearer manifestation of It than evil.

34 What is the effect of accepting such an Impersonal Being, an 35 Impersonal Deity? What shall we gain? Will religion stand as a 36 factor in human life, our consoler, our helper? What becomes of the 37 desire of the human heart to pray for help to some being? That will 38 all remain. The Personal God will remain, but on a better basis. He 39 has been strengthened by the Impersonal. We have seen that 40 without the Impersonal, the Personal cannot remain. If you mean to 41 say there is a Being entirely separate from this universe, who has 42 created this universe just by His will, out of nothing, that cannot be 43 proved. Such a state of things cannot be. But if we understand the 44 idea of the Impersonal, then the idea of the Personal can remain 45 there also. This universe, in its various forms, is but the various 46 readings of the same Impersonal. When we read it with the five 47 senses, we call it the material world. If there be a being with more 48 senses than five, he will read it as something else. If one of us gets 49 the electrical sense, he will see the universe as something else
50 again. There are various forms of that same Oneness, of which all 51 these various ideas of worlds are but various readings, and the 52 Personal God is the highest reading that can be attained to, of that 53 Impersonal, by the human intellect. So that the Personal God is true

1 as much as this chair is true, as much as this world is true, but no 2 more. It is not absolute truth. That is to say, the Personal God is that 3 very Impersonal God and, therefore, it is true, just as I, as a human 4 being, am true and not true at the same time. It is not true that I am 5 what you see I am; you can satisfy yourself on that point. I am not 6 the being that you take me to be. You can satisfy your reason as to 7 that, because light, and various vibrations, or conditions of the 8 atmosphere, and all sorts of motions inside me have contributed to 9 my being looked upon as what I am, by you. If any one of these 10 conditions change, I am different again. You may satisfy yourself by 11 taking a photograph of the same man under different conditions of 12 light. So I am what I appear in relation to your senses, and yet, in 13 spite of all these facts, there is an unchangeable something of 14 which all these are different states of existence, the impersonal me, 15 of which thousands of me's are different persons. I was a child, I 16 was young, I am getting older. Every day of my life, my body and 17 thoughts are changing, but in spite of all these changes, the sum-18 total of them constitutes a mass which is a constant quantity. That is 19 the impersonal me, of which all these manifestations form, as it 20 were, parts.

21 Similarly, the sum-total of this universe is immovable, we 22 know, but everything pertaining to this universe consists of motion, 23 everything is in a constant state of flux, everything changing and 24 moving. At the same time, we see that the universe as a whole is 25 immovable, because motion is a relative term. I move with regard 26 to the chair, which does not move. There must be at least two to 27 make motion. If this whole universe is taken as a unit there is no 28 motion; with regard to what should it move? Thus the Absolute is 29 unchangeable and immovable, and all the movements and changes 30 are only in the phenomenal world, the limited. That whole is 31 Impersonal, and within this Impersonal are all these various 32 persons beginning with the lowest atom, up to God, the Personal 33 God, the Creator, the Ruler of the Universe, to whom we pray, 34 before whom we kneel, and so on. Such a Personal God can be 35 established with a great deal of reason. Such a Personal God is 36 explicable as the highest manifestation of the Impersonal. You and I 37 are very low manifestations, and the Personal God is the highest of 38 which we can conceive. Nor can you or I become that Personal God.
39 When the Vedanta says you and I are God, it does not mean the 40 Personal God. To take an example. Out of a mass of clay a huge 41 elephant of clay is manufactured, and out of the same clay, a little 42 clay mouse is made. Would the clay mouse ever be able to become 43 the clay elephant? But put them both in water and they are both 44 clay; as clay they are both one, but as mouse and elephant there 45 will be an eternal difference between them. The Infinite, the 46 Impersonal, is like the clay in the example. We and the Ruler of the 47 Universe are one, but as manifested beings, men, we are His 48 eternal slaves, His worshippers. Thus we see that the Personal God 49 remains. Everything else in this relative world remains, and religion 50 is made to stand on a better foundation. Therefore it is necessary 51 that we first know the Impersonal in order to know the Personal.

52 As we have seen, the law of reason says, the particular is only

1 known through the general. So all these particulars, from man to 2 God, are only known through the Impersonal, the highest 3 generalisation. Prayers will remain, only they will get a better 4 meaning. All those senseless ideas of prayer, the low stages of 5 prayer, which are simply giving words to all sorts of silly desires in 6 our minds, perhaps, will have to go. In all sensible religions, they 7 never allow prayers to God; they allow prayers to gods. That is 8 quite natural. The Roman Catholics pray to the saints; that is quite 9 good. But to pray to God is senseless. To ask God to give you a 10 breath of air, to send down a shower of rain, to make fruits grow in 11 your garden, and so on, is quite unnatural. The saints, however, 12 who were little beings like ourselves, may help us. But to pray to 13 the Ruler of the Universe, prating every little need of ours, and 14 from our childhood saying, "O Lord, I have a headache; let it go," is 15 ridiculous. There have been millions of souls that have died in this 16 world, and they are all here; they have become gods and angels; let 17 them come to your help. But God! It cannot be. Unto Him we must 18 go for higher things. A fool indeed is he who, resting on the banks 19 of the Ganga, digs a little well for water; a fool indeed is he who, 20 living near a mine of diamonds, digs for bits of crystal.

21 And indeed we shall be fools if we go to the Father of all 22 mercy, Father of all love, for trivial earthly things. Unto Him, 23 therefore, we shall go for light, for strength, for love. But so long as 24 there is weakness and a craving for servile dependence in us, there 25 will be these little prayers and ideas of the worship of the Personal 26 God. But those who are highly advanced do not care for such little 27 helps, they have well-nigh forgotten all about this seeking things for 28 themselves, wanting things for themselves. The predominant idea 29 in them is--not I, but thou, my brother. Those are the fit persons to 30 worship the Impersonal God. And what is the worship of the 31 Impersonal God? No slavery there--"O Lord, I am nothing, have 32 mercy on me." You know the old Persian poem, translated into 33 English: I came to see my beloved. The doors were closed. I 34 knocked and a voice came from inside. 'Who art thou?' 'I am so-and-35 so.' The door was not opened. A second time I came and knocked; I 36 was asked the same question, and gave the same answer. The door
37 opened not. I came a third time, and the same question came. I 38 answered, 'I am thee, my love,' and the door opened." Worship of 39 the Impersonal God is through truth. And what is truth? That I am 40 He. When I say that I am not Thou, it is untrue. When I say I am 41 separate from you it is a lie, a terrible lie. I am one with this 42 universe, born one. It is self-evident to my senses that I am one with 43 the universe. I am one with the air that surrounds me, one with 44 heat, one with light, eternally one with the whole Universal Being, 45 who is called this universe, who is mistaken for the universe, for it 46 is He and nothing else, the eternal subject in the heart who says, "I 47 am," in every heart--the deathless one, the sleepless one, ever 48 awake, the immortal, whose glory never dies, whose powers never 49 fail. I am one with That.

50 This is all the worship of the Impersonal, and what is the 51 result? The whole life of man will be changed. Strength, strength it 52 is that we want so much in this life, for what we call sin and sorrow

1 have all one cause, and that is our weakness. With weakness comes 2 ignorance, and with ignorance comes misery. It will make us strong.
3 Then miseries will be laughed at, then the violence of the vile will 4 be smiled at, and the ferocious tiger will reveal, behind its tiger's 5 nature, my own Self. That will be the result. That soul is strong that 6 has become one with the Lord; none else is strong. In your own 7 Bible, what do you think was the cause of that strength of Jesus of 8 Nazareth, that immense, infinite strength which laughed at traitors, 9 and blessed those that were willing to murder him? It was that, "I 10 and my Father are one"; it was that prayer, "Father, just as I am one 11 with you, so make them all one with me. "That is the worship of the 12 Impersonal God. Be one with the universe, be one with Him. And 13 this Impersonal God requires no demonstrations, no proofs. He is 14 nearer to us than even our senses, nearer to us than our own 15 thoughts; it is in and through Him that we see and think. To see 16 anything, I must first see Him. To see this wall I first see Him, and 17 then the wall, for He is the eternal subject. Who is seeing whom?
18 He is here in the heart of our hearts. Bodies and minds change; 19 misery, happiness, good and evil come and go; days and years roll 20 on; life comes and goes; but He dies not. The same voice, "I am, I 21 am," is eternal, unchangeable. In Him and through Him we know 22 everything. In Him and through Him we see everything. In Him and 23 through Him we sense, we think, we live, and we are. And that "I," 24 which we mistake to be a little "I," limited, is not only my "I," but 25 yours, the "I" of everyone, of the animals, of the angels, of the 26 lowest of the low. That "I am" is the same in the murderer as in the 27 saint, the same in the rich as in the poor, the same in man as in 28 woman, the same in man as in animals. From the lowest amoeba to 29 the highest angel, He resides in every soul, and eternally declares, 30 "I am He, I am He." When we have understood that voice eternally 31 present there, when we have learnt this lesson, the whole universe 32 will have expressed its secret. Nature will have given up her secret 33 to us. Nothing more remains to be known. Thus we find the truth 34 for which all religions search, that all this knowledge of material 35 sciences is but secondary. That is the only true knowledge which 36 makes us one with this Universal God of the Universe.

VEDANTA AS A FACTOR IN CIVILISATION

(Extract from an address delivered at Airlie Lodge, Ridgeway Gardens, England)

People who are capable of seeing only the gross external aspect of things can perceive in the Indian nation only a conquered and suffering people, a race of dreamers and philosophers. They seem to be incapable of perceiving that in the spiritual realm India conquers the world. No doubt it is true that just as the too active Western mind would profit by an admixture of Eastern introspection and the meditative habit, so the Eastern would benefit by a somewhat greater activity and energy. Still we must ask: What may be that force which causes this afflicted and suffering people, the Hindu, and the Jewish too (the two races from which have originated all the great religions of the world) to survive, when other nations perish? The cause can only be their spiritual force. The Hindus are still living though silent, the Jews are more numerous today than when they lived in Palestine. The philosophy of India percolates throughout the whole civilised world, modifying and permeating as it goes. So also in ancient times, her trade reached the shores of Africa before Europe was known, and opened communication with the rest of the world, thus disproving the belief that Indians never went outside of their own country.

It is remarkable also that the possession of India by a foreign power has always been a turning-point in the history of that power, bringing to it wealth, prosperity, dominion, and spiritual ideas. While the Western man tries to measure how much it is possible for him to possess and to enjoy, the Eastern seems to take the opposite course, and to measure how little of material possession he can do with. In the Vedas we trace the endeavour of that ancient people to find God. In their search for Him they came upon different strata; beginning with ancestor worship, they passed on to the worship of Agni, the fire-god, of Indra, the god of thunder, and of Varuna, the God of gods. We find the growth of this idea of God, from many gods to one God, in all religions; its real meaning is that He is the chief of the tribal gods, who creates the world, rules it, and sees into every heart; the stages of growth lead up from a multiplicity of gods to monotheism. This anthropomorphic conception, however, did not satisfy the Hindus, it was too human for them who were seeking the Divine. Therefore they finally gave up searching for God in the outer world of sense and matter, and turned their attention to the inner world. Is there an inner world? And what is it? It is Atman. It is the Self, it is the only thing an individual can be sure of. If he knows himself, he can know the universe, and not otherwise. The same question was asked in the beginning of time, even in the Rig-Veda, in another form: "Who or what existed from the beginning?" That question was gradually solved by the Vedanta philosophy. The Atman existed. That is to say, what we call the Absolute, the Universal Soul, the Self, is the force by which from the beginning all things have been and are and will be manifested.

While the Vedanta philosophers solved that question, they at the same time discovered the basis of ethics. Though all religions have taught ethical precepts, such as, "Do not kill, do not injure;

1 love your neighbour as yourself," etc., yet none of these has given 2 the reason. Why should I not injure my neighbour? To this question 3 there was no satisfactory or conclusive answer forthcoming, until it 4 was evolved by the metaphysical speculations of the Hindus who 5 could not rest satisfied with mere dogmas. So the Hindus say that 6 this Atman is absolute and all-pervading, therefore infinite. There 7 cannot be two infinities, for they would limit each other and would 8 become finite. Also each individual soul is a part and parcel of that 9 Universal Soul, which is infinite. Therefore in injuring his 10 neighbour, the individual actually injures himself. This is the basic 11 metaphysical truth underlying all ethical codes. It is too often 12 believed that a person in his progress towards perfection passes 13 from error to truth; that when he passes on from one thought to 14 another, he must necessarily reject the first. But no error can lead 15 to truth. The soul passing through its different stages goes from 16 truth to truth, and each stage is true; it goes from lower truth to 17 higher truth. This point may be illustrated in the following way. A 18 man is journeying towards the sun and takes a photograph at each 19 step. How different would be the first photograph from the second 20 and still more from the third or the last, when he reaches the real 21 sun! But all these, though differing so widely from each other, are 22 true, only they are made to appear different by the changing 23 conditions of time and space. It is the recognition of this truth, 24 which has enabled the Hindus to perceive the universal truth of all 25 religions, from the lowest to the highest; it has made of them the 26 only people who never had religious persecutions. The shrine of a 27 Mohammedan saint which is at the present day neglected and 28 forgotten by Mohammedans, is worshipped by Hindus! Many 29 instances may be quoted, illustrating the same spirit of tolerance.

30 The Eastern mind could not rest satisfied till it had found that 31 goal, which is the end sought by all humanity, namely, Unity. The 32 Western scientist seeks for unity in the atom or the molecule. When 33 he finds it, there is nothing further for him to discover, and so when 34 we find that Unity of Soul or Self, which is called Atman, we can go 35 no further. It becomes clear that everything in the sense-world is a 36 manifestation of that One Substance.

37 Further, the scientist is brought to the necessity of 38 recognising metaphysics, when he supposes that atoms having 39 neither breadth nor length yet become, when combined, the cause 40 of extension, length, and breadth. When one atom acts upon 41 another, some medium is necessary. What is that medium? It will be 42 a third atom. If so, then the question still remains unanswered, for 43 how do these two act on the third? A manifest reductio ad
44 absurdum. This contradiction in terms is also found in the 45 hypothesis necessary to all physical science that a point is that 46 which has neither parts nor magnitude, and a line has length 47 without breadth. These cannot be either seen or conceived. Why?
48 Because they do not come within the range of the senses. They are 49 metaphysical conceptions. So we see, it is finally the mind which 50 gives the form to all perception. When I see a chair, it is not the real 51 chair external to my eye which I perceive, but an external 52 something plus the mental image formed. Thus even the materialist

1 is driven to metaphysics in the last extremity.

THE SPIRIT AND INFLUENCE OF VEDANTA

(Delivered at the Twentieth Century Club, Boston)

Before going into the subject of this afternoon, will you allow me to say a few words of thanks, now that I have the opportunity? I have lived three years amongst you. I have travelled over nearly the whole of America, and as I am going back from here to my own country, it is meet that I should take this opportunity of expressing my gratitude in this Athens of America. When I first came to this country, after a few days I thought I would be able to write a book on the nation. But after three years' stay here, I find I am not able to write even a page. On the other hand, I find in travelling in various countries that beneath the surface differences that we find in dress and food and little details of manners, man is man all the world over; the same wonderful human nature is everywhere represented. Yet there are certain characteristics, and in a few words I would like to sum up all my experiences here. In this land of America, no question is asked about a man's peculiarities. If a man is a man, that is enough, and they take him into their hearts, and that is one thing I have never seen in any other country in the world.

I came here to represent a philosophy in India, which is called the Vedanta philosophy. This philosophy is very, very ancient; it is the outcome of that mass of ancient Aryan literature known by the name of the Vedas. It is, as it were, the very flower of all the speculations and experiences and analyses, embodied in that mass of literature--collected and culled through centuries. This Vedanta philosophy has certain peculiarities. In the first place, it is perfectly impersonal; it does not owe its origin to any person or prophet: it does not build itself around one man as a centre. Yet it has nothing to say against philosophies which do build themselves around certain persons. In later days in India, other philosophies and systems arose, built around certain persons--such as Buddhism, or many of our present sects. They each have a certain leader to whom they owe allegiance, just as the Christians and Mohammedans have. But the Vedanta philosophy stands at the background of all these various sects, and there is no fight and no antagonism between the Vedanta and any other system in the world.

One principle it lays down--and that, the Vedanta claims, is to be found in every religion in the world--that man is divine, that all this which we see around us is the outcome of that consciousness of the divine. Everything that is strong, and good, and powerful in human nature is the outcome of that divinity, and though potential in many, there is no difference between man and man essentially, all being alike divine. There is, as it were, an infinite ocean behind, and you and I are so many waves, coming out of that infinite ocean; and each one of us is trying his best to manifest that infinite outside. So, potentially, each one of us has that infinite ocean of Existence, Knowledge, and Bliss as our birthright, our real nature; and the difference between us is caused by the greater or lesser power to manifest that divine. Therefore the Vedanta lays down that each man should be treated not as what he manifests, but as what he

1 stands for. Each human being stands for the divine, and, therefore, 2 every teacher should be helpful, not by condemning man, but by 3 helping him to call forth the divinity that is within him.

4 It also teaches that all the vast mass of energy that we see 5 displayed in society and in every plane of action is really from 6 inside out; and, therefore, what is called inspiration by other sects, 7 the Vedantist begs the liberty to call the expiration of man. At the 8 same time it does not quarrel with other sects; the Vedanta has no 9 quarrel with those who do not understand this divinity of man.
10 Consciously or unconsciously, every man is trying to unfold that 11 divinity.

12 Man is like an infinite spring, coiled up in a small box, and 13 that spring is trying to unfold itself; and all the social phenomena 14 that we see are the result of this trying to unfold. All the 15 competitions and struggles and evils that we see around us are 16 neither the causes of these unfoldments, nor the effects. As one of 17 our great philosophers says--in the case of the irrigation of a field, 18 the tank is somewhere upon a higher level, and the water is trying 19 to rush into the field, and is barred by a gate. But as soon as the 20 gate is opened, the water rushes in by its own nature; and if there 21 is dust and dirt in the way, the water rolls over them. But dust and 22 dirt are neither the result nor the cause of this unfolding of the 23 divine nature of man. They are co-existent circumstances, and, 24 therefore, can be remedied.

25 Now, this idea, claims the Vedanta, is to be found in all 26 religions, whether in India or outside of it; only, in some of them, 27 the idea is expressed through mythology, and in others, through 28 symbology. The Vedanta claims that there has not been one 29 religious inspiration, one manifestation of the divine man, however 30 great, but it has been the expression of that infinite oneness in 31 human nature; and all that we call ethics and morality and doing 32 good to others is also but the manifestation of this oneness. There 33 are moments when every man feels that he is one with the universe, 34 and he rushes forth to express it, whether he knows it or not. This 35 expression of oneness is what we call love and sympathy, and it is 36 the basis of all our ethics and morality. This is summed up in the 37 Vedanta philosophy by the celebrated aphorism, Tat Tvam Asi, 38 "Thou art That".

39 To every man, this is taught: Thou art one with this Universal 40 Being, and, as such, every soul that exists is your soul; and every 41 body that exists is your body; and in hurting anyone, you hurt 42 yourself, in loving anyone, you love yourself. As soon as a current of 43 hatred is thrown outside, whomsoever else it hurts, it also hurts 44 yourself; and if love comes out from you, it is bound to come back to 45 you. For I am the universe; this universe is my body. I am the 46 Infinite, only I am not conscious of it now; but I am struggling to get 47 this consciousness of the Infinite, and perfection will be reached 48 when full consciousness of this Infinite comes.

49 Another peculiar idea of the Vedanta is that we must allow 50 this infinite variation in religious thought, and not try to bring 51 everybody to the same opinion, because the goal is the same. As the 1 Vedantist says in his poetical language, "As so many rivers, having 2 their source in different mountains, roll down, crooked or straight, 3 and at last come into the ocean--so, all these various creeds and 4 religions, taking their start from different standpoints and running 5 through crooked or straight courses, at last come unto THEE."

6 As a manifestation of that, we find that this most ancient 7 philosophy has, through its influence, directly inspired Buddhism, 8 the first missionary religion of the world, and indirectly, it has also 9 influenced Christianity, through the Alexandrians, the Gnostics, and 10 the European philosophers of the middle ages. And later, 11 influencing German thought, it has produced almost a revolution in 12 the regions of philosophy and psychology. Yet all this mass of 13 influence has been given to the world almost unperceived. As the 14 gentle falling of the dew at night brings support to all vegetable 15 life, so, slowly and imperceptibly, this divine philosophy has been 16 spread through the world for the good of mankind. No march of 17 armies has been used to preach this religion. In Buddhism, one of 18 the most missionary religions of the world, we find inscriptions 19 remaining of the great Emperor Asoka--recording how missionaries 20 were sent to Alexandria, to Antioch, to Persia, to China, and to 21 various other countries of the then civilised world. Three hundred 22 years before Christ, instructions were given them not to revile 23 other religions: "The basis of all religions is the same, wherever 24 they are; try to help them all you can, teach them all you can, but do 25 not try to injure them."

26 Thus in India there never was any religious persecution by 27 the Hindus, but only that wonderful reverence, which they have for 28 all the religions of the world. They sheltered a portion of the 29 Hebrews, when they were driven out of their own country; and the 30 Malabar Jews remain as a result. They received at another time the 31 remnant of the Persians, when they were almost annihilated; and 32 they remain to this day, as a part of us and loved by us, as the 33 modern Parsees of Bombay. There were Christians who claimed to 34 have come with St. Thomas, the disciple of Jesus Christ; and they 35 were allowed to settle in India and hold their own opinions; and a 36 colony of them is even now in existence in India. And this spirit of 37 toleration has not died out. It will not and cannot die there.

38 This is one of the great lessons that the Vedanta has to teach.
39 Knowing that, consciously or unconsciously, we are struggling to 40 reach the same goal, why should we be impatient? If one man is 41 slower than another, we need not be impatient, we need not curse 42 him, or revile him. When our eyes are opened and the heart is 43 purified, the work of the same divine influence, the unfolding of the 44 same divinity in every human heart, will become manifest; and then 45 alone we shall be in a position to claim the brotherhood of man.

46 When a man has reached the highest, when he sees neither 47 man nor woman, neither sect nor creed, nor colour, nor birth, nor 48 any of these differentiations, but goes beyond and finds that divinity 49 which is the real man behind every human being--then alone he has 50 reached the universal brotherhood, and that man alone is a 51 Vedantist.

1 Such are some of the practical historical results of the 2 Vedanta.

STEPS OF HINDU PHILOSOPHIC THOUGHT

The first group of religious ideas that we see coming up--I mean recognised religious ideas, and not the very low ideas, which do not deserve the name of religion--all include the idea of inspiration and revealed books and so forth. The first group of religious ideas starts with the idea of God. Here is the universe, and this universe is created by a certain Being. Everything that is in this universe has been created by Him. Along with that, at a later stage, comes the idea of soul--that there is this body, and something inside this body which is not the body. This is the most primitive idea of religion that we know. We can find a few followers of that in India, but it was given up very early. The Indian religions take a peculiar start. It is only by strict analysis, and much calculation and conjecture, that we can ever think that that stage existed in Indian religions. The tangible state in which we find them is the next step, not the first one. At the earliest step the idea of creation is very peculiar, and it is that the whole universe is created out of zero, at the will of God; that all this universe did not exist, and out of this nothingness all this has come. In the next stage we find this conclusion is questioned. How can existence be produced out of non-existence? At the first step in the Vedanta this question is asked. If this universe is existent it must have come out of something, because it was very easy to see that nothing comes out of nothing, anywhere. All work that is done by human hands requires materials. If a house is built, the material was existing before; if a boat is made, the material existed before; if any implements are made, the materials were existing before. So the effect is produced. Naturally, therefore, the first idea that this world was created out of nothing was rejected, and some material out of which this world was created was wanted. The whole history of religion, in fact, is this search after that material.

Out of what has all this been produced? Apart from the question of the efficient cause, or God, apart from the question that God created the universe, the great question of all questions is: Out of what did He create it? All the philosophies are turning, as it were, on this question. One solution is that nature, God, and soul are eternal existences, as if three lines are running parallel eternally, of which nature and soul comprise what they call the dependent, and God the independent Reality. Every soul, like every particle of matter, is perfectly dependent on the will of God. Before going to the other steps we will take up the idea of soul, and then find that with all the Vedantic philosophers, there is one tremendous departure from all Western philosophy. All of them have a common psychology. Whatever their philosophy may have been, their psychology is the same in India, the old Sankhya psychology. According to this, perception occurs by the transmission of the vibrations which first come to the external sense-organs, from the external to the internal organs, from the internal organs to the mind, from the mind to the Buddhi, from the Buddhi or intellect, to something which is a unit, which they call the Atman. Coming to modern physiology, we know that it has found centres for all the different sensations. First it finds the lower centres, and then a higher grade of centres, and these two centres exactly correspond with the internal organs and the mind, but not one centre has been found which controls all the other centres. So physiology cannot tell what unifies all these centres. Where do the centres get united? The centres in the brain are all different, and there is not one centre which controls all the other centres; therefore, so far as it goes, the Indian psychology stands unchallenged upon this point. We must have this unification, something upon which the sensations will be reflected, to form a complete whole. Until there is that something, I cannot have any idea of you, or a picture, or anything else. If we had not that unifying something, we would only see, then after a while breathe, then hear, and so on, and while I heard a man talking I would not see him at all, because all the centres are different.

This body is made of particles which we call matter, and it is dull and insentient. So is what the Vedantists call the fine body. The fine body, according to them, is a material but transparent body, made of very fine particles, so fine that no microscope can see them. What is the use of that? It is the receptacle of the fine forces. Just as this gross body is the receptacle of the gross forces, so the fine body is the receptacle of the fine forces, which we call thought, in its various modifications. First is the body, which is gross matter, with gross force. Force cannot exist without matter. It must require some matter to exist, so the grosser forces work in the body; and those very forces become finer; the very force which is working in a gross form, works in a fine form, and becomes thought. There is no distinction between them, simply one is the gross and the other the fine manifestation of the same thing. Neither is there any distinction between this fine body and the gross body. The fine body is also material, only very fine matter; and just as this gross body is the instrument that works the gross forces, so the fine body is the instrument that works the fine forces. From where do all these forces come? According to Vedanta philosophy, there are two things in nature, one of which they call Akasha, which is the substance, infinitely fine, and the other they call Prana, which is the force. Whatever you see, or feel, or hear, as air, earth, or anything, is material--the product of Akasha. It goes on and becomes finer and finer, or grosser and grosser, changing under the action of Prana. Like Akasha, Prana is omnipresent, and interpenetrating everything.

Akasha is like the water, and everything else in the universe is like blocks of ice, made out of that water, and floating in the water, and Prana is the power that changes this Akasha into all these various forms. The gross body is the instrument made out of Akasha, for the manifestation of Prana in gross forms, as muscular motion, or walking, sitting, talking, and so forth. That fine body is also made of Akasha, a very fine form of Akasha, for the manifestation of the same Prana in the finer form of thought. So, first there is this gross body. Beyond that is this fine body, and beyond that is the Jiva, the real man. Just as the nails can be pared off many times and yet are still part of our bodies, not different, so

1 is our gross body related to the fine. It is not that a man has a fine 2 and also a gross body; it is the one body only, the part which 3 endures longer is the fine body, and that which dissolves sooner is 4 the gross. Just as I can cut this nail any number of times, so, 5 millions of times I can shed this gross body, but the fine body will 6 remain. According to the dualists, this Jiva or the real man is very 7 fine, minute.

8 So far we see that man is a being, who has first a gross body 9 which dissolves very quickly, then a fine body which remains 10 through aeons, and then a Jiva. This Jiva, according to the Vedanta 11 philosophy, is eternal, just as God is eternal. Nature is also eternal, 12 but changefully eternal. The material of nature--Prana and Akasha-- 13 is eternal, but it is changing into different forms eternally. But the 14 Jiva is not manufactured either of Akasha or Prana; it is immaterial 15 and, therefore, will remain for ever. It is not the result of any 16 combination of Prana and Akasha, and whatever is not the result of 17 combination, will never be destroyed, because destruction is going 18 back to causes. The gross body is a compound of Akasha and Prana 19 and, therefore, will be decomposed. The fine body will also be 20 decomposed, after a long time, but the Jiva is simple, and will never 21 be destroyed.

22 It was never born for the same reason. Nothing simple can be 23 born. The same argument applies. That which is a compound only 24 can be born. The whole of nature comprising millions and millions 25 of souls is under the will of God. God is all-prevading, omniscient, 26 formless, and He is working through nature day and night. The 27 whole of it is under His control. He is the eternal Ruler. So say the 28 dualists. Then the question comes: If God is the ruler of this 29 universe, why did He create such a wicked universe, why must we 30 suffer so much? They say, it is not God's fault. It is our fault that we 31 suffer. Whatever we sow we reap. He did not do anything to punish 32 us. Man is born poor, or blind, or some other way. What is the 33 reason? He had done something before, he was born that way. The 34 Jiva has been existing for all time, was never created. It has been 35 doing all sorts of things all the time. Whatever we do reacts upon 36 us. If we do good, we shall have happiness, and if evil, unhappiness.
37 So the Jiva goes on enjoying and suffering, and doing all sorts of 38 things.

39 What comes after death? All these Vedanta philosophers 40 admit that this Jiva is by its own nature pure. But ignorance covers 41 its real nature, they say. As by evil deeds it has covered itself with 42 ignorance, so by good deeds it becomes conscious of its own nature 43 again. Just as it is eternal, so its nature is pure. The nature of every 44 being is pure.

45 When through good deeds all its sins and misdeeds have been 46 washed away, then the Jiva becomes pure again, and when it 47 becomes pure, it goes to what is called Devayana. Its organ of 48 speech enters the mind. You cannot think without words. Wherever 49 there is thought, there must be words. As words enter the mind, so 50 the mind is resolved into the Prana, and the Prana into the Jiva.
51 Then the Jiva gets quickly out of the body, and goes to the solar 52 regions. This universe has sphere after sphere. This earth is the 1 world sphere, in which are moons, suns, and stars. Beyond that 2 there is the solar sphere, and beyond that another which they call 3 the lunar sphere. Beyond that there is the sphere which they call 4 the sphere of lightning, the electric sphere, and when the Jiva goes 5 there, there comes another Jiva, already perfect, to receive it, and 6 takes it to another world, the highest heaven, called the 7 Brahmaloka, where the Jiva lives eternally, no more to be born or to 8 die. It enjoys through eternity, and gets all sorts of powers, except 9 the power of creation. There is only one ruler of the universe, and 10 that is God. No one can become God; the dualists maintain that if 11 you say you are God, it is a blasphemy. All powers except the 12 creative come to the Jiva, and if it likes to have bodies, and work in 13 different parts of the world, it can do so. If it orders all the gods to 14 come before it, if it wants its forefathers to come, they all appear at 15 its command. Such are its powers that it never feels any more pain, 16 and if it wants, it can live in the Brahmaloka through all eternity.

17 This is the highest man, who has attained the love of God, who has 18 become perfectly unselfish, perfectly purified, who has given up all 19 desires, and who does not want to do anything except worship and 20 love God.

21 There are others that are not so high, who do good works, but 22 want some reward. They say they will give so much to the poor, but 23 want to go to heaven in return. When they die, what becomes of 24 them? The speech enters the mind, the mind enters the Prana, the 25 Prana enters the Jiva, and the Jiva gets out, and goes to the lunar 26 sphere, where it has a very good time for a long period. There it 27 enjoys happiness, so long as the effect of its good deeds endures.
28 When the same is exhausted, it descends, and once again enters life 29 on earth according to its desires. In the lunar sphere the Jiva 30 becomes what we call a god, or what the Christians or 31 Mohammedans call an angel. These gods are the names of certain 32 positions; for instance, Indra, the king of the gods, is the name of a 33 position; thousands of men get to that position. When a virtuous 34 man who has performed the highest of Vedic rites dies, he becomes 35 a king of the gods; by that time the old king has gone down again, 36 and become man. Just as kings change here, so the gods, the Devas, 37 also have to die. In heaven they will all die. The only deathless place 38 is Brahmaloka, where alone there is no birth and death.

39 So the Jivas go to heaven, and have a very good time, except 40 now and then when the demons give them chase. In our mythology 41 it is said there are demons, who sometimes trouble the gods. In all 42 mythologies, you read how these demons and the gods fought, and 43 the demons sometimes conquered the gods, although many times, it 44 seems, the demons did not do so many wicked things as the gods.
45 In all mythologies, for instance, you find the Devas fond of women.
46 So after their reward is finished, they fall down again, come 47 through the clouds, through the rains, and thus get into some grain 48 or plant and find their way into the human body, when the grain or 49 plant is eaten by men. The father gives them the material out of 50 which to get a fitting body. When the material suits them no longer, 51 they have to manufacture other bodies. Now there are the very 52 wicked fellows, who do all sorts of diabolical things; they are born

1 again as animals, and if they are very bad, they are born as very 2 low animals, or become plants, or stones.

3 In the Deva form they make no Karma at all; only man makes 4 Karma. Karma means work which will produce effect. When a man 5 dies and becomes a Deva, he has only a period of pleasure, and 6 during that time, makes no fresh Karma; it is simply a reward for 7 his past good Karma. When the good Karma is worked out, then the 8 remaining Karma begins to take effect, and he comes down to 9 earth. He becomes man again, and if he does very good works, and 10 purifies himself, he goes to Brahmaloaka and comes back no more.

11 The animal is a state of sojourn for the Jiva evolving from 12 lower forms. In course of time the animal becomes man. It is a 13 significant fact that as the human population is increasing, the 14 animal population is decreasing. The animal souls are all becoming 15 men. So many species of animals have become men already. Where 16 else have they gone?

17 In the Vedas, there is no mention of hell. But our Puranas, the 18 later books of our scriptures, thought that no religion could be 19 complete, unless hells were attached to it, and so they invented all 20 sorts of hells. In some of these, men were sawed in half, and 21 continually tortured, but do not die. They are continually feeling 22 intense pain, but the books are merciful enough to say it is only for 23 a period. Bad Karma is worked out in that state and then they come 24 back on earth, and get another chance. So this human form is the 25 great chance. It is called the Karma-body, in which we decide our 26 fate. We are running in a huge circle, and this is the point in the 27 circle which determines the future. So this is considered the most 28 important form that there is. Man is greater than the gods.

29 So far with dualism, pure and simple. Next comes the higher 30 Vedantic philosophy which says, that this cannot be. God is both the 31 material and the efficient cause of this universe. If you say there is 32 a God who is an infinite Being, and a soul which is also infinite, and 33 a nature which is also infinite, you can go on multiplying infinities 34 without limit which is simply absurd; you smash all logic. So God is 35 both the material and the efficient cause of the universe; He 36 projects this universe out of Himself. Then how is it that God has 37 become these walls and this table, that God has become the pig, 38 and the murderer, and all the evil things in the world? We say that 39 God is pure. How can He become all these degenerate things? Our 40 answer is: just as I am a soul and have a body, and in a sense, this 41 body is not different from me, yet I, the real I, in fact, am not the 42 body. For instance, I say, I am a child, a young man, or an old man, 43 but my soul has not changed. It remains the same soul. Similarly, 44 the whole universe, comprising all nature and an infinite number of 45 souls, is, as it were, the infinite body of God. He is interpenetrating 46 the whole of it. He alone is unchangeable, but nature changes, and 47 soul changes. He is unaffected by changes in nature and soul. In 48 what way does nature change? In its forms; it takes fresh forms.
49 But the soul cannot change that way. The soul contracts and 50 expands in knowledge. It contracts by evil deeds. Those deeds 51 which contract the real natural knowledge and purity of the soul 52 are called evil deeds. Those deeds, again, which bring out the 1 natural glory of the soul, are called good deeds. All these souls 2 were pure, but they have become contracted; through the mercy of 3 God, and by doing good deeds, they will expand and recover their 4 natural purity. Everyone has the same chance, and in the long run, 5 must get out. But this universe will not cease, because it is eternal.

6 This is the second theory. The first is called dualism. The second 7 holds that there are God, soul, and nature, and soul and nature
8 form the body of God, and, therefore, these three form one unit. It 9 represents a higher stage of religious development and goes by the 10 name of qualified monism. In dualism, the universe is conceived as 11 a large machine set going by God, while in qualified monism, it is 12 conceived as an organism, interpenetrated by the Divine Self.

13 The last are the non-dualists. They raise the question also, 14 that God must be both the material and the efficient cause of this 15 universe. As such, God has become the whole of this universe and 16 there is no going against it. And when these other people say that 17 God is the soul, and the universe is the body, and the body is 18 changing, but God is changeless, the non-dualists say, all this is 19 nonsense. In that case what is the use of calling God the material 20 cause of this universe? The material cause is the cause become 21 effect; the effect is nothing but the cause in another form. Wherever 22 you see an effect, it is the cause reproduced. If the universe is the 23 effect, and God the cause, it must be the reproduction of God. If you 24 say that the universe is the body of God, and that the body becomes 25 contracted and fine and becomes the cause, and out of that the 26 universe is evolved, the non-dualists say that it is God Himself who 27 has become this universe. Now comes a very fine question. If this 28 God has become this universe, you and all these things are God.
29 Certainly. This book is God, everything is God. My body is God, and 30 my mind is God, and my soul is God. Then why are there so many 31 Jivas? Has God become divided into millions of Jivas? Does that one 32 God turn into millions of Jivas? Then how did it become so? How 33 can that infinite power and substance, the one Being of the 34 universe, become divided? It is impossible to divide infinity. How 35 can that pure Being become this universe? If He has become the 36 universe, He is changeful, and if He is changeful, He is part of 37 nature, and whatever is nature and changeful is born and dies. If 38 our God is changeful, He must die some day. Take note of that.
39 Again, how much of God has become this universe? If you say X (the 40 unknown algebraical quantity), then God is God minus X now, and, 41 therefore, not the same God as before this creation, because so 42 much has become this universe.

43 So the non-dualists say, "This universe does not exist at all; it 44 is all illusion. The whole of this universe, these Devas, gods, angels, 45 and all the other beings born and dying, all this infinite number of 46 souls coming up and going down, are all dreams." There is no Jiva 47 at all. How can there be many? It is the one Infinity. As the one sun, 48 reflected on various pieces of water, appears to be many, and 49 millions of globules of water reflect so many millions of suns, and in 50 each globule will be a perfect image of the sun, yet there is only 51 one sun, so are all these Jivas but reflections in different minds.
52 These different minds are like so many different globules, reflecting

1 this one Being. God is being reflected in all these different Jivas.
2 But a dream cannot be without a reality, and that reality is that one 3 Infinite Existence. You, as body, mind, or soul, are a dream, but 4 what you really are, is Existence, Knowledge, Bliss. You are the God
5 of this universe. You are creating the whole universe and drawing it 6 in. Thus says the Advaitist. So all these births and rebirths, coming 7 and going, are the figments of Maya. You are infinite. Where can 8 you go? The sun, the moon, and the whole universe are but drops in 9 your transcendent nature. How can you be born or die? I never was 10 born, never will be born. I never had father or mother, friends or 11 foes, for I am Existence, Knowledge, Bliss Absolute. I am He, I am 12 He. So, what is the goal, according to this philosophy? That those 13 who receive this knowledge are one with the universe. For them, all 14 heavens and even Brahmaloaka are destroyed, the whole dream 15 vanishes, and they find themselves the eternal God of the universe.
16 They attain their real individuality, with its infinite knowledge and 17 bliss, and become free. Pleasures in little things cease. We are 18 finding pleasure in this little body, in this little individuality. How 19 much greater the pleasure when this whole universe is my body! If 20 there is pleasure in one body, how much more when all bodies are 21 mine! Then is freedom attained. And this is called Advaita, the non-22 dualistic Vedanta philosophy.

23 These are the three steps which Vedanta philosophy has 24 taken, and we cannot go any further, because we cannot go beyond 25 unity. When a science reaches a unity, it cannot by any manner of 26 means go any further. You cannot go beyond this idea of the 27 Absolute.

28 All people cannot take up this Advaita philosophy; it is hard.
29 First of all, it is very hard to understand it intellectually. It requires 30 the sharpest of intellects, a bold understanding. Secondly, it does 31 not suit the vast majority of people. So there are these three steps.
32 Begin with the first one. Then by thinking of that and understanding 33 it, the second will open itself. Just as a race advances, so individuals 34 have to advance. The steps which the human race has taken to 35 reach to the highest pinnacles of religious thought, every individual 36 will have to take. Only, while the human race took millions of years 37 to reach from one step to another, individuals may live the whole 38 life of the human race in a much shorter duration. But each one of 39 us will have to go through these steps. Those of you who are non-40 dualists look back to the period of your lives when you were strong 41 dualists. As soon as you think you are a body and a mind, you will 42 have to take the whole of this dream. If you take one portion, you 43 must take the whole. The man who says, here is this world, and 44 there is no (Personal) God, is a fool; because if there is a world, 45 there will have to be a cause, and that is what is called God. You 46 cannot have an effect without knowing that there is a cause. God 47 will only vanish when this world vanishes; then you will become 48 God (Absolute), and this world will be no longer for you. So long as 49 the dream that you are a body exists, you are bound to see yourself 50 as being born and dying; but as soon as that dream vanishes, so will 51 the dream vanish that you are being born and dying, and so will the 52 other dream that there is a universe vanish. That very thing which 1 we now see as the universe will appear to us as God (Absolute), and 2 that very God who has so long been external will appear to be 3 internal, as our own Self.

STEPS TO REALISATION

First among the qualification required of the aspirant for Jnana, or wisdom, come Shama and Dama, which may be taken together. They mean the keeping of the organs in their own centres without allowing them to stray out. I shall explain to you first what the word "organ" means. Here are the eyes; the eyes are not the organs of vision but only the instruments. Unless the organs also are present, I cannot see, even if I have eyes. But, given both the organs and the instruments, unless the mind attaches itself to these two, no vision takes place. So, in each act of perception, three things are necessary--first, the external instruments, then, the internal organs, and lastly, the mind. If any one of them be absent, then there will be no perception. Thus the mind acts through two agencies--one external, and the other internal. When I see things, my mind goes out, becomes externalised; but suppose I close my eyes and begin to think, the mind does not go out, it is internally active. But, in either case, there is activity of the organs. When I look at you and speak to you, both the organs and the instruments are active. When I close my eyes and begin to think, the organs are active, but not the instruments. Without the activity of these organs, there will be no thought. You will find that none of you can think without some symbol. In the case of the blind man, he has also to think through some figure. The organs of sight and hearing are generally very active. You must bear in mind that by the word "organ" is meant the nerve centre in the brain. The eyes and ears are only the instruments of seeing and hearing, and the organs are inside. If the organs are destroyed by any means, even if the eyes or the ears be there, we shall not see or hear. So in order to control the mind, we must first be able to control these organs. To restrain the mind from wandering outward or inward, and keep the organs in their respective centres, is what is meant by the words Shama and Dama. Shama consists in not allowing the mind to externalise, and Dama, in checking the external instruments.

Now comes Uparati which consists in not thinking of things of the senses. Most of our time is spent in thinking about sense-objects, things which we have seen, or we have heard, which we shall see or shall hear, things which we have eaten, or are eating, or shall eat, places where we have lived, and so on. We think of them or talk of them most of our time. One who wishes to be a Vedantin must give up this habit.

Then comes the next preparation (it is a hard task to be a philosopher!), Titiksha, the most difficult of all. It is nothing less than the ideal forbearance--"Resist not evil." This requires a little explanation. We may not resist an evil, but at the same time we may feel very miserable. A man may say very harsh things to me, and I may not outwardly hate him for it, may not answer him back, and may restrain myself from apparently getting angry, but anger and hatred may be in my mind, and I may feel very badly towards that man. That is not non-resistance; I should be without any feeling of hatred or anger, without any thought of resistance; my mind must

1 then be as calm as if nothing had happened. And only when I have 2 got to that state, have I attained to non-resistance, and not before.
3 Forbearance of all misery, without even a thought of resisting or 4 driving it out, without even any painful feeling in the mind, or any 5 remorse--this is Titiksha. Suppose I do not resist, and some great 6 evil comes thereby; if I have Titiksha, I should not feel any remorse
7 for not having resisted. When the mind has attained to that state, it 8 has become established in Titiksha. People in India do 9 extraordinary things in order to practise this Titiksha. They bear 10 tremendous heat and cold without caring, they do not even care for 11 snow, because they take no thought for the body; it is left to itself, 12 as if it were a foreign thing.

13 The next qualification required is Shraddha, faith. One must 14 have tremendous faith in religion and God. Until one has it, one 15 cannot aspire to be a Jnani. A great sage once told me that not one 16 in twenty millions in this world believed in God. I asked him why, 17 and he told me, "Suppose there is a thief in this room, and he gets 18 to know that there is a mass of gold in the next room, and only a 19 very thin partition between the two rooms; what will be the 20 condition of that thief?" I answered, "He will not be able to sleep at 21 all; his brain will be actively thinking of some means of getting at 22 the gold, and he will think of nothing else." Then he replied, "Do 23 you believe that a man could believe in God and not go mad to get 24 Him? If a man sincerely believes that there is that immense, infinite 25 mine of Bliss, and that It can be reached, would not that man go 26 mad in his struggle to reach It?" Strong faith in God and the 27 consequent eagerness to reach Him constitute Shraddha.

28 Then comes Samadhana, or constant practice, to hold the 29 mind in God. Nothing is done in a day. Religion cannot be 30 swallowed in the form of a pill. It requires hard and constant 31 practice. The mind can be conquered only by slow and steady
32 practice.

33 Next is Mumukshutva, the intense desire to be free. Those of 34 you who have read Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia remember his 35 translation of the first sermon of Buddha, where Buddha says,

36 "Ye suffer from yourselves. None else compels.

37 None other holds you that ye live and die,

38 And whirl upon the wheel, and hug and kiss

39 Its spokes of agony,

40 Its tire of tears, its nave of nothingness."

41 All the misery we have is of our own choosing; such is our 42 nature. The old Chinaman, who having been kept in prison for sixty 43 years was released on the coronation of a new emperor, exclaimed, 44 when he came out, that he could not live; he must go back to his 45 horrible dungeon among the rats and mice; he could not bear the 46 light. So he asked them to kill him or send him back to the prison, 47 and he was sent back. Exactly similar is the condition of all men. We 48 run headlong after all sorts of misery, and are unwilling to be freed 49 from them. Every day we run after pleasure, and before we reach it,

1 we find it is gone, it has slipped through our fingers. Still we do not 2 cease from our mad pursuit, but on and on we go, blinded fools that 3 we are.

4 In some oil mills in India, bullocks are used that go round and 5 round to grind the oil-seed. There is a yoke on the bullock's neck.
6 They have a piece of wood protruding from the yoke, and on that is 7 fastened a wisp of straw. The bullock is blindfolded in such a way 8 that it can only look forward, and so it stretches its neck to get at 9 the straw; and in doing so, it pushes the piece of wood out a little 10 further; and it makes another attempt with the same result, and yet 11 another, and so on. It never catches the straw, but goes round and 12 round in the hope of getting it, and in so doing, grinds out the oil. In 13 the same way you and I who are born slaves to nature, money and 14 wealth, wives and children, are always chasing a wisp of straw, a 15 mere chimera, and are going through an innumerable round of lives 16 without obtaining what we seek. The great dream is love; we are all 17 going to love and be loved, we are all going to be happy and never 18 meet with misery, but the more we go towards happiness, the more 19 it goes away from us. Thus the world is going on, society goes on, 20 and we, blinded slaves, have to pay for it without knowing. Study 21 your own lives, and find how little of happiness there is in them, and 22 how little in truth you have gained in the course of this wild-goose 23 chase of the world.

24 Do you remember the story of Solon and Croesus? The king 25 said to the great sage that Asia Minor was a very happy place. And 26 the sage asked him, "Who is the happiest man? I have not seen 27 anyone very happy." "Nonsense," said Croesus, "I am the happiest 28 man in the world." "Wait, sir, till the end of your life; don't be in a 29 hurry," replied the sage and went away. In course of time that king 30 was conquered by the Persians, and they ordered him to be burnt 31 alive. The funeral pyre was prepared and when poor Croesus saw it, 32 he cried aloud "Solon! Solon!" On being asked to whom he referred, 33 he told his story, and the Persian emperor was touched, and saved 34 his life.

35 Such is the life-story of each one of us; such is the 36 tremendous power of nature over us. It repeatedly kicks us away, 37 but still we pursue it with feverish excitement. We are always 38 hoping against hope this hope, this chimera maddens us; we are 39 always hoping for happiness.

40 There was a great king in ancient India who was once asked 41 four questions, of which one was: "What is the most wonderful 42 thing in the world?" "Hope," was the answer. This is the most 43 wonderful thing. Day and night we see people dying around us, and 44 yet we think we shall not die; we never think that we shall die, or 45 that we shall suffer. Each man thinks that success will be his, 46 hoping against hope, against all odds, against all mathematical 47 reasoning. Nobody is ever really happy here. If a man be wealthy 48 and have plenty to eat, his digestion is out of order, and he cannot 49 eat. If a man's digestion be good, and he have the digestive power 50 of a cormorant, he has nothing to put into his mouth. If he be rich, 51 he has no children. If he be hungry and poor, he has a whole 52 regiment of children, and does not know what to do with them. Why

1 is it so? Because happiness and misery are the obverse and reverse 2 of the same coin; he who takes happiness, must take misery also.
3 We all have this foolish idea that we can have happiness without 4 misery, and it has taken such possession of us that we have no 5 control over the senses.

6 When I was in Boston, a young man came up to me, and gave 7 me a scrap of paper of which he had written a name and address, 8 followed by these words: "All the wealth and all the happiness of 9 the world are yours, if you only know how to get them. If you come 10 to me, I will teach you how to get them. Charge, $5." He gave me 11 this and said, "What do you think of this?" I said, "Young man, why 12 don't you get the money to print this? You have not even enough 13 money to get this printed!" He did not understand this. He was 14 infatuated with the idea that he could get immense wealth and 15 happiness without any trouble. There are two extremes into which 16 men are running; one is extreme optimism, when everything is rosy 17 and nice and good; the other, extreme pessimism, when everything 18 seems to be against them. The majority of men have more or less 19 undeveloped brains. One in a million we see with a well-developed 20 brain; the rest either have peculiar idiosyncrasies, or are 21 monomaniacs.

22 Naturally we run into extremes. When we are healthy and 23 young, we think that all the wealth of the world will be ours, and 24 when later we get kicked about by society like footballs and get 25 older, we sit in a corner and croak and throw cold water on the 26 enthusiasm of others. Few men know that with pleasure there is 27 pain, and with pain, pleasure; and as pain is disgusting, so is 28 pleasure, as it is the twin brother of pain. It is derogatory to the 29 glory of man that he should be going after pain, and equally 30 derogatory, that he should be going after pleasure. Both should be 31 turned aside by men whose reason is balanced. Why will not men 32 seek freedom from being played upon?

33 This moment we are whipped, and when we begin to weep, 34 nature gives us a dollar; again we are whipped, and when we weep, 35 nature gives us a piece of gingerbread, and we begin to laugh 36 again.

37 The sage wants liberty; he finds that sense-objects are all vain
38 and that there is no end to pleasures and pains. How many rich 39 people in the world want to find fresh pleasures! All pleasures are 40 old, and they want new ones. Do you not see how many foolish 41 things they are inventing every day, just to titillate the nerves for a 42 moment, and that done, how there comes a reaction? The majority 43 of people are just like a flock of sheep. If the leading sheep falls into 44 a ditch, all the rest follow and break their necks. In the same way, 45 what one leading member of a society does, all the others do, 46 without thinking what they are doing. When a man begins to see 47 the vanity of worldly things, he will feel he ought not to be thus 48 played upon or borne along by nature. That is slavery. If a man has 49 a few kind words said to him, he begins to smile, and when he 50 hears a few harsh words, he begins to weep. He is a slave to a bit of 51 bread, to a breath of air; a slave to dress, a slave to patriotism, to 52 country, to name, and to fame. He is thus in the midst of slavery and

1 the real man has become buried within, through his bondage. What 2 you call man is a slave. When one realises all this slavery, then 3 comes the desire to be free; an intense desire comes. If a piece of 4 burning charcoal be placed on a man's head, see how he struggles
5 to throw it off. Similar will be the struggles for freedom of a man 6 who really understands that he is a slave of nature.

7 We have now seen what Mumukshutva, or the desire to be 8 free, is. The next training is also a very difficult one. Nityanitya-9 Viveka--discriminating between that which is true and that which is 10 untrue, between the eternal and the transitory. God alone is 11 eternal, everything else is transitory. Everything dies; the angels 12 die, men die, animals die, earths die, sun, moon, and stars, all die; 13 everything undergoes constant change. The mountains of today 14 were the oceans of yesterday and will be oceans tomorrow.
15 Everything is in a state of flux. The whole universe is a mass of 16 change. But there is One who never changes, and that is God; and 17 the nearer we get to Him, the less will be the change for us, the 18 less will nature be able to work on us; and when we reach Him, and 19 stand with Him, we shall conquer nature, we shall be masters of 20 these phenomena of nature, and they will have no effect on us.

21 You see, if we really have undergone the above discipline, we 22 really do not require anything else in this world. All knowledge is 23 within us. All perfection is there already in the soul. But this 24 perfection has been covered up by nature; layer after layer of 25 nature is covering this purity of the soul. What have we to do?
26 Really we do not develop our souls at all. What can develop the 27 perfect? We simply take the veil off; and the soul manifests itself in 28 its pristine purity, its natural, innate freedom.

29 Now begins the inquiry: Why is this discipline so necessary?
30 Because religion is not attained through the ears, nor through the 31 eyes, nor yet through the brain. No scriptures can make us 32 religious. We may study all the books that are in the world, yet we 33 may not understand a word of religion or of God. We may talk all 34 our lives and yet may not be the better for it; we may be the most 35 intellectual people the world ever saw, and yet we may not come to 36 God at all. On the other hand, have you not seen what irreligious 37 men have been produced from the most intellectual training? It is 38 one of the evils of your Western civilisation that you are after 39 intellectual education alone, and take no care of the heart. It only 40 makes men ten times more selfish, and that will be your 41 destruction. When there is conflict between the heart and the brain, 42 let the heart be followed, because intellect has only one state, 43 reason, and within that, intellect works, and cannot get beyond. It is 44 the heart which takes one to the highest plane, which intellect can 45 never reach; it goes beyond intellect, and reaches to what is called 46 inspiration. Intellect can never become inspired; only the heart 47 when it is enlightened, becomes inspired. An intellectual, heartless 48 man never becomes an inspired man. It is always the heart that 49 speaks in the man of love; it discovers a greater instrument than 50 intellect can give you, the instrument of inspiration. Just as the 51 intellect is the instrument of knowledge, so is the heart the 52 instrument of inspiration. In a lower state it is a much weaker

1 instrument than intellect. An ignorant man knows nothing, but he is 2 a little emotional by nature. Compare him with a great professor-- 3 what wonderful power the latter possesses! But the professor is 4 bound by his intellect, and he can be a devil and an intellectual man 5 at the same time; but the man of heart can never be a devil; no man 6 with emotion was ever a devil. Properly cultivated, the heart can be 7 changed, and will go beyond intellect; it will be changed into 8 inspiration. Man will have to go beyond intellect in the end. The 9 knowledge of man, his powers of perception, of reasoning and 10 intellect and heart, all are busy churning this milk of the world. Out 11 of long churning comes butter, and this butter is God. Men of heart 12 get the "butter", and the "buttermilk" is left for the intellectual.

13 These are all preparations for the heart, for that love, for that 14 intense sympathy appertaining to the heart. It is not at all 15 necessary to be educated or learned to get to God. A sage once told 16 me, "To kill others one must be equipped with swords and shields, 17 but to commit suicide a needle is sufficient; so to teach others, 18 much intellect and learning are necessary, but not so for your own 19 self-illumination." Are you pure? If you are pure, you will reach God.
20 "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." If you are 21 not pure, and you know all the sciences in the world, that will not 22 help you at all; you may be buried in all the books you read, but that 23 will not be of much use. It is the heart that reaches the goal. Follow 24 the heart. A pure heart sees beyond the intellect; it gets inspired; it 25 knows things that reason can never know, and whenever there is 26 conflict between the pure heart and the intellect, always side with 27 the pure heart, even if you think what your heart is doing is 28 unreasonable. When it is desirous of doing good to others, your 29 brain may tell you that it is not politic to do so, but follow your 30 heart, and you will find that you make less mistakes than by 31 following your intellect. The pure heart is the best mirror for the 32 reflection of truth, so all these disciplines are for the purification of 33 the heart. And as soon as it is pure, all truths flash upon it in a 34 minute; all truth in the universe will manifest in your heart, if you 35 are sufficiently pure.

36 The great truths about atoms, and the finer elements, and the 37 fine perceptions of men, were discovered ages ago by men who 38 never saw a telescope, or a microscope, or a laboratory. How did 39 they know all these things? It was through the heart; they purified 40 the heart. It is open to us to do the same today; it is the culture of 41 the heart, really, and not that of the intellect that will lessen the 42 misery of the world.

43 Intellect has been cultured with the result that hundreds of 44 sciences have been discovered, and their effect has been that the 45 few have made slaves of the many--that is all the good that has 46 been done. Artificial wants have been created; and every poor man, 47 whether he has money or not, desires to have those wants satisfied, 48 and when he cannot, he struggles, and dies in the struggle. This is 49 the result. Through the intellect is not the way to solve the problem 50 of misery, but through the heart. If all this vast amount of effort had 51 been spent in making men purer, gentler, more forbearing, this 52 world would have a thousandfold more happiness than it has today.

1 Always cultivate the heart; through the heart the Lord speaks, and 2 through the intellect you yourself speak.

3 You remember in the Old Testament where Moses was told,
4 "Take off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou 5 standest is holy ground." We must always approach the study of 6 religion with that reverent attitude. He who comes with a pure 7 heart and a reverent attitude, his heart will be opened; the doors 8 will open for him, and he will see the truth.

9 If you come with intellect only, you can have a little 10 intellectual gymnastics, intellectual theories, but not truth. Truth 11 has such a face that any one who sees that face becomes convinced.
12 The sun does not require any torch to show it; the sun is self-13 effulgent. If truth requires evidence, what will evidence that 14 evidence? If something is necessary as witness for truth, where is 15 the witness for that witness? We must approach religion with 16 reverence and with love, and our heart will stand up and say, this is 17 truth, and this is untruth.

18 The field of religion is beyond our senses, beyond even our 19 consciousness. We cannot sense God. Nobody has seen God with 20 his eyes or ever will see; nobody has God in his consciousness. I am 21 not conscious of God, or you, or anybody. Where is God? Where is 22 the field of religion? It is beyond the senses, beyond consciousness.
23 Consciousness is only one of the many planes in which we work;
24 you will have to transcend the field of consciousness, to go beyond 25 the senses, approach nearer and nearer to your own centre, and as 26 you do that, you will approach nearer and nearer to God. What is 27 the proof of God? Direct perception, Pratyaksha. The proof of this 28 wall is that I perceive it. God has been perceived that way by 29 thousands before, and will be perceived by all who want to perceive 30 Him. But this perception is no sense-perception at all; it is 31 supersensuous, superconscious, and all this training is needed to 32 take us beyond the senses. By means of all sorts of past work and 33 bondages we are being dragged downwards; these preparations 34 will make us pure and light. Bondages will fall off by themselves, 35 and we shall be buoyed up beyond this plane of sense-perception to 36 which we are tied down, and then we shall see, and hear, and feel 37 things which men in the three ordinary states (viz. waking, dream, 38 and sleep) neither feel, nor see, nor hear. Then we shall speak a 39 strange language, as it were, and the world will not understand us, 40 because it does not know anything but the senses. True religion is 41 entirely transcendental. Every being that is in the universe has the 42 potentiality of transcending the senses; even the little worm will 43 one day transcend the senses and reach God. No life will be a 44 failure; there is no such thing as failure in the universe. A hundred 45 times man will hurt himself, a thousand times he will tumble, but in 46 the end he will realise that he is God. We know there is no progress 47 in a straight line. Every soul moves, as it were, in a circle, and will 48 have to complete it, and no soul can go so low but there will come a 49 time when it will have to go upwards. No one will be lost. We are all 50 projected from one common centre, which is God. The highest as 51 well as the lowest life God ever projected, will come back to the 52 Father of all lives. "From whom all beings are projected, in whom 1 all live, and unto whom they all return; that is God."

VEDANTA AND PRIVILEGE

(Delivered in London)

We have nearly finished the metaphysical portion of the Advaita. One point, and perhaps the most difficult to understand, remains. We have seen so far that, according to the Advaita theory, all we see around us, and the whole universe in fact, is the evolution of that one Absolute. This is called, in Sanskrit, Brahman. The Absolute has become changed into the whole of nature. But here comes a difficulty. How is it possible for the Absolute to change? What made the Absolute to change? By its very definition, the Absolute is unchangeable. Change of the unchangeable would be a contradiction. The same difficulty applies to those who believe in a Personal God. For instance, how did this creation arise? It could not have arisen out of nothing; that would be a contradiction--something coming out of nothing can never be. The effect is the cause in another form. Out of the seed, the big tree grows; the tree is the seed, plus air and water taken in. And if there were any method of testing the amount of the air, and water taken to make the body of the tree, we should find that it is exactly the same as the effect, the tree. Modern science has proved beyond doubt that it is so, that the cause is the effect in another form. The adjustment of the parts of the cause changes and becomes the effect. So, we have to avoid this difficulty of having a universe without a cause, and we are bound to admit that God has become the universe.

But we have avoided one difficulty, and landed in another. In every theory, the idea of God comes through the idea of unchangeability. We have traced historically how the one idea which we have always in mind in the search for God, even in its crudest form, is the idea of freedom; and the idea of freedom and of unchangeability is one and the same. It is the free alone which never changes, and the unchangeable alone which is free; for change is produced by something exterior to a thing, or within itself, which is more powerful than the surroundings. Everything which can be changed is necessarily bound by certain cause or causes, which cannot be unchangeable. Supposing God has become this universe, then God is here and has changed. And suppose the Infinite has become this finite universe, so much of the Infinite has gone, and, therefore, God is Infinite minus the universe. A changeable God would be no God. To avoid this doctrine of pantheism, there is a very bold theory of the Vedanta. It is that this universe, as we know and think it, does not exist, that the unchangeable has not changed, that the whole of this universe is mere appearance and not reality, that this idea of parts, and little beings, and differentiations is only apparent, not the nature of the thing itself. God has not changed at all, and has not become the universe at all. We see God as the universe, because we have to look through time, space, and causation. It is time, space, and causation that make this differentiation apparently, but not really. This is a very bold theory indeed. Now this theory ought to be explained a little more clearly. It does not mean idealism in the sense in which it is generally understood. It does not say that this universe does not exist; it exists, but at the same time it is not what

1 we take it for. To illustrate this, the example given by the Advaita
2 philosophy is well known. In the darkness of night, a stump of a 3 tree is looked upon as a ghost by some superstitious person, as a 4 policeman by a robber, as a friend by some one waiting for his 5 companion. In all these cases, the stump of the tree did not change, 6 but there are apparent changes, and these changes were in the 7 minds of those who saw it. From the subjective side we can 8 understand it better through psychology. There is something 9 outside of ourselves, the true nature of which is unknown and 10 unknowable to us; let us call it x . And there is something inside, 11 which is also unknown and unknowable to us; let us call it y . The 12 knowable is a combination of x plus y , and everything that we 13 know, therefore, must have two parts, the x outside, and the y 14 inside; and the x plus y is the thing we know. So, every form in the 15 universe is partly our creation and partly something outside. Now 16 what the Vedanta holds is that this x and this y are one and the 17 same.

18 A very similar conclusion has been arrived at by some 19 western philosophers, especially by Herbert Spencer, and some 20 other modern philosophers. When it is said that the same power 21 which is manifesting itself in the flower is welling up in my own 22 consciousness, it is the very same idea which the Vedantist wants to 23 preach, that the reality of the external world and the reality of the 24 internal world are one and the same. Even the ideas of the internal 25 and external exist by differentiation and do not exist in the things 26 themselves. For instance, if we develop another sense, the whole 27 world will change for us, showing that it is the subject which will 28 change the object. If I change, the external world changes. The 29 theory of the Vedanta, therefore, comes to this, that you and I and 30 everything in the universe are that Absolute, not parts, but the 31 whole. You are the whole of that Absolute, and so are all others, 32 because the idea of part cannot come into it. These divisions, these 33 limitations, are only apparent, not in the thing itself. I am complete 34 and perfect, and I was never bound, boldly preaches the Vedanta. If 35 you think you are bound, bound you will remain; if you know that 36 you are free, free you are. Thus the end and aim of this philosophy 37 is to let us know that we have been free always, and shall remain 38 free for ever. We never change, we never die, and we are never 39 born. What are all these changes then? What becomes of this 40 phenomenal world? This world is admitted as an apparent world, 41 bound by time, space, and causation, and it comes to what is called 42 the Vivarta-vada in Sanskrit, evolution of nature, and manifestation 43 of the Absolute. The Absolute does not change, or re-evolve. In the 44 little amoeba is that infinite perfection latent. It is called amoeba 45 from its amoeba covering, and from the amoeba to the perfect man 46 the change is not in what is inside- that remains the same, 47 unchangeable--but the change occurs in the covering.

48 There is a screen here, and some beautiful scenery outside.
49 There is a small hole in the screen through which we can only catch 50 a glimpse of it. Suppose this hole begins to increase; as it grows 51 larger and larger, more and more of the scenery comes into view, 52 and when the screen has vanished, we come face to face with the 1 whole of the scenery. This scene outside is the soul, and the screen

2 between us and the scenery is Maya--time, space, and causation.
3 There is a little hole somewhere, through which I can catch only a 4 glimpse of the soul. When the hole is bigger, I see more and more,
5 and when the screen has vanished, I know that I am the soul. So 6 changes in the universe are not in the Absolute; they are in nature.
7 Nature evolves more and more, until the Absolute manifests Itself.
8 In everyone It exists; in some It is manifested more than in others.
9 The whole universe is really one. In speaking of the soul, to say that 10 one is superior to another has no meaning. In speaking of the soul, 11 to say that man is superior to the animal or the plant, has no
12 meaning; the whole universe is one. In plants the obstacle to soul-13 manifestation is very great; in animals a little less; and in man still 14 less; in cultured, spiritual men still less; and in perfect men, it has 15 vanished altogether. All our struggles, exercises, pains, pleasures, 16 tears, and smiles, all that we do and think tend towards that goal, 17 the tearing up of the screen, making the hole bigger, thinning the 18 layers that remain between the manifestation and the reality 19 behind. Our work, therefore, is not to make the soul free, but to get 20 rid of the bondages. The sun is covered by layers of clouds, but 21 remains unaffected by them. The work of the wind is to drive the 22 clouds away, and the more the clouds disappear, the more the light 23 of the sun appears. There is no change whatsoever in the soul-- 24 Infinite, Absolute, Eternal, Knowledge, Bliss, and Existence. Neither 25 can there be birth or death for the soul. Dying, and being born, 26 reincarnation, and going to heaven, cannot be for the soul. These 27 are different appearances, different mirages, different dreams. If a 28 man who is dreaming of this world now dreams of wicked thoughts 29 and wicked deeds, after a certain time the thought of that very 30 dream will produce the next dream. He will dream that he is in a 31 horrible place, being tortured. The man who is dreaming good 32 thoughts and good deeds, after that period of dream is over, will 33 dream he is in a better place; and so on from dream to dream. But 34 the time will come when the whole of this dream will vanish. To 35 everyone of us there must come a time when the whole universe 36 will be found to have been a mere dream, when we shall find that 37 the soul is infinitely better than its surroundings. In this struggle 38 through what we call our environments, there will come a time 39 when we shall find that these environments were almost zero in 40 comparison with the power of the soul. It is only a question of time, 41 and time is nothing in the Infinite. It is a drop in the ocean. We can 42 afford to wait and be calm.

43 Consciously or unconsciously, therefore, the whole universe is 44 going towards that goal. The moon is struggling to get out of the 45 sphere of attraction of other bodies, and will come out of it, in the 46 long run. But those who consciously strive to get free hasten the 47 time. One benefit from this theory we practically see is that the idea 48 of a real universal love is only possible from this point of view. All 49 are our fellow passengers, our fellow travellers--all life, plants, 50 animals; not only my brother man, but my brother brute, my 51 brother plant; not only my brother the good, but my brother the 52 evil, my brother the spiritual and my brother the wicked. They are 53 all going to the same goal. All are in the same stream, each is 1 hurrying towards that infinite freedom. We cannot stay the course, 2 none can stay it, none can go back, however he may try; he will be 3 driven forward, and in the end he will attain to freedom. Creation 4 means the struggle to get back to freedom, the centre of our being, 5 whence we have been thrown off, as it were. The very fact that we 6 are here, shows that we are going towards the centre, and the 7 manifestation of this attraction towards the centre is what we call 8 love.

9 The question is asked: From what does this universe come, is 10 what does it remain, to what does it go back? And the answer is: 11 From Love it comes, in love it remains, back it goes unto love. Thus 12 we are in a position to understand that, whether one likes it or not, 13 there is no going back for anyone. Everyone has to get to the 14 centre, however he may struggle to go back. Yet if we struggle 15 consciously, knowingly, it will smooth the passage, it will lessen the 16 jar, and quicken the time. Another conclusion we naturally arrive at 17 from this is that all knowledge and all power are within and not 18 without. What we call nature is a reflecting glass--that is all the use 19 of nature--and all knowledge is this reflection of the within on this 20 glass of nature. What we call powers, secrets of nature, and force, 21 are all within. In the external world are only a series of changes.
22 There is no knowledge in nature; all knowledge comes from the 23 human soul. Man manifests knowledge, discovers it within himself, 24 which is pre-existing through eternity. Everyone is the embodiment 25 of Knowledge, everyone is the embodiment of eternal Bliss, and 26 eternal Existence. The ethical effect is just the same, as we have 27 seen elsewhere, with regard to equality.

28 But the idea of privilege is the bane of human life. Two forces, 29 as it were, are constantly at work, one making caste, and the other 30 breaking caste; in other words, the one making for privilege, the 31 other breaking down privilege. And whenever privilege is broken 32 down, more and more light and progress come to a race. This 33 struggle we see all around us. Of course there is first the brutal 34 idea of privilege, that of the strong over the weak. There is the 35 privilege of wealth. If a man has more money than another, he 36 wants a little privilege over those who have less. There is the still 37 subtler and more powerful privilege of intellect; because one man 38 knows more than others, he claims more privilege. And the last of 39 all, and the worst, because the most tyrannical, is the privilege of 40 spirituality. If some persons think they know more of spirituality, of 41 God, they claim a superior privilege over everyone else. They say, 42 "Come down and worship us, ye common herds; we are the 43 messengers of God, and you have to worship us." None can be 44 Vedantists, and at the same time admit of privilege to anyone, 45 either mental, physical, or spiritual; absolutely no privilege for 46 anyone. The same power is in every man, the one manifesting more, 47 the other less; the same potentiality is in everyone. Where is the 48 claim to privilege? All knowledge is in every soul, even in the most 49 ignorant; he has not manifested it, but, perhaps, he has not had the 50 opportunity, the environments were not, perhaps, suitable to him.
51 When he gets the opportunity, he will manifest it. The idea that one 52 man is born superior to another has no meaning in the Vedanta;

1 that between two nations one is superior and the other inferior has 2 no meaning whatsoever. Put them in the same circumstances, and 3 see whether the same intelligence comes out or not. Before that 4 you have no right to say that one nation is superior to another. And 5 as to spirituality, no privilege should be claimed there. It is a 6 privilege to serve mankind, for this is the worship of God. God is 7 here, in all these human souls. He is the soul of man. What privilege 8 can men ask? There are no special messengers of God, never were, 9 and never can be. All beings, great or small, are equally 10 manifestations of God; the difference is only in the manifestation.
11 The same eternal message, which has been eternally given, comes 12 to them little by little. The eternal message has been written in the 13 heart of every being; it is there already, and all are struggling to 14 express it. Some, in suitable circumstances, express it a little better 15 than others, but as bearers of the message they are all one. What 16 claim to superiority is there? The most ignorant man, the most 17 ignorant child, is as great a messenger of God as any that ever 18 existed, and as great as any that are yet to come. For the infinite 19 message is there imprinted once for all in the heart of every being.
20 Wherever there is a being, that being contains the infinite message 21 of the Most High. It is there. The work of the Advaita, therefore, is 22 to break down all these privileges. It is the hardest work of all, and 23 curious to say, it has been less active than anywhere else in the land 24 of its birth. If there is any land of privilege, it is the land which gave 25 birth to this philosophy--privilege for the spiritual man as well as for 26 the man of birth. There they have not so much privilege for money 27 (that is one of the benefits, I think), but privilege for birth and 28 spirituality is everywhere.

29 Once a gigantic attempt was made to preach Vedantic ethics, 30 which succeeded to a certain extent for several hundred years, and 31 we know historically that those years were the best times of that 32 nation. I mean the Buddhistic attempt to break down privilege.
33 Some of the most beautiful epithets addressed to Buddha that I 34 remember are, "Thou the breaker of castes, destroyer of privileges, 35 preacher of equality to all beings." So, he preached this one idea of 36 equality. Its power has been misunderstood to a certain extent in 37 the brotherhood of Shramanas, where we find that hundreds of 38 attempts have been made to make them into a church, with 39 superiors and inferiors. You cannot make much of a church when 40 you tell people they are all gods. One of the good effects of Vedanta 41 has been freedom of religious thought, which India enjoyed 42 throughout all times of its history. It is something to glory in, that it 43 is the land where there was never a religious persecution, where 44 people are allowed perfect freedom in religion.

45 This practical side of Vedanta morality is necessary as much 46 today as it ever was, more necessary, perhaps, than it ever was, for 47 all this privilege-claiming has become tremendously intensified with 48 the extension of knowledge. The idea of God and the devil, or Ahura 49 Mazda and Ahriman, has a good deal of poetry in it. The difference 50 between God and the devil is in nothing except in unselfishness and 51 selfishness. The devil knows as much as God, is as powerful as God; 52 only he has no holiness--that makes him a devil. Apply the same

1 idea to the modern world: excess of knowledge and power, without 2 holiness, makes human beings devils. Tremendous power is being 3 acquired by the manufacture of machines and other appliances, and 4 privilege is claimed today as it never has been claimed in the 5 history of the world. That is why the Vedanta wants to preach 6 against it, to break down this tyrannising over the souls of men.

7 Those of you who have studied the Gita will remember the 8 memorable passages: "He who looks upon the learned Brahmin, 9 upon the cow, the elephant, the dog, or the outcast with the same 10 eye, he indeed is the sage, and the wise man"; "Even in this life he 11 has conquered relative existence whose mind is firmly fixed on this 12 sameness, for the Lord is one and the same to all, and the Lord is 13 pure; therefore those who have this sameness for all, and are pure, 14 are said to be living in God." This is the gist of Vedantic morality-- 15 this sameness for all. We have seen that it is the subjective world 16 that rules the objective. Change the subject, and the object is bound 17 to change; purify yourself, and the world is bound to be purified.
18 This one thing requires to be taught now more than ever before. We 19 are becoming more and more busy about our neighbours, and less 20 and less about ourselves. The world will change if we change; if we 21 are pure, the world will become pure. The question is why I should 22 see evil in others. I cannot see evil unless I be evil. I cannot be 23 miserable unless I am weak. Things that used to make me 24 miserable when I was a child, do not do so now. The subject 25 changed, so the object was bound to change; so says the Vedanta.
26 All these things which we call causes of misery and evil, we shall 27 laugh at when we arrive at that wonderful state of equality, that 28 sameness. This is what is called in Vedanta attaining to freedom.
29 The sign of approaching that freedom is more and more of this 30 sameness and equality. In misery and happiness the same, in 31 success and defeat the same--such a mind is nearing that state of 32 freedom.

33 The mind cannot be easily conquered. Minds that rise into 34 waves at the approach of every little thing at the slightest 35 provocation or danger, in what a state they must be! What to talk of 36 greatness or spirituality, when these changes come over the mind?
37 This unstable condition of the mind must be changed. We must ask 38 ourselves how far we can be acted upon by the external world, and 39 how far we can stand on our own feet, in spite of all the forces 40 outside us. When we have succeeded in preventing all the forces in 41 the world from throwing us off our balance, then alone we have 42 attained to freedom, and not before. That is salvation. It is here and 43 nowhere else; it is this moment. Out of this idea, out of this 44 fountain-head, all beautiful streams of thought have flowed upon 45 the world, generally misunderstood in their expression, apparently 46 contradicting each other. We find hosts of brave and wonderfully 47 spiritual souls, in every nation, taking to caves or forests for 48 meditation, severing their connection with the external world. This 49 is the one idea. And, on the other hand, we find bright, illustrious 50 beings coming into society, trying to raise their fellow men, the 51 poor, the miserable. Apparently these two methods are 52 contradictory. The man who lives in a cave, apart from his fellow-

1 beings, smiles contemptuously upon those who are working for the 2 regeneration of their fellow men. "How foolish!" he says; "what 3 work is there? The world of Maya will always remain the world of 4 Maya; it cannot be changed." If I ask one of our priests in India, "Do 5 you believe in Vedanta?"--he says, "That is my religion; I certainly 6 do; that is my life." "Very well, do you admit the equality of all life, 7 the sameness of everything?" "Certainly, I do." The next moment, 8 when a low-caste man approaches this priest, he jumps to one side 9 of the street to avoid that man. "Why do you jump?" "Because his 10 very touch would have polluted me." "But you were just saying we 11 are all the same, and you admit there is no difference in souls." He 12 says, "Oh, that is in theory only for householders; when I go into a 13 forest, then I will look upon everyone as the same." You ask one of 14 your great men in England, of great birth and wealth, if he believes 15 as a Christian in the brotherhood of mankind, since all came from 16 God. He answers in the affirmative, but in five minutes he shouts 17 something uncomplimentary about the common herd. Thus, it has 18 been a theory only for several thousand years and never came into 19 practice. All understand it, declare it as the truth, but when you ask 20 them to practise it, they say, it will take millions of years.

21 There was a certain king who had a huge number of 22 courtiers, and each one of these courtiers declared he was ready to 23 sacrifice his life for his master, and that he was the most sincere 24 being ever born. In course of time, a Sannyasin came to the king.
25 The king said to him that there never was a king who had so many 26 sincere courtiers as he had. The Sannyasin smiled and said he did 27 not believe that. The king said the Sannyasin could test it if he 28 liked. So the Sannyasin declared that he would make a great 29 sacrifice by which the king's reign would be extended very long, 30 with the condition that there should be made a small tank into 31 which each one of his courtiers should pour a pitcher of milk, in the 32 dark of night. The king smiled and said, "Is this the test?" And he 33 asked his courtiers to come to him, and told them what was to be 34 done. They all expressed their joyful assent to the proposal and 35 returned. In the dead of night, they came and emptied their 36 pitchers into the tank. But in the morning, it was found full of water 37 only. The courtiers were assembled and questioned about the 38 matter. Each one of them had thought there would be so many 39 pitchers of milk that his water would not be detected. Unfortunately 40 most of us have the same idea and we do our share of work as did 41 the courtiers in the story.

42 There is so much idea of equality, says the priest, that my 43 little privilege will not be detected. So say our rich men, so say the 44 tyrants of every country. There is more hope for the tyrannised over, 45 than for the tyrants. It will take a very long time for tyrants to 46 arrive at freedom, but less time for the others. The cruelty of the 47 fox is much more terrible than the cruelty of the lion. The lion 48 strikes a blow and is quiet for some time afterwards, but the fox 49 trying persistently to follow his prey never misses an opportunity.
50 Priestcraft is in its nature cruel and heartless. That is why religion 51 goes down where priestcraft arises. Says the Vedanta, we must give 52 up the idea of privilege, then will religion come. Before that there is 1 no religion at all.

2 Do you believe what Christ says, "Sell all that thou hast, and 3 give to the poor?" Practical equality there; no trying to torture the 4 texts, but taking the truth as it is. Do not try to torture texts. I have 5 heard it said that that was preached only to the handful of Jews who 6 listened to Jesus. The same argument will apply to other things 7 also. Do not torture texts; dare to face truth as it is. Even if we 8 cannot reach to it, let us confess our weakness, but let us not 9 destroy the ideal. Let us hope that we shall attain to it sometime, 10 and strive for it. There it is--"Sell all that thou hast, and give to the 11 poor, and follow me." Thus, trampling on every privilege and 12 everything in us that works for privilege, let us work for that 13 knowledge which will bring the feeling of sameness towards all 14 mankind. You think that because you talk a little more polished 15 language you are superior to the man in the street. Remember that 16 when you are thinking this, you are not going towards freedom, but 17 are forging a fresh chain for your feet. And, above all, if the pride of 18 spirituality enters into you, woe unto you. It is the most awful 19 bondage that ever existed. Neither can wealth nor any other 20 bondage of the human heart bind the soul so much as this. "I am 21 purer than others", is the most awful idea that can enter into the 22 human heart. In what sense are you pure? The God in you is the 23 God in all. If you have not known this, you have known nothing.
24 How can there be difference? It is all one. Every being is the temple 25 of the Most High; if you can see that, good, if not, spirituality has 26 yet to come to you.

PRIVILEGE

(Delivered at the Sesame Club, London)

Two forces seem to be working throughout nature. One of these is constantly differentiating, and the other is as constantly unifying; the one making more and more for separate individuals, the other, as it were, bringing the individuals into a mass, bringing out sameness in the midst of all this differentiation. It seems that the action of these two forces enters into every department of nature and of human life. On the physical plane, we always find the two forces most distinctly at work, separating the individuals, making them more and more distinct from other individuals, and again making them into species and classes, and bringing out similarities of expressions, and form. The same holds good as regards the social life of man. Since the time when society began, these two forces have been at work, differentiating and unifying. Their action appears in various forms, and is called by various names, in different places, and at different times. But the essence is present in all, one making for differentiation, and the other for sameness; the one making for caste, and the other breaking it down; one making for classes and privileges, and the other destroying them. The whole universe seems to be the battle-ground of these two forces. On the one hand, it is urged, that though this unifying process exists, we ought to resist it with all our might, because it leads towards death, that perfect unity is perfect annihilation, and that when the differentiating process that is at work in this universe ceases, the universe comes to an end. It is differentiation that causes the phenomena that are before us; unification would reduce them all to a homogeneous and lifeless matter. Such a thing, of course, mankind wants to avoid. The same argument is applied to all the things and facts that we see around us. It is urged that even in the physical body and social classification, absolute sameness would produce natural death and social death. Absolute sameness of thought and feeling would produce mental decay and degeneration. Sameness, therefore, is to be avoided. This has been the argument on the one side, and it has been urged in every country and in various times, with only a change of language. Practically it is the same argument which is urged by the Brahmins of India, when they want to uphold the divisions and castes, when they want to uphold the privileges of a certain portion of the community, against everybody else. The destruction of caste, they declare, would lead to destruction of society, and boldly they produce the historical fact that theirs has been the longest-lived society. So they, with some show of force, appeal to this argument. With some show of authority they declare that that alone which makes the individual live the longest life must certainly be better than that which produces shorter lives.

On the other hand, the idea of oneness has had its advocates throughout all times. From the days of the Upanishads, the Buddhas, and Christs, and all other great preachers of religion, down to our present day, in the new political aspirations, and in the claims of the oppressed and the downtrodden, and of all those who find themselves bereft of privileges--comes out the one assertion of 1 this unity and sameness. But human nature asserts itself. Those 2 who have an advantage want to keep it, and if they find an 3 argument, however one-sided and crude, they must cling to it. This 4 applies to both sides.

5 Applied to metaphysics, this question also assumes another 6 form. The Buddhist declares that we need not look for anything 7 which brings unity in the midst of these phenomena, we ought to be 8 satisfied with this phenomenal world. This variety is the essence of 9 life, however miserable and weak it may seem to be; we can have 10 nothing more. The Vedantist declares that unity is the only thing 11 that exists; variety is but phenomenal, ephemeral and apparent.
12 "Look not to variety," says the Vedantist, "go back to unity." "Avoid 13 unity; it is a delusion," says the Buddhist, "go to variety." The same 14 differences of opinion in religion and metaphysics have come down 15 to our own day, for, in fact, the sum-total of the principles of 16 knowledge is very small. Metaphysics and metaphysical knowledge, 17 religion and religious knowledge, reached their culmination five 18 thousand years ago, and we are merely reiterating the same truths 19 in different languages, only enriching them sometimes by the 20 accession of fresh illustrations. So this is the fight, even today. One 21 side wants us to keep to the phenomenal, to all this variation, and 22 points out, with great show of argument, that variation has to 23 remain, for when that stops, everything is gone. What we mean by 24 life has been caused by variation. The other side, at the same time, 25 valiantly points to unity.

26 Coming to ethics, we find a tremendous departure. It is, 27 perhaps, the only science which makes a bold departure from this 28 fight. For ethics is unity; its basis is love. It will not look at this 29 variation. The one aim of ethics is this unity, this sameness. The 30 highest ethical codes that mankind has discovered up to the present 31 time know no variation; they have no time to stop to look into it; 32 their one end is to make for that sameness. The Indian mind, being 33 more analytical--I mean the Vedantic mind--found this unity as the 34 result of all its analyses, and wanted to base everything upon this 35 one idea of unity. But as we have seen, in the same country, there 36 were other minds (the Buddhistic) who could not find that unity 37 anywhere. To them all truth was a mass of variation, there was no 38 connection between one thing and another.

39 I remember a story told by Prof. Max Muller in one of his 40 books, an old Greek story, of how a Brahmin visited Socrates in 41 Athens. The Brahmin asked, "What is the highest knowledge?" And 42 Socrates answered, "To know man is the end and aim of all 43 knowledge." "But how can you know man without knowing God?" 44 replied the Brahmin. The one side, the Greek side, which is 45 represented by modern Europe, insisted upon the knowledge of 46 man; the Indian side, mostly represented by the old religions of the 47 world, insisted upon the knowledge of God. The one sees God in 48 nature, and the other sees nature in God. To us, at the present time, 49 perhaps, has been given the privilege of standing aside from both 50 these aspects, and taking an impartial view of the whole. This is a 51 fact that variation exists, and so it must, if life is to be. This is also a 52 fact that in and through these variations unity must be perceived.

1 This is a fact that God is perceived in nature. But it is also a fact 2 that nature is perceived in God. The knowledge of man is the 3 highest knowledge, and only by knowing man, can we know God.
4 This is also a fact that the knowledge of God is the highest 5 knowledge, and knowing God alone we can know man. Apparently 6 contradictory though these statements may appear, they are the 7 necessity of human nature. The whole universe is a play of unity in 8 variety, and of variety in unity. The whole universe is a play of 9 differentiation and oneness; the whole universe is a play of the 10 finite in the Infinite. We cannot take one without granting the 11 other. But we cannot take them both as facts of the same 12 perception, as facts of the same experience; yet in this way it will 13 always go on.

14 Therefore, coming to our more particular purpose, which is 15 religion rather than ethics, a state of things, where all variation has 16 died down, giving place to a uniform, dead homogeneity, is 17 impossible so long as life lasts. Nor is it desirable. At the same time, 18 there is the other side of the fact, viz that this unity already exists.
19 That is the peculiar claim--not that this unity has to be made, but 20 that it already exists, and that you could not perceive the variety at 21 all, without it. God is not to be made, but He already exists. This 22 has been the claim of all religions. Whenever one has perceived the 23 finite, he has also perceived the Infinite. Some laid stress on the 24 finite side, and declared that they perceived the finite without; 25 others laid stress on the Infinite side, and declared they perceived 26 the Infinite only. But we know that it is a logical necessity that we 27 cannot perceive the one without the other. So the claim is that this 28 sameness, this unity, this perfection--as we may call it--is not to be 29 made, it already exists, and is here. We have only to recognise it, to 30 understand it. Whether we know it or not, whether we can express 31 it in clear language or not, whether this perception assumes the 32 force and clearness of a sense-perception or not, it is there. For we 33 are bound by the logical necessity of our minds to confess that it is 34 there, else, the perception of the finite would not be. I am not 35 speaking of the old theory of substance and qualities, but of 36 oneness; that in the midst of all this mass of phenomena, the very 37 fact of the consciousness that you and I are different brings to us, at 38 the same moment, the consciousness that you and I are not 39 different. Knowledge would be impossible without that unity.
40 Without the idea of sameness there would be neither perception 41 nor knowledge. So both run side by side.

42 Therefore the absolute sameness of conditions, if that be the 43 aim of ethics, appears to be impossible. That all men should be the 44 same, could never be, however we might try. Men will be born 45 differentiated; some will have more power than others; some will 46 have natural capacities, others not; some will have perfect bodies, 47 others not. We can never stop that. At the same time ring in our 48 ears the wonderful words of morality proclaimed by various 49 teachers: "Thus, seeing the same God equally present in all, the 50 sage does not injure Self by the Self, and thus reaches the highest 51 goal. Even in this life they have conquered relative existence whose 52 minds are firmly fixed on this sameness; for God is pure, and God is

1 the same to all. Therefore such are said to be living in God." We 2 cannot deny that this is the real idea; yet at the same time comes 3 the difficulty that the sameness as regards external forms and 4 position can never be attained.

5 But what can be attained is elimination of privilege. That is 6 really the work before the whole world. In all social lives, there has 7 been that one fight in every race and in every country. The difficulty 8 is not that one body of men are naturally more intelligent than 9 another, but whether this body of men, because they have the 10 advantage of intelligence, should take away even physical 11 enjoyment from those who do not possess that advantage. The fight 12 is to destroy that privilege. That some will be stronger physically 13 than others, and will thus naturally be able to subdue or defeat the 14 weak, is a self-evident fact, but that because of this strength they 15 should gather unto themselves all the attainable happiness of this 16 life, is not according to law, and the fight has been against it. That 17 some people, through natural aptitude, should be able to 18 accumulate more wealth than others, is natural: but that on account 19 of this power to acquire wealth they should tyrannise and ride 20 roughshod over those who cannot acquire so much wealth, is not a 21 part of the law, and the fight has been against that. The enjoyment 22 of advantage over another is privilege, and throughout ages, the 23 aim of morality has been its destruction. This is the work which 24 tends towards sameness, towards unity, without destroying variety.

25 Let all these variations remain eternally; it is the very essence 26 of life. We shall all play in this way, eternally. You will be wealthy, 27 and I shall be poor; you will be strong, and I shall be weak; you will 28 be learned and I ignorant; you will be very spiritual, and I, less so.
29 But what of that? Let us remain so, but because you are physically 30 or intellectually stronger, you must not have more privilege than I, 31 and that you have more wealth is no reason why you should be 32 considered greater than I, for that sameness is here, in spite of the 33 different conditions.

34 The work of ethics has been, and will be in the future, not the 35 destruction of variation and the establishment of sameness in the 36 external world--which is impossible for it would bring death and 37 annihilation--but to recognise the unity in spite of all these 38 variations, to recognise the God within, in spite of everything that 39 frightens us, to recognise that infinite strength as the property of 40 everyone in spite of all apparent weakness, and to recognise the 41 eternal, infinite, essential purity of the soul in spite of everything to 42 the contrary that appears on the surface. This we have to 43 recognise. Taking one side alone, one half only of the position, is 44 dangerous and liable to lead to quarrels. We must take the whole 45 thing as it is, stand on it as our basis and work it out in every part 46 of our lives, as individuals and as unit members of society.

KRISHNA

(Delivered in California, on April 1, 1900)

Almost the same circumstances which gave birth to Buddhism in India surrounded the rise of Krishna. Not only this, the events of that day we find happening in our own times.

There is a certain ideal. At the same time there must always be a large majority of the human race who cannot come up to the ideal, not even intellectually.The strong ones carry it out and many times have no sympathy for the weak. The weak to the strong are only beggars. The strong ones march ahead. ...Of course, we see at once that the highest position to take is to be sympathetic and helpful to those who are weak. But then, in many cases the philosopher bars the way to our being sympathetic. If we go by the theory that the whole of this infinite life has to be determined by the few years' existence here and now, ...then it is very hopeless for us, ...and we have no time to look back upon those who are weak. But if these are not the conditions--if the world is only one of the many schools through which we have to pass, if the eternal life is to be moulded and fashioned and guided by the eternal law, and eternal law, eternal chances await everyone--then we need not be in a hurry. We have time to sympathise, to look around, stretch out a helping hand to the weak and bring them up.

With Buddhism we have two words in Sanskrit: one is translated religion, the other, a sect. It is the most curious fact that the disciples and descendants of Krishna have no name for their religion [although] foreigners call it Hinduism or Brahmanism. There is one religion, and there are many sects. The moment you give it a name, individualise it and separate it from the rest, it is a sect, no more a religion. A sect [proclaims] its own truth and declares that there is no truth anywhere else. Religion believes that there has been, and still is, one religion in the world. There never were two religions. It is the same religion [presenting] different aspects in different places. The task is to conceive the proper understanding of the goal and scope of humanity.

This was the great work of Krishna: to clear our eyes and make us look with broader vision upon humanity in its march upward and onward. His was the first heart that was large enough to see truth in all, his the first lips that uttered beautiful words for each and all.

This Krishna preceded Buddha by some thousand years. ...A great many people do not believe that he ever existed. Some believe that [the worship of Krishna grew out of] the old sun worship. There seem to be several Krishnas: one was mentioned in the Upanishads, another was king, another a general. All have been lumped into one Krishna. It does not matter much. The fact is, some individual comes who is unique in spirituality. Then all sorts of legends are invented around him. But, all the Bibles and stories which come to be cast upon this one person have to be recast in [the mould of] his character. All the stories of the New Testament have to be modelled upon the accepted life [and] character of Christ. In all of the Indian stories about Buddha the one central 1 note of that whole life is kept up--sacrifice for others. ...

2 In Krishna we find...two ideas [stand] supreme in his 3 message: The first is the harmony of different ideas; the second is 4 non-attachment. A man can attain to perfection, the highest goal, 5 sitting on a throne, commanding armies, working out big plans for 6 nations. In fact, Krishna's great sermon was preached on the 7 battlefield.

8 Krishna saw plainly through the vanity of all the mummeries, 9 mockeries, and ceremonials of the old priests; and yet he saw some 10 good in them.

11 If you are a strong man, very good! But do not curse others 12 who are not strong enough for you. ...Everyone says, "Woe unto you 13 people!!" Who says, "Woe unto me that I cannot help you?" The 14 people are doing all right to the best of their ability and means and 15 knowledge. Woe unto me that I cannot lift them to where I am!

16 So the ceremonials, worship of gods, and myths, are all right, 17 Krishna says. ...Why? Because they all lead to the same goal.
18 Ceremonies, books, and forms--all these are links in the chain. Get 19 hold! That is the one thing. If you are sincere and have really got 20 hold of one link, do not let go; the rest is bound to come. [But 21 people] do not get hold. They spend the time quarrelling and 22 determining what they should get hold of, and do not get hold of 23 anything. ...We are always after truth, but never want to get it. We 24 simply want the pleasure to go about and ask. We have a lot of 25 energy and spend it that way. That is why Krishna says: Get hold of 26 any one of these chains that are stretched out from the common 27 centre. No one step is greater than another. ...Blame no view of 28 religion so far as it is sincere. Hold on to one of these links, and it 29 will pull you to the centre. Your heart itself will teach all the rest.
30 The teacher within will teach all the creeds, all the philosophies. ..

31 Krishna talks of himself as God, as Christ does. He sees the 32 Deity in himself. And he says, "None can go a day out of my path.
33 All have to come to me. Whosoever wants to worship in whatsoever 34 form, I give him faith in that form, and through that I meet him. ..."
35 His heart is all for the masses.

36 Independent, Krishna stands out. The very boldness of it
37 frightens us. We depend upon everything--...upon a few good words, 38 upon circumstances. When the soul wants to depend upon nothing, 39 not even upon life, that is the height of philosophy, the height of 40 manhood. Worship leads to the same goal. Krishna lays great stress 41 upon worship. Worship God!

42 Various sorts of worship we see in this world. The sick man is 43 very worshipful to God. ...There is the man who loses his fortune; 44 he also prays very much, to get money. The highest worship is that 45 of the man who loves God for God's sake. [The question may be 46 asked:] "Why should there be so much sorrow if there is a God?" 47 The worshipper replies: "...There is misery in the world; [but] 48 because of that I do not cease to love God. I do not worship Him to 49 take away my [misery]. I love Him because He is love itself." The 50 other [types of worship] are lower-grade; but Krishna has no

1 condemnation for anything. It is better to do something than to 2 stand still. The man who begins to worship God will grow by 3 degrees and begin to love God for love's sake. ...

4 How to attain purity living this life? Shall we all go to the 5 forest caves? What good would it do? If the mind is not under 6 control, it is no use living in a cave because the same mind will 7 bring all disturbances there. We will find twenty devils in the cave 8 because all the devils are in the mind. If the mind is under control, 9 we can have the cave anywhere, wherever we are.

10 It is our own mental attitude which makes the world what it is 11 for us. Our thoughts make things beautiful, our thoughts make 12 things ugly. The whole world is in our own minds. Learn to see 13 things in the proper light. First, believe in this world--that there is 14 meaning behind everything. Everything in the world is good, is holy 15 and beautiful. If you see something evil, think that you are not 16 understanding it in the right light. Throw the burden on yourselves!
17 ...Whenever we are tempted to say that the world is going to the 18 dogs, we ought to analyse ourselves, and we shall find that we have 19 lost the faculty of seeing things as they are.

20 Work day and night! "Behold, I am the Lord of the Universe. I 21 have no duty. Every duty is bondage. But I work for work's sake. If I 22 ceased to work for a minute, [there would be chaos]." So do thou 23 work, without any idea of duty. ...

24 This world is a play. You are His playmates. Go on and work, 25 without any sorrow, without any misery. See His play in the slums, in 26 the saloons! Work to lift people! Not that they are vile or degraded; 27 Krishna does not say that.

28 Do you know why so little good work is done? My lady goes to 29 the slum. ...She gives a few ducats and says, "My poor men, take 30 that and be happy!" ...Or my fine woman, walking through the 31 street, sees a poor fellow and throws him five cents. Think of the 32 blasphemy of it! Blessed are we that the Lord has given us his 33 teaching in your own Testament. Jesus says, "Inasmuch as ye have 34 done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto 35 me." It is blasphemy to think that you can help anyone. First root 36 out this idea of helping, and then go to worship. God's children are 37 your Master's children. [And children are but different forms of the 38 father.] You are His servant. ...Serve the living God! God comes to 39 you in the blind, in the halt, in the poor, in the weak, in the 40 diabolical. What a glorious chance for you to worship! The moment 41 you think you are "helping", you undo the whole thing and degrade 42 yourself. Knowing this, work. "What follows?" you say. You do not 43 get that heartbreak, that awful misery. ...Then work is no more 44 slavery. It becomes a play, and joy itself. ...Work! Be unattached!
45 That is the whole secret. If you get attached, you become 46 miserable. ...

47 With everything we do in life we identify ourselves. Here is a 48 man who says harsh words to me. I feel anger coming on me. In a 49 few seconds anger and I are one, and then comes misery. Attach 50 yourselves to the Lord and to nothing else, because everything else 51 is unreal. Attachment to the unreal will bring misery. There is only

1 one Existence that is real, only one Life in which there is neither 2 object nor [subject]. ...

3 But unattached love will not hurt you. Do anything--marry,
4 have children. ...Do anything you like--nothing will hurt you. Do 5 nothing with the idea of "mine". Duty for duty's sake; work for 6 work's sake. What is that to you? You stand aside.

7 When we come to that non-attachment, then we can 8 understand the marvellous mystery of the universe; how it is 9 intense activity and vibration, and at the same time intensest peace 10 and calm; how it is work every moment and rest every moment.
11 That is the mystery of the universe--the impersonal and personal in 12 one, the infinite and finite in one. Then we shall find the secret. "He 13 who finds in the midst of intense activity the greatest rest, and in 14 the midst of the greatest rest intense activity, he has become a 15 Yogi." He alone is a real worker, none else. We do a little work and 16 break ourselves. Why? We become attached to that work. If we do 17 not become attached, side by side with it we have infinite rest. ...

18 How hard it is to arrive at this sort of non-attachment!
19 Therefore Krishna shows us the lower ways and methods. The 20 easiest way for everyone is to do [his or her] work and not take the 21 results. It is our desire that binds us. If we take the results of 22 actions, whether good or evil, we will have to bear them. But if we 23 work not for ourselves, but all for the glory of the Lord, the results 24 will take care of themselves. "To work you have the right, but not to 25 the fruits thereof." The soldier works for no results. He does his 26 duty. If defeat comes, it belongs to the general, not to the soldier.
27 We do our duty for love's sake--love for the general, love for the 28 Lord. ...

29 If you are strong, take up the Vedanta philosophy and be 30 independent. If you cannot do that, worship God; if not, worship 31 some image. If you lack strength even to do that, do some good 32 works without the idea of gain. Offer everything you have unto the 33 service of the Lord. Fight on! "Leaves and water and one flower-- 34 whosoever lays anything on my altar, I receive it with equal 35 delights." If you cannot do anything, not a single good work, then 36 take refuge [in the Lord]. "The Lord resides within the heart of the 37 being, making them turn upon His wheel. Do thou with all thy soul 38 and heart take refuge in Him. ..."

39 These are some of the general ideas that Krishna preached on 40 this idea of love [in the Gita]. There are [in] other great books, 41 sermons on love--as with Buddha, as with Jesus. ...

42 A few words about the life of Krishna. There is a great deal of 43 similarity between the lives of Jesus and Krishna. A discussion is 44 going on as to which borrowed of the other. There was the 45 tyrannical king in both places. Both were born in a manger. The 46 parents were bound in both cases. Both were saved by angels. In 47 both cases all the boys born that year were killed. The childhood is 48 the same. ...Again, in the end, both were killed. Krishna was killed 49 by accident; he took the man who killed him to heaven. Christ was 50 killed, and blessed the robber and took him to heaven.

1 There are a great many similarities in the teaching of the 2 New Testament and the Gita. The human thought goes the same 3 way. ...I will find you the answer in the words of Krishna himself:
4 "Whenever virtue subsides and irreligion prevails, I come down.
5 Again and again I come. Therefore, whenever thou seest a great 6 soul struggling to uplift mankind, know that I am come, and 7 worship. ..."

8 At the same time, if he comes as Jesus or as Buddha, why is 9 there so much schism? The preachings must be followed! A Hindu 10 devotee would say: It is God himself who became Christ and 11 Krishna and Buddha and all these [great teachers]. A Hindu 12 philosopher would say: These are the great souls; they are already 13 free. And though free, they refuse to accept their liberation while 14 the whole world is suffering. They come again and again, take a 15 human embodiment and help mankind. They know from their 16 childhood what they are and what they come for. ...They do not 17 come through bondage like we do. ...They come out of their own 18 free will, and cannot help having tremendous spiritual power. We 19 cannot resist it. The vast mass of mankind is dragged into the 20 whirlpool of spirituality, and the vibration goes on and on because 21 one of these [great souls] gives a push. So it continues until all 22 mankind is liberated and the play of this planet is finished.

23 Glory unto the great souls whose lives we have been 24 studying! They are the living gods of the world. They are the 25 persons whom we ought to worship. If He comes to me, I can only 26 recognise Him if He takes a human form. He is everywhere, but do 27 we see Him? We can only see Him if He takes the limitation of man.
28 ...If men and ... animals are manifestations of God, these teachers 29 of mankind are leaders, are Gurus. Therefore, salutations unto you, 30 whose footstool is worshipped by angels! Salutations unto you 31 leaders of the human race! Salutations unto you great teachers! You 32 leaders have our salutations for ever and ever!

THE GITA I

(Delivered in San Francisco, on May 26, 1900)

To understand the Gita requires its historical background. The Gita is a commentary on the Upanishads. The Upanishads are the Bible of India. They occupy the same place as the New Testament does. There are [more than] a hundred books comprising the Upanishads, some very small and some big, each a separate treatise. The Upanishads do not reveal the life of any teacher, but simply teach principles. They are [as it were] shorthand notes taken down of discussion in [learned assemblies], generally in the courts of kings. The word Upanishad may mean "sittings" [or "sitting near a teacher"]. Those of you who may have studied some of the Upanishads can understand how they are condensed shorthand sketches. After long discussions had been held, they were taken down, possibly from memory. The difficulty is that you get very little of the background. Only the luminous points are mentioned there. The origin of ancient Sanskrit is 5000 B.C.; the Upanishads [are at least] two thousand years before that. Nobody knows [exactly] how old they are. The Gita takes the ideas of the Upanishads and in [some] cases the very words. They are strung together with the idea of bringing out, in a compact, condensed, and systematic form, the whole subject the Upanishads deal with.

The [original] scriptures of the Hindus are called the Vedas. They were so vast--the mass of writings--that if the texts alone were brought here, this room would not contain them. Many of them are lost. They were divided into branches, each branch put into the head of certain priests and kept alive by memory.

Such men still exist. They will repeat book after book of the Vedas without missing a single intonation. The larger portion of the Vedas has disappeared. The small portion left makes a whole library by itself. The oldest of these contains the hymns of the Rig-Veda. It is the aim of the modern scholar to restore [the sequence of the Vedic compositions]. The old, orthodox idea is quite different, as your orthodox idea of the Bible is quite different from the modern scholar's. The Vedas are divided into two portions: one the Upanishads, the philosophical portion, the other the work portion.

We will try to give a little idea of the work portion. It consists of rituals and hymns, various hymns addressed to various gods. The ritual portion is composed of ceremonies, some of them very elaborate. A great many priests are required. The priestly function became a science by itself, owing to the elaboration of the ceremonials. Gradually the popular idea of veneration grew round these hymns and rituals. The gods disappeared and in their place were left the rituals. That was the curious development in India. The orthodox Hindu [the Mimamsaka] does not believe in gods, the unorthodox believe in them. If you ask the orthodox Hindu what the meaning is of these gods in the Vedas, he will not be able to give any satisfactory answer]. The priests sing these hymns and pour libations and offerings into the fire. When you ask the orthodox Hindu the meaning of this, he says that words have the power to produce certain effects. That is all. There is all the natural and

1 supernatural power that ever existed. The Vedas are simply words
2 that have the mystical power to produce effects if the sound
3 intonation is right. If one sound is wrong it will not do. Each one 4 must be perfect. [Thus] what in other religions is called prayer 5 disappeared and the Vedas became the gods. So you see the 6 tremendous importance that was attached to the words of the 7 Vedas. These are the eternal words out of which the whole universe
8 has been produced. There cannot be any thought without the word.
9 Thus whatever there is in this world is the manifestation of thought, 10 and thought can only manifest itself through words. This mass of 11 words by which the unmanifested thought becomes manifest, that is 12 what is meant by the Vedas. It follows that the external existence of 13 everything [depends on the Vedas, for thought] does not exist 14 without the word. If the word "horse" did not exist, none could think 15 of a horse. [So] there must be [an intimate relation between] 16 thought, word, and the external object. What are these words [in 17 reality]? The Vedas. They do not call it Sanskrit language at all. It is 18 Vedic language, a divine language. Sanskrit is a degenerate form.
19 So are all other languages. There is no language older than Vedic.
20 You may ask, "Who wrote the Vedas?" They were not written. The 21 words are the Vedas. A word is Veda, if I can pronounce it rightly.
22 Then it will immediately produce the [desired] effect.

23 This mass of Vedas eternally exists and all the world is the 24 manifestation of this mass of words. Then when the cycle ends, all 25 this manifestation of energy becomes finer and finer, becomes only 26 words, then thought. In the next cycle, first the thought changes 27 into words and then out of those words [the whole universe] is 28 produced. If there is something here that is not in the Vedas, that is 29 your delusion. It does not exist.

30 [Numerous] books upon that subject alone defend the Vedas.
31 If you tell [their authors] that the Vedas must have been 32 pronounced by men first, [they will simply laugh]. You never heard 33 of any [man uttering them for the first time]. Take Buddha's words.
34 There is a tradition that he lived and spoke these words [many 35 times before]. If the Christian stands up and says, "My religion is a 36 historical religion and therefore yours is wrong and ours is true," 37 [the Mimamsaka replies], "Yours being historical, you confess that a 38 man invented it nineteen hundred years ago. That which is true 39 must be infinite and eternal. That is the one test of truth. It never 40 decays, it is always the same. You confess your religion was created 41 by such-and-such a man. The Vedas were not. By no prophets or 42 anything. ...Only infinite words, infinite by their very nature, from 43 which the whole universe comes and goes." In the abstract it is 44 perfectly correct. ...The sound must be the beginning of creation.
45 There must be germ sounds like germ plasm. There cannot be any 46 ideas without the words. ...Wherever there are sensations, ideas, 47 emotion, there must be words. The difficulty is when they say that 48 these four books are the Vedas and nothing else. [Then] the 49 Buddhist will stand up and say, "Ours are Vedas. They were 50 revealed to us later on." That cannot be. Nature does not go on in 51 that way. Nature does not manifest her laws bit by bit, an inch of 52 gravitation today and [another inch] tomorrow. No, every law is

1 complete. There is no evolution in law at all. It is [given] once and 2 for ever. It is all nonsense, this "new religion and better 3 inspiration," and all that. It means nothing. There may be a hundred 4 thousand laws and man may know only a few today. We discover 5 them--that is all. Those old priests with their tremendous [claims 6 about eternal words], having dethroned the gods, took the place of 7 the gods. [They said], "You do not understand the power of words.
8 We know how to use them. We are the living gods of the world. Pay 9 us; we will manipulate the words, and you will get what you want.
10 Can you pronounce the words yourself? You cannot, for, mind you, 11 one mistake will produce the opposite effect. You want to be rich, 12 handsome, have a long life, a fine husband?" Only pay the priest 13 and keep quiet!

14 Yet there is another side. The ideal of the first part of the 15 Vedas is entirely different from the ideal of the other part, the 16 Upanishads. The ideal of the first part coincides with [that of] all 17 other religions of the world except the Vedanta. The ideal is 18 enjoyment here and hereafter--man and wife, husband and children.
19 Pay your dollar, and the priest will give you a certificate, and you 20 will have a happy time afterwards in heaven. You will find all your 21 people there and have this merry-go-round without end. No tears, 22 no weeping--only laughing. No stomach-ache, but yet eating. No 23 headache, but yet [parties]. That, considered the priests, was the 24 highest goal of man.

25 There is another idea in this philosophy which is according to 26 your modern ideas. Man is a slave of nature, and slave eternally he 27 has got to remain. We call it Karma. Karma means law, and it 28 applies everywhere. Everything is bound by Karma. "Is there no 29 way out?" "No! Remain slaves all through the years--fine slaves. We 30 will manipulate the words so that you will only have the good and 31 not the bad side of all--if you will pay [us] enough." That was the 32 ideal of [the Mimamsakas]. These are the ideals which are popular 33 throughout the ages. The vast mass of mankind are never thinkers.
34 Even if they try to think, the [effect of the] vast mass of 35 superstitions on them is terrible. The moment they weaken, one 36 blow comes, and the backbone breaks into twenty pieces. They can 37 only be moved by lures and threats. They can never move of their 38 own accord. They must be frightened, horrified, or terrorised, and 39 they are your slaves for ever. They have nothing else to do but to 40 pay and obey. Everything else is done by the priest. ...How much 41 easier religion becomes! You see, you have nothing to do. Go home 42 and sit quietly. Somebody is doing the whole thing for you. Poor, 43 poor animals!

44 Side by side, there was the other system. The Upanishads are 45 diametrically opposite in all their conclusions. First of all, the 46 Upanishads believe in God, the creator of the universe, its ruler.
47 You find later on [the idea of a benign Providence]. It is an entirely 48 opposite [conception]. Now, although we hear the priest, the ideal 49 is much more subtle. Instead of many gods they made one God.

50 The second idea, that you are all bound by the law of Karma, 51 the Upanishads admit, but they declare the way out. The goal of 52 man is to go beyond law. And enjoyment can never be the goal,

1 because enjoyment can only be in nature.

2 In the third place, the Upanishads condemn all the sacrifices 3 and say that is mummery. That may give you all you want, but it is 4 not desirable, for the more you get, the more you [want], and you 5 run round and round in a circle eternally, never getting to the end-- 6 enjoying and weeping. Such a thing as eternal happiness is 7 impossible anywhere. It is only a child's dream. The same energy 8 becomes joy and sorrow.

9 I have changed my psychology a bit today. I have found the 10 most curious fact. You have a certain idea and you do not want to 11 have it, and you think of something else, and the idea you want to 12 suppress is entirely suppressed. What is that idea? I saw it come 13 out in fifteen minutes. It came out and staggered me. It was strong, 14 and it came in such a violent and terrible fashion [that] I thought 15 here was a madman. And when it was over, all that had happened 16 [was a suppression of the previous emotion]. What came out? It was 17 my own bad impression which had to be worked out. "Nature will 18 have her way. What can suppression do?" That is a terrible 19 [statement] in the Gita. It seems it may be a vain struggle after all.
20 You may have a hundred thousand [urges competing] at the same 21 time. You may repress [them], but the moment the spring rebounds, 22 the whole thing is there again.

23 [But there is hope]. If you are powerful enough, you can 24 divide your consciousness into twenty parts all at the same time. I 25 am changing my psychology. Mind grows. That is what the Yogis 26 say. There is one passion and it rouses another, and the first one 27 dies. If you are angry, and then happy, the next moment the anger 28 passes away. Out of that anger you manufactured the next state.
29 These states are always interchangeable. Eternal happiness and 30 misery are a child's dream. The Upanishads point out that the goal 31 of man is neither misery nor happiness, but we have to be master of 32 that out of which these are manufactured. We must be masters of 33 the situation at its very root, as it were.

34 The other point of divergence is: the Upanishads condemn all 35 rituals, especially those that involve the killing of animals. They 36 declare those all nonsense. One school of old philosophers says that 37 you must kill such an animal at a certain time if the effect is to be 38 produced. [You may reply], "But [there is] also the sin of taking the 39 life of the animal; you will have to suffer for that." They say that is 40 all nonsense. How do you know what is right and what is wrong?
41 Your mind says so? Who cares what your mind says? What nonsense 42 are you talking? You are setting your mind against the scriptures. If 43 your mind says something and the Vedas say something else, stop 44 your mind and believe in the Vedas. If they say, killing a man is 45 right, that is right. If you say, "No, my conscience says [otherwise," 46 it won't do]. The moment you believe in any book as the eternal 47 word, as sacred, no more can you question. I do not see how you 48 people here believe in the Bible whenever you say about [it], "How 49 wonderful those words are, how right and how good!" Because, if 50 you believe in the Bible as the word of God, you have no right to 51 judge at all. The moment you judge, you think you are higher than 52 the Bible. [Then] what is the use of the Bible to you? The priests

1 say, "We refuse to make the comparison with your Bible or 2 anybody's. It is no use comparing, because--what is the authority?
3 There it ends. If you think something is not right, go and get it right 4 according to the Vedas."

5 The Upanishads believe in that, [but they have a higher 6 standard too]. On the one hand, they do not want to overthrow the 7 Vedas, and on the other they see these animal sacrifices and the 8 priests stealing everybody's money. But in the psychology they are 9 all alike. All the differences have been in the philosophy, [regarding] 10 the nature of the soul. Has it a body and a mind? And is the mind 11 only a bundle of nerves, the motor nerves and the sensory nerves?
12 Psychology, they all take for granted, is a perfect science. There 13 cannot be any difference there. All the fight has been regarding 14 philosophy--the nature of the soul, and God, and all that.

15 Then another great difference between the priests and the 16 Upanishads. The Upanishads say, renounce. That is the test of 17 everything. Renounce everything. It is the creative faculty that 18 brings us into all this entanglement. The mind is in its own nature 19 when it is calm. The moment you can calm it, that [very] moment 20 you will know the truth. What is it that is whirling the mind?
21 Imagination, creative activity. Stop creation and you know the truth.
22 All power of creation must stop, and then you know the truth at 23 once.

24 On the other hand, the priests are all for [creation]. Imagine a 25 species of life [in which there is no creative activity. It is 26 unthinkable]. The people had to have a plan [of evolving a stable 27 society. A system of rigid selection was adopted. For instance,] no 28 people who are blind and halt can be married. [As a result] you will 29 find so much less deformity [in India] than in any other country in 30 the world. Epileptics and insane [people] are very rare [there]. That 31 is owing to direct selection. The priests say, "Let them become 32 Sannyasins." On the other hand, the Upanishad say, "Oh no, [the] 33 earth's best and finest [and] freshest flowers should be laid upon 34 the altar. The strong, the young, with sound intellect and sound 35 body--they must struggle for the truth."

36 So with all these divergences of opinion, I have told you that 37 the priests already differentiated themselves into a separate caste.
38 The second is the caste of the kings. ...All the Upanishadic 39 philosophy is from the brains of kings, not priests. There [runs] an 40 economic struggle through every religious struggle. This animal 41 called man has some religious influence, but he is guided by 42 economy. Individuals are guided by something else, but the mass of 43 mankind never made a move unless economy was [involved]. You 44 may [preach a religion that may not be perfect in every detail], but 45 if there is an economic background [to it], and you have the most 46 [ardent champions] to preach it, you can convince a whole 47 country. ...

48 Whenever any religion succeeds, it must have economic 49 value. Thousands of similar sects will be struggling for power, but 50 only those who meet the real economic problem will have it. Man is 51 guided by the stomach. He walks and the stomach goes first and

1 the head afterwards. Have you not seen that? It will take ages for 2 the head to go first. By the time a man is sixty years of age, he is 3 called out of [the world]. The whole of life is one delusion, and just 4 when you begin to see things the way they are, you are snatched 5 off. So long as the stomach went first you were all right. When 6 children's dreams begin to vanish and you begin to look at things 7 the way they are, the head goes. Just when the head goes first, [you 8 go out].

9 [For] the religion of the Upanishads to be popularised was a 10 hard task. Very little economy is there, but tremendous altruism. ...

11 The Upanishads had very little kingdom, although they were 12 discovered by kings that held all the royal power in their hands. So 13 the struggle ...began to be fiercer. Its culminating point came two 14 thousand years after, in Buddhism. The seed of Buddhism is here, 15 [in] the ordinary struggle between the king and the priest; and [in 16 the struggle] all religion declined. One wanted to sacrifice religion, 17 the other wanted to cling to the sacrifices, to Vedic gods, etc.
18 Buddhism...broke the chains of the masses. All castes and creeds 19 alike became equal in a minute. So the great religious ideas in India 20 exist, but have yet to be preached: otherwise they do no good. ...

21 In every country it is the priest who is conservative, for two 22 reasons--because it is his bread and because he can only move with 23 the people. All priests are not strong. If the people say, "Preach two 24 thousand gods," the priests will do it. They are the servants of the 25 congregation who pay them. God does not pay them. So blame 26 yourselves before blaming the priests. You can only get the 27 government and the religion and the priesthood you deserve, and 28 no better.

29 So the great struggle began in India and it comes to one of its 30 culminating points in the Gita. When it was causing fear that all 31 India was going to be broken up between [the] two...[groups], there 32 rose this man Krishna, and in the Gita he tries to reconcile the 33 ceremony and the philosophy of the priests and the people. Krishna 34 is loved and worshipped in the same way as you do Christ. The 35 difference is only in the age. The Hindus keep the birthday of 36 Krishna as you do Christ's. Krishna lived five thousand years ago 37 and his life is full of miracles, some of them very similar to those in 38 the life of Christ. The child was born in prison. The father took him 39 away and put him with the shepherds. All children born in that year 40 were ordered to be killed. He was killed; that was his fate.

41 Krishna was a married man. There are thousands of books 42 about him. They do not interest me much. The Hindus are great in 43 telling stories, you see. [If] the Christian missionaries tell one story 44 from their Bible, the Hindus will produce twenty stories. You say 45 the whale swallowed Jonah; the Hindus say someone swallowed an 46 elephant. ...Since I was a child I have heard about Krishna's life. I 47 take it for granted there must have been a man called Krishna, and 48 his Gita shows he has [left] a wonderful book. I told you, you can 49 understand the character of a man by analysing the fables about 50 him. The fables have the nature [of decorations]. You must find they 51 are all polished and manipulated to fit into the character. For

1 instance, take Buddha. The central idea [is] sacrifice. There are 2 thousands of folklore, but in every case the sacrifice must have 3 been kept up. There are thousands of stories about Lincoln, about 4 some characteristic of that great man. You take all the fables and 5 find the general idea and [know] that that was the central character 6 of the man. You find in Krishna that non-attachment is the central 7 idea. He does not need anything. He does not want anything. He 8 works for work's sake. "Work for work's sake. Worship for worship's 9 sake. Do good because it is good to do good. Ask no more." That 10 must have been the character of the man. Otherwise these fables 11 could not be brought down to the one idea of non-attachment. The 12 Gita is not his only sermon. ...

13 He is the most rounded man I know of, wonderfully developed 14 equally in brain and heart and hand. Every moment [of his] is alive 15 with activity, either as a gentleman, warrior, minister, or something 16 else. Great as a gentleman, as a scholar, as a poet. This all-rounded 17 and wonderful activity and combination of brain and heart you see 18 in the Gita and other books. Most wonderful heart, exquisite 19 language, and nothing can approach it anywhere. This tremendous 20 activity of the man--the impression is still there. Five thousand 21 years have passed and he has influenced millions and millions. Just 22 think what an influence this man has over the whole world, whether 23 you know it or not. My regard for him is for his perfect sanity. No 24 cobwebs in that brain, no superstition. He knows the use of 25 everything, and when it is necessary to [assign a place to each], he 26 is there. Those that talk, go everywhere, question about the 27 mystery of the Vedas, etc., they do not know the truth. They are no 28 better than frauds. There is a place in the Vedas [even] for 29 superstition, for ignorance. The whole secret is to find out the 30 proper place for everything.

31 Then that heart! He is the first man, way before Buddha, to 32 open the door of religion to every caste. That wonderful mind! That 33 tremendously active life! Buddha's activity was on one plane, the 34 plane of teaching. He could not keep his wife and child and become 35 a teacher at the same time. Krishna preached in the midst of the 36 battlefield. "He who in the midst of intense activity finds himself in 37 the greatest calmness, and in the greatest peace finds intense 38 activity, that is the greatest [Yogi as well as the wisest man]." It 39 means nothing to this man--the flying of missiles about him. Calm 40 and sedate he goes on discussing the problems of life and death.
41 Each one of the prophets is the best commentary on his own 42 teaching. If you want to know what is meant by the doctrine of the 43 New Testament, you go to Mr. So-and-so. [But] read again and 44 again [the four Gospels and try to understand their import in the 45 light of the wonderful life of the Master as depicted there]. The 46 great men think, and you and I [also] think. But there is a 47 difference. We think and our bodies do not follow. Our actions do 48 not harmonise with our thoughts. Our words have not the power of 49 the words that become Vedas. ...Whatever they think must be 50 accomplished. If they say, "I do this," the body does it. Perfect 51 obedience. This is the end. You can think yourself God in one 52 minute, but you cannot be [God]. That is the difficulty. They become 1 what they think. We will become [only] by [degrees].

2 You see, that was about Krishna and his time. In the next 3 lecture we will know more of his book.

THE GITA II

(Delivered In San Francisco, on May 28, 1900)

The Gita requires a little preliminary introduction. The scene is laid on the battlefield of Kurukshetra. There were two branches of the same race fighting for the empire of India about five thousand years ago. The Pandavas had the right, but the Kauravas had the might. The Pandavas were five brothers, and they were living in a forest. Krishna was the friend of the Pandavas. The Kauravas would not grant them as much land as would cover the point of a needle.

The opening scene is the battlefield, and both sides see their relatives and friends--one brother on one side and another on the other side; a grandfather on one side, grandson on the other side. ...When Arjuna sees his own friends and relatives on the other side and knows that he may have to kill them, his heart gives way and he says that he will not fight. Thus begins the Gita.

For all of us in this world life is a continuous fight. ...Many a time comes when we want to interpret our weakness and cowardice as forgiveness and renunciation. There is no merit in the renunciation of a beggar. If a person who can [give a blow] forbears, there is merit in that. If a person who has, gives up, there is merit in that. We know how often in our lives through laziness and cowardice we give up the battle and try to hypnotise our minds into the belief that we are brave.

The Gita opens with this very significant verse: "Arise, O Prince! Give up this faint-heartedness, this weakness! Stand up and fight!" Then Arjuna, trying to argue the matter [with Krishna], brings higher moral ideas, how non-resistance is better than resistance, and so on. He is trying to justify himself, but he cannot fool Krishna. Krishna is the higher Self, or God. He sees through the argument at once. In this case [the motive] is weakness. Arjuna sees his own relatives and he cannot strike them. ...

There is a conflict in Arjuna's heart between his emotionalism and his duty. The nearer we are to [beasts and] birds, the more we are in the hells of emotion. We call it love. It is self-hypnotisation. We are under the control of our [emotions] like animals. A cow can sacrifice its life for its young. Every animal can. What of that? It is not the blind, birdlike emotion that leads to perfection. ...[To reach] the eternal consciousness, that is the goal of man! There emotion has no place, nor sentimentalism, nor anything that belongs to the senses--only the light of pure reason. [There] man stands as spirit.

Now, Arjuna is under the control of this emotionalism. He is not what he should be--a great self-controlled, enlightened sage working through the eternal light of reason. He has become like an animal, like a baby, just letting his heart carry away his brain, making a fool of himself and trying to cover his weakness with the flowery names of "love" and so on. Krishna sees through that. Arjuna talks like a man of little learning and brings out many reasons, but at the same time he talks the language of a fool.

"The sage is not sorry for those that are living nor for those

1 that die." [Krishna says:] "You cannot die nor can I. There was 2 never a time when we did not exist. There will never be a time
3 when we shall not exist. As in this life a man begins with childhood, 4 and [passes through youth and old age, so at death he merely 5 passes into another kind of body]. Why should a wise man be 6 sorry?" And where is the beginning of this emotionalism that has 7 got hold of you? It is in the senses. "It is the touch of the senses that 8 brings all this quality of existence: heat and cold, pleasure and pain.
9 They come and go." Man is miserable this moment, happy the next.
10 As such he cannot experience the nature of the soul. ...

11 "Existence can never be non-existence, neither can non-12 existence ever become existence. ...Know, therefore, that that 13 which pervades all this universe is without beginning or end. It is 14 unchangeable. There is nothing in the universe that can change 15 [the Changeless]. Though this body has its beginning and end, the 16 dweller in the body is infinite and without end."

17 Knowing this, stand up and fight! Not one step back, that is 18 the idea. ...Fight it out, whatever comes. Let the stars move from 19 the sphere! Let the whole world stand against us! Death means only 20 a change of garment. What of it? Thus fight! You gain nothing by 21 becoming cowards. ...Taking a step backward, you do not avoid any 22 misfortune. You have cried to all the gods in the world. Has misery 23 ceased? The masses in India cry to sixty million gods, and still die 24 like dogs. Where are these gods? ...The gods come to help you when 25 you have succeeded. So what is the use? Die game. ...This bending 26 the knee to superstitions, this selling yourself to your own mind 27 does not befit you, my soul. You are infinite, deathless, birthless.
28 Because you are infinite spirit, it does not befit you to be a 29 slave. ...Arise! Awake! Stand up and fight! Die if you must. There is 30 none to help you. You are all the world. Who can help you?

31 "Beings are unknown to our human senses before birth and 32 after death. It is only in the interim that they are manifest. What is 33 there to grieve about?

34 "Some look at It [the Self] with wonder. Some talk of It as 35 wonderful. Others hear of It as wonderful. Others, hearing of It, do 36 not understand."

37 But if you say that killing all these people is sinful, then 38 consider this from the standpoint of your own caste-duty. ..."Making 39 pleasure and misery the same, making success and defeat the 40 same, do thou stand up and fight."

41 This is the beginning of another peculiar doctrine of the Gita-- 42 the doctrine of non-attachment. That is to say, we have to bear the 43 result of our own actions because we attach ourselves to 44 them. ..."Only what is done as duty for duty's sake...can scatter the 45 bondage of Karma." There is no danger that you can overdo it. ..."If 46 you do even a little of it, [this Yoga will save you from the terrible 47 round of birth and death].

48 "Know, Arjuna, the mind that succeeds is the mind that is 49 concentrated. The minds that are taken up with two thousand 50 subjects (have) their energies dispersed. Some can talk flowery

1 language and think there is nothing beyond the Vedas. They want to 2 go to heaven. They want good things through the power of the 3 Vedas, and so they make sacrifices." Such will never attain any 4 success [in spiritual life] unless they give up all these materialistic 5 ideas.

6 That is another great lesson. Spirituality can never be 7 attained unless all material ideas are given up. ...What is in the 8 senses? The senses are all delusion. People wish to retain them [in 9 heaven] even after they are dead--a pair of eyes, a nose. Some 10 imagine they will have more organs than they have now. They want 11 to see God sitting on a throne through all eternity--the material 12 body of God. ...Such men's desires are for the body, for food and 13 drink and enjoyment. It is the materialistic life prolonged. Man 14 cannot think of anything beyond this life. This life is all for the body.
15 "Such a man never comes to that concentration which leads to 16 freedom."

17 "The Vedas only teach things belonging to the three Gunas, to 18 Sattva, Rajas, and Tamas." The Vedas only teach about things in 19 nature. People cannot think anything they do not see on earth. If 20 they talk about heaven, they think of a king sitting on a throne, of 21 people burning incense. It is all nature, nothing beyond nature. The 22 Vedas, therefore, teach nothing but nature. "Go beyond nature, 23 beyond the dualities of existence, beyond your own consciousness, 24 caring for nothing, neither for good nor for evil."

25 We have identified ourselves with our bodies. We are only 26 body, or rather, possessed of a body. If I am pinched, I cry. All this is 27 nonsense, since I am the soul. All this chain of misery, imagination, 28 animals, gods, and demons, everything, the whole world--all this 29 comes from the identification of ourselves with the body. I am spirit.
30 Why do I jump if you pinch me? ...Look at the slavery of it. Are you 31 not ashamed? We are religious! We are philosophers! We are sages!
32 Lord bless us! What are we? Living hells, that is what we are.
33 Lunatics, that is what we are!

34 We cannot give up the idea [of body]. We are earth-35 bound. ...Our ideas are burial grounds. When we leave the body we 36 are bound by thousands of elements to those [ideas].

37 Who can work without any attachment? That is the real 38 question. Such a man is the same whether his work succeeds or 39 fails. His heart does not give one false beat even if his whole life-40 work is burnt to ashes in a moment. "This is the sage who always 41 works for work's sake without caring for the results. Thus he goes 42 beyond the pain of birth and death. Thus he becomes free." Then he 43 sees that this attachment is all delusion. The Self can never be 44 attached. ...Then he goes beyond all the scriptures and 45 philosophies. If the mind is deluded and pulled into a whirlpool by 46 books and scriptures, what is the good of all these scriptures? One 47 says this, another says that. What book shall you take? Stand alone!
48 See the glory of your won soul, and see that you will have to work.
49 Then you will become a man of firm will.

50 Arjuna asks: "Who is a person of established will?"

1 [Krishna answers:] "The man who has given up all desires, 2 who desires nothing, not even this life, nor freedom, nor gods, nor 3 work, nor anything. When he has become perfectly satisfied, he has 4 no more cravings." He has seen the glory of the Self and has found 5 that the world, and the gods, and heaven are...within his own Self.
6 Then the gods become no gods; death becomes no death; life 7 becomes no life. Everything has changed. "A man is said to be 8 [illumined] if his will has become firm, if his mind is not disturbed 9 by misery, if he does not desire any happiness, if he is free of all 10 [attachment], of all fear, of all anger. ...

11 "As the tortoise can draw in his legs, and if you strike him, not 12 one foot comes out, even so the sage can draw all his sense-organs 13 inside," and nothing can force them out. Nothing can shake him, no 14 temptation or anything. Let the universe tumble about him, it does 15 not make one single ripple in his mind.

16 Then comes a very important question. Sometimes people fast 17 for days. ...When the worst man has fasted for twenty days, he 18 becomes quite gentle. Fasting and torturing themselves have been 19 practised by people all over the world. Krishna's idea is that this is 20 all nonsense. He says that the senses will for the moment recede 21 from the man who tortures himself, but will emerge again with 22 twenty times more [power]. ...What should you do? The idea is to be 23 natural--no asceticism. Go on, work, only mind that you are not 24 attached. The will can never be fixed strongly in the man who has 25 not learnt and practised the secret of non-attachment.

26 I go out and open my eyes. If something is there, I must see 27 it. I cannot help it. The mind runs after the senses. Now the senses 28 must give up any reaction to nature.

29 "Where it is dark night for the [sense-bound] world, the self 30 controlled [man] is awake. It is daylight for him. ...And where the 31 world is awake, the sage sleeps." Where is the world awake? In the 32 senses. People want to eat and drink and have children, and then 33 they die a dog's death. ...They are always awake for the senses.
34 Even their religion is just for that. They invent a God to help them, 35 to give them more women, more money, more children--never a God 36 to help them become more godlike! "Where the whole world is 37 awake, the sage sleeps. But where the ignorant are asleep, there 38 the sage keeps awake"--in the world of light where man looks upon 39 himself not as a bird, not as an animal, not as a body, but as infinite 40 spirit, deathless, immortal.

41 There, where the ignorant are asleep, and do not have time, 42 nor intellect, nor power to understand, there the sage is awake.
43 That is daylight for him.

44 "As all the rivers of the world constantly pour their waters 45 into the ocean, but the ocean's grand, majestic nature remains 46 undisturbed and unchanged, so even though all the senses bring in 47 sensations from nature, the ocean-like heart of the sage knows no 48 disturbance, knows no fear." Let miseries come in millions of rivers 49 and happiness in hundreds! I am no slave to misery! I am no slave 50 to happiness!

THE GITA III

(Delivered in San Francisco, on May 29, 1900)

Arjuna asks: "You just advised action, and yet you uphold knowledge of Brahman as the highest form of life. Krishna, if you think that knowledge is better than action, why do you tell me to act?"

[Shri Krishna]: "From ancient times these two systems have come down to us. The Sankhya philosophers advance the theory of knowledge. The Yogis advance the theory of work. But none can attain to peace by renouncing actions. None in this life can stop activity even for a moment. Nature's qualities [Gunas] will make him act. He who stops his activities and at the same time is still thinking about them attains to nothing; he only becomes a hypocrite. But he who by the power of his mind gradually brings his sense-organs under control, employing them in work, that man is better. Therefore do thou work."...

"Even if you have known the secret that you have no duty, that you are free, still you have to work for the good of others. Because whatever a great man does, ordinary people will do also. If a great man who has attained peace of mind and freedom ceases to work, then all the rest without that knowledge and peace will try to imitate him, and thus confusion would arise.

"Behold, Arjuna, there is nothing that I do not possess and nothing that I want to acquire. And yet I continue to work. If I stopped work for a moment, the whole universe would [be destroyed]. That which the ignorant do with desire for results and gain, let the wise do without any attachment and without any desire for results and gain."

Even is you have knowledge, do not disturb the childlike faith of the ignorant. On the other hand, go down to their level and gradually bring them up. That is a very powerful idea, and it has become the ideal in India. That is why you can see a great philosopher going into a temple and worshipping images. It is not hypocrisy.

Later on we read what Krishna says, "Even those who worship other deities are really worshipping me." It is God incarnate whom man is worshipping. Would God be angry if you called Him by the wrong name? He would be no God at all! Can't you understand that whatever a man has in his own heart is God--even if he worships a stone? What of that!

We will understand more clearly if we once get rid of the idea that religion consists in doctrines. One idea of religion has been that the whole world was born because Adam ate the apple, and there is no way of escape. Believe in Jesus Christ--in a certain man's death! But in India there is quite a different idea. [There] religion means realisation, nothing else. It does not matter whether one approaches the destination in a carriage with four horses, in an electric car, or rolling on the ground. The goal is the same. For the [Christians] the problem is how to escape the wrath of the terrible God. For the Indians it is how to become what they really are, to

1 regain their lost Selfhood. ...

2 Have you realised that you are spirit? When you say, "I do," 3 what is meant by that--this lump of flesh called the body or the 4 spirit, the infinite, ever blessed, effulgent, immortal? You may be 5 the greatest philosopher, but as long as you have the idea that you 6 are the body, you are no better than the little worm crawling under 7 your foot! No excuse for you! So much the worse for you that you 8 know all the philosophies and at the same time think you are the 9 body! Body-gods, that is what you are! Is that religion?

10 Religion is the realisation of spirit as spirit. What are we 11 doing now? Just the opposite, realising spirit as matter. Out of the 12 immortal God we manufacture death and matter, and out of dead 13 dull matter we manufacture spirit. ...

14 If you [can realise Brahman] by standing on your head, or on 15 one foot, or by worshipping five thousand gods with three heads 16 each--welcome to it! ...Do it any way you can! Nobody has any right 17 to say anything. Therefore, Krishna says, if your method is better 18 and higher, you have no business to say that another man's method 19 is bad, however wicked you may think it.

20 Again, we must consider, religion is a [matter of] growth, not 21 a mass of foolish words. Two thousand years ago a man saw God.
22 Moses saw God in a burning bush. Does what Moses did when he 23 saw God save you? No man's seeing God can help you the least bit 24 except that it may excite you and urge you to do the same thing.
25 That is the whole value of the ancients' examples. Nothing more.
26 [Just] signposts on the way. No man's eating can satisfy another 27 man. No man's seeing God can save another man. You have to see 28 God yourself. All these people fighting about what God's nature is-- 29 whether He has three heads in one body or five heads in six bodies.
30 Have you seen God? No. ...And they do not believe they can ever 31 see Him. What fools we mortals be! Sure, lunatics!

32 [In India] it has come down as a tradition that if there is a 33 God, He must be your God and my God.

34 To whom does the sun belong! You say Uncle Sam is 35 everybody's uncle. If there is an God, you ought to be able to see 36 Him. If not, let Him go.

37 Each one thinks his method is best. Very good! But remember, 38 it may be good for you . One food which is very indigestible to one 39 is very digestible to another. Because it is good for you, do not jump 40 to the conclusion that your method is everybody's method, that 41 Jack's coat fits John and Mary. All the uneducated, uncultured, 42 unthinking men and women have been put into that sort of strait 43 jacket! Think for yourselves. Become atheists! Become materialists!
44 That would be better. Exercise the mind! ...What right have you to 45 say that this man's method is wrong? It may be wrong for you. That 46 is to say, if you undertake the method, you will be degraded; but 47 that does not mean that he will be degraded. Therefore, says 48 Krishna, if you have knowledge and see a man weak, do not 49 condemn him. Go to his level and help him if you can. He must 50 grow. I can put five bucketfuls of knowledge into his head in five

1 hours. But what good will it do? He will be a little worse than 2 before.

3 Whence comes all this bondage of action? Because we chain
4 the soul with action. According to our Indian system, there are two 5 existences: nature on the one side and the Self, the Atman, on the 6 other. By the word nature is meant not only all this external world, 7 but also our bodies, the mind, the will, even down to what says "I".
8 Beyond all that is the infinite life and light of the soul--the Self, the 9 Atman. ...According to this philosophy the Self is entirely separate 10 from nature, always was and always will be. ...There never was a 11 time when the spirit could be identified even with the mind. ...

12 It is self-evident that the food you eat is manufacturing the 13 mind all the time. It is matter. The Self is above any connection with 14 food. Whether you eat or not does not matter. Whether you think or 15 not...does not matter. It is infinite light. Its light is the same always.
16 If you put a blue or a green glass [before a light], what has that to 17 do with the light? Its colour is unchangeable. It is the mind which 18 changes and gives the different colours. The moment the spirit 19 leaves the body, the whole thing goes to pieces.

20 The reality in nature is spirit. Reality itself--the light of the 21 spirit--moves and speaks and does everything [through our bodies, 22 minds, etc.]. It is the energy and soul and life of the spirit that is 23 being worked upon in different ways by matter... The spirit is the 24 cause of all our thoughts and body-action and everything, but it is 25 untouched by good or evil, pleasure or pain, heat or cold, and all 26 the dualism of nature, although it lends its light to everything.

27 "Therefore, Arjuna, all these actions are in nature. Nature ...is 28 working out her own laws in our bodies and minds. We identify 29 ourselves with nature and say, 'I am doing this.' This way delusion 30 seizes us."

31 We always act under some compulsion. When hunger compels 32 me, I eat. And suffering is still worse--slavery. That real "I" is 33 eternally free. What can compel it to do anything? The sufferer is in 34 nature. It is only when we identify ourselves with the body that we 35 say, "I am suffering; I am Mr. So-and-so"--all such nonsense. But he 36 who has known the truth, holds himself aloof. Whatever his body 37 does, whatever his mind does, he does not care. But mind you, the 38 vast majority of mankind are under this delusion; and whenever 39 they do any good, they feel that they are [the doers]. They are not 40 yet able to understand higher philosophy. Do not disturb their faith!
41 They are shunning evil and doing good. Great idea! Let them have 42 it!...They are workers for good. By degrees they will think that 43 there is greater glory than that of doing good. They will only 44 witness, and things are done. ...Gradually they will understand.
45 When they have shunned all evil and done all good, then they will 46 begin to realise that they are beyond all nature. They are not the 47 doers. They stand [apart]. They are the ...witness. They simply 48 stand and look. Nature is begetting all the universe. ...They turn 49 their backs. "In the beginning, O beloved, there only existed that 50 Existence. Nothing else existed. And That [brooding], everything 51 else was created."

1 "Even those who know the path act impelled by their own
2 nature. Everyone acts according to his nature. He cannot transcend 3 it." The atom cannot disobey the law. Whether it is the mental or the 4 physical atom, it must obey the law. "What is the use of [external 5 restraint]?"

6 What makes the value of anything in life? Not enjoyment, not 7 possessions. Analyse everything. You will find there is no value 8 except in experience, to teach us something. And in many cases it is 9 our hardships that give us better experience than enjoyment. Many 10 times blows give us better experience than the caresses of 11 nature. ...Even famine has its place and value. ...

12 According to Krishna, we are not new beings just come into 13 existence. Our minds are not new minds. ...In modern times we all 14 know that every child brings [with him] all the past, not only of 15 humanity, but of the plant life. There are all the past chapters, and 16 this present chapter, and there are a whole lot of future chapters 17 before him. Everyone has his path mapped and sketched and 18 planned out for him. And in spite of all this darkness, there cannot 19 be anything uncaused--no event, no circumstance. ...It is simply our 20 ignorance. The whole infinite chain of causation...is bound one link 21 to another back to nature. The whole universe is bound by that sort 22 of chain. It is the universal [chain of] cause and effect, you 23 receiving one link, one part, I another...And that [part] is our own 24 nature.

25 Now Shri Krishna says: "Better die in your own path than 26 attempt the path of another." This is my path, and I am down here.
27 And you are way up there, and I am always tempted to give up my 28 path thinking I will go there and be with you. And if I go up, I am 29 neither there nor here. We must not lose sight of this doctrine. It is 30 all [a matter of] growth. Wait and grow, and you attain everything; 31 otherwise there will be [great spiritual danger]. Here is the 32 fundamental secret of teaching religion.

33 What do you mean by "saving people" and all believing in the 34 same doctrine? It cannot be. There are the general ideas that can 35 be taught to mankind. The true teacher will be able to find out for 36 you what your own nature is. Maybe you do not know it. It is 37 possible that what you think is your own nature is all wrong. It has 38 not developed to consciousness. The teacher is the person who 39 ought to know...He ought to know by a glance at your face and put 40 you on [your path]. We grope about and struggle here and there 41 and do all sorts of things and make no progress until the time 42 comes when we fall into that life-current and are carried on. The 43 sign is that the moment we are in that stream we will float. Then 44 there is no more struggle. This is to be found out. Then die in that 45 [path] rather than giving it up and taking hold of another.

46 Instead, we start a religion and make a set of dogmas and 47 betray the goal of mankind and treat everyone [as having] the same 48 nature. No two persons have the same mind or the same body. ...No 49 two persons have the same religion....

50 If you want to be religious, enter not the gate of any 51 organised religions. They do a hundred times more evil than good,

1 because they stop the growth of each one's individual development.
2 Study everything, but keep your own seat firm. If you take my 3 advice, do not put your neck into the trap. The moment they try to 4 put their noose on you, get your neck out and go somewhere else.
5 [As] the bee culling honey from many flowers remains free, not 6 bound by any flower, be not bound. ...Enter not the door of any 7 organised religion. [Religion] is only between you and your God, 8 and no third person must come between you. Think what these 9 organised religions have done! What Napoleon was more terrible 10 than these religious persecutions? ...If you and I organise, we begin 11 to hate every person. It is better not to love, if loving only means 12 hating others. That is no love. That is hell! If loving your own people 13 means hating everybody else, it is the quintessence of selfishness 14 and brutality, and the effect is that it will make you brutes.
15 Therefore, better die working out your own natural religion than 16 following another's natural religion, however great it may appear to 17 you.

18 "Beware, Arjuna, lust and anger are the great enemies. These 19 are to be controlled. These cover the knowledge even of those [who 20 are wise]. This fire of lust is unquenchable. Its location is in the 21 sense-organs and in the mind. The Self desires nothing.

22 "This Yoga I taught in ancient times [to Vivaswan; Vivaswan 23 taught it to Manu]. ...Thus it was that the knowledge descended 24 from one thing to another. But in time this great Yoga was 25 destroyed. That is why I am telling it to you again today."

26 Then Arjuna asks, "Why do you speak thus? You are a man 27 born only the other day, and [Vivaswan was born long before you].
28 What do you mean that you taught him?"

29 Then Krishna says, "O Arjuna, you and I have run the cycle of 30 births and deaths many times, but you are not conscious of them all.
31 I am without beginning, birthless, the absolute Lord of all creation.
32 I through my own nature take form. Whenever virtue subsides and 33 wickedness prevails, I come to help mankind. For the salvation of 34 the good, for the destruction of wickedness, for the establishment 35 of spirituality I come from time to time. Whosoever wants to reach 36 me through whatsoever ways, I reach him through that. But know, 37 Arjuna, none can ever swerve from my path." None ever did. How 38 can we? None swerves from His path.

39 ...All societies are based upon bad generalisation. The law
40 can only be formed upon perfect generalisation. What is the old 41 saying: Every law has its exception? ...If it is a law, it cannot be 42 broken. None can break it. Does the apple break the law of 43 gravitation? The moment a law is broken, no more universe exists.
44 There will come a time when you will break the law, and that 45 moment your consciousness, mind, and body will melt away.

46 There is a man stealing there. Why does he steal? You punish 47 him. Why can you not make room for him and put his energy to 48 work? ...You say, "You are a sinner," and many will say he has 49 broken the law. All this herd of mankind is forced [into uniformity]
50 and hence all trouble, sin, and weakness. ...The world is not as bad 51 as you think. It is we fools who have made it evil. We manufacture

1 our own ghosts and demons, and then...we cannot get rid of them.
2 We put our hands before our eyes and cry: "Somebody give us 3 light." Fools! Take your hands from your eyes! That is all there is to 4 it. ...We call upon the gods to save us and nobody blames himself.
5 That is the pity of it. Why is there so much evil in society? What is it 6 they say? Flesh and the devil and the woman. Why make these 7 things [up]? Nobody asks you to make them [up]. "None, O Arjuna, 8 can swerve from my path." We are fools, and our paths are foolish.
9 We have to go through all this Maya. God made the heaven, and 10 man made the hell for himself.

11 "No action can touch me. I have no desire for the results of 12 action. Whosoever knows me thus knows the secret and is not 13 bound by action. The ancient sages, knowing this secret [could 14 safely engage in action]. Do thou work in the same fashion.

15 "He who sees in the midst of intense activity, intense calm, 16 and in the midst of intensest peace is intensely active [is wise 17 indeed]. ...This is the question: With every sense and every organ 18 active, have you that tremendous peace [so that] nothing can 19 disturb you? Standing on Market Street, waiting for the car with all 20 the rush...going on around you, are you in meditation--calm and 21 peaceful? In the cave, are you intensely active there with all quiet 22 about you? If you are, you are a Yogi, otherwise not.

23 "[The seers call him wise] whose every attempt is free, 24 without any desire for gain, without any selfishness." Truth can 25 never come to us as long as we are selfish. We colour everything 26 with our own selves.

27 Things come to us as they are. Not that they are hidden, not 28 at all! We hide them. We have the brush. A thing comes, and we do 29 not like it, and we brush a little and then look at it. ..We do not want 30 to know. We paint everything with ourselves. In all action the motive 31 power is selfishness. Everything is hidden by ourselves. We are like 32 the caterpillar which takes the thread out of his own body and of 33 that makes the cocoon, and behold, he is caught. By his own work 34 he imprisons himself. That is what we are doing. The moment I say 35 "me" the thread makes a turn. "I and mine," another turn. So it 36 goes. ...

37 We cannot remain without action for a moment. Act! But just 38 as when your neighbour asks you, "Come and help me!" have you 39 exactly the same idea when you are helping yourself. No more. Your 40 body is of no more value than that of John. Don't do anything more 41 for your body than you do for John. That is religion.

42 "He whose efforts are bereft of all desire and selfishness has 43 burnt all this bondage of action with the fire of knowledge. He is 44 wise." Reading books cannot do that. The ass can be burdened with 45 the whole library; that does not make him learned at all. What is the 46 use of reading many books? "Giving up all attachment to work, 47 always satisfied, not hoping for gain, the wise man acts and is 48 beyond action." ...

49 Naked I came out of my mother's womb and naked I return.
50 Helpless I came and helpless I go. Helpless I am now. And we do

1 not know [the goal]. It is terrible for us to think about it. We get 2 such odd ideas! We go to a medium and see if the ghost can help us.
3 Think of the weakness! Ghosts, devils, gods, anybody--come on! And 4 all the priests, all the charlatans! That is just the time they get hold 5 of us, the moment we are weak. Then they bring in all the gods.

6 I see in my country a man becomes strong, educated, 7 becomes a philosopher, and says, "All this praying and bathing is 8 nonsense." ...The man's father dies, and his mother dies. That is the 9 most terrible shock a Hindu can have. You will find him bathing in 10 every dirty pool, going into the temple, licking the dust. ...Help 11 anyone! But we are helpless. There is no help from anyone. That is 12 the truth. There have been more gods than human beings; and yet 13 no help. We die like dogs--no help. Everywhere beastliness, famine, 14 disease, misery, evil! And all are crying for help. But no help. And 15 yet, hoping against hope, we are still screaming for help. Oh, the 16 miserable condition! Oh, the terror of it! Look into your own heart!
17 One half of [the trouble] is not our fault, but the fault of our 18 parents. Born with this weakness, more and more of it was put into 19 our heads. Step by step we go beyond it.

20 It is a tremendous error to feel helpless. Do not seek help 21 from anyone. We are our own help. If we cannot help ourselves, 22 there is none to help us. ..."Thou thyself art thy only friend, thou 23 thyself thy only enemy. There is no other enemy but this self of 24 mine, no other friend by myself." This is the last and greatest 25 lesson, and Oh, what a time it takes to learn it! We seem to get hold 26 of it, and the next moment the old wave comes. The backbone 27 breaks. We weaken and again grasp for that superstition and help.
28 Just think of that huge mass of misery, and all caused by this false 29 idea of going to seek for help!

30 Possibly the priest says his routine words and expects 31 something. Sixty thousand people look to the skies and pray and 32 pay the priest. Month after month they still look, still pay and 33 pray. ...Think of that! Is it not lunacy? What else is it? Who is 34 responsible? You may preach religion, but to excite the minds of 35 undeveloped children...! You will have to suffer for that. In your 36 heart of hearts, what are you? For every weakening thought you 37 have put into anybody's head you will have to pay with compound 38 interest. The law of Karma must have its pound of flesh. ...

39 There is only one sin. That is weakness. When I was a boy I 40 read Milton's Paradise Lost. The only good man I had any respect 41 for was Satan. The only saint is that soul that never weakens, faces 42 everything, and determines to die game.

43 Stand up and die game! ... Do not add one lunacy to another.
44 Do not add your weakness to the evil that is going to come. That is 45 all I have to say to the world. Be strong! ...You talk of ghosts and 46 devils. We are the living devils. The sign of life is strength and 47 growth. The sign of death is weakness. Whatever is weak, avoid! It 48 is death. If it is strength, go down into hell and get hold of it! There 49 is salvation only for the brave. "None but the brave deserves the 50 fair." None but the bravest deserves salvation. Whose hell? Whose 51 torture? Whose sin? Whose weakness? Whose death? Whose 1 disease?

2 You believe in God. If you do, believe in the real God. "Thou 3 are the man, thou the woman, thou the young man walking in the 4 strength of youth, ...thou the old man tottering with his stick." Thou 5 art weakness. Thou art fear. Thou art heaven, and Thou art hell.
6 Thou art the serpent that would sting. Come thou as fear! Come 7 thou as death! Come thou as misery! ...

8 All weakness, all bondage is imagination. Speak one word to 9 it, it must vanish. Do not weaken! There is no other way 10 out. ...Stand up and be strong! No fear.

11 No superstition. Face the truth as it is! If death comes--that is 12 the worst of our miseries--let it come! We are determined to die 13 game. That is all the religion I know. I have not attained to it, but I 14 am struggling to do it. I may not, but you may. Go on!

15 Where one sees another, one hears another, so long as there 16 are two, there must be fear, and fear is the mother of all [misery].
17 Where none sees another, where it is all One, there is none to be 18 miserable, none to be unhappy. [There is only] the One without a 19 second. Therefore be not afraid. Awake, arise, and stop not till the 20 goal is reached!

MOHAMMED

(Delivered on March 25, 1900, in the San Francisco Bay Area)

The ancient message of Krishna is one harmonising three-- Buddha's, Christ's, and Mohammed's. Each of the three started an idea and carried it to its extreme. Krishna antedates all the other prophets. [Yet, we might say,] Krishna takes the old ideas and synthesises them, [although] his is the most ancient message. His message was for the time being submerged by the advance wave of Buddhism. Today it is the message peculiar to India. If you will have it so, this afternoon I will take Mohammed and bring out the particular work of the great Arabian prophet. ...

Mohammed [as] a young man...did not [seem to] care much for religion. He was inclined to make money. He was considered a nice young man and very handsome. There was a rich widow. She fell in love with this young man, and they married. When Mohammed had become emperor over the larger part of the world, the Roman and Persian empires were all under his feet, and he had a number of wives. When one day he was asked which wife he liked best, he pointed to his first wife: "Because she believed [in] me first." Women have faith. ...Gain independence, gain everything, but do not lose that characteristic of women! ...

Mohammed's heart was sick at the sin, idolatry and mock worship, superstitions and human sacrifices, and so on. The Jews were degraded by the Christians. On the other hand, the Christians were worse degraded than his own countrymen.

We are always in the hurry. [But] if any great work is to be done, there must be great preparation. ...After much praying, day and night, Mohammed began to have dreams and visions. Gabriel appeared to him in a dream and told him that he was the messenger of truth. He told him that the message of Jesus, of Moses, and all the prophets would be lost and asked him to go and preach. Seeing the Christians preaching politics in the name of Jesus, seeing the Persians preaching dualism, Mohammed said:
"Our God is one God. He is the Lord of all that exists. There is no comparison between Him and any other."

God is God. There is no philosophy, no complicated code of ethics. "Our God is one without a second, and Mohammed is the Prophet." ...Mohammed began to preach it in the streets of Mecca. ...They began to persecute him, and he fled into the city of [Medina]. He began to fight, and the whole race became united.
[Mohammedanism] deluged the world in the name of the Lord. The tremendous conquering power! ...

You...people {Americans} have very hard ideas and are so superstitious and prejudiced! These messengers must have come from God, else how could they have been so great? You look at every defect. Each one of us has his defects. Who hasn't? I can point out many defects in the Jews. The wicked are always looking for defects. ...Flies come and seek for the [ulcer], and bees come only for the honey in the flower. Do not follow the way of the fly but that of the bee. ...

1 Mohammed married quite a number of wives afterwards.
2 Great men may marry two hundred wives each. "Giants" like you, I 3 would not allow to marry one wife. The characters of the great 4 souls are mysterious, their methods past our finding out. We must 5 not judge them. Christ may judge Mohammed. Who are you and I?
6 Little babies. What do we understand of these great souls? ...

7 [Mohammedanism] came as a message for the masses. ...The 8 first message was equality. ...There is one religion--love. No more 9 question of race, colour, [or] anything else. Join it! That practical 10 quality carried the day. ...The great message was perfectly simple.
11 Believe in one God, the creator of heaven and earth. All was 12 created out of nothing by Him. Ask no questions. ...

13 Their temples are like Protestant churches, ...no music, no 14 paintings, no pictures. A pulpit in the corner; on that lies the Koran.
15 The people all stand in line. No priest, no person{parson?}, no 16 bishop. ...The man who prays must stand at the side of the 17 audience. Some parts are beautiful. ...

18 These old people were all messengers of God. I fall down and 19 worship them; I take the dust of their feet. But they are dead! ...And 20 we are alive. We must go ahead! ...Religion is not an imitation of 21 Jesus or Mohammed. Even if an imitation is good, it is never 22 genuine. Be not an imitation of Jesus, but be Jesus. You are quite as 23 great as Jesus, Buddha, or anybody else. If we are not...we must 24 struggle and be. I would not be exactly like Jesus. It is unnecessary 25 that I should be born a Jew. ...

26 The greatest religion is to be true to your own nature. Have 27 faith in yourselves! If you do not exist, how can God exist, or 28 anybody else? Wherever you are, it is this mind that perceives even 29 the Infinite. I see God, therefore He exists. If I cannot think of God, 30 He does not exist [for me]. This is the grand march of our human 31 progress.

32 These [great souls] are signposts on the way. That is all they 33 are. They say, "Onward, brothers!" We cling to them; we never want 34 to move. We do not want to think; we want others to think for us.
35 The messengers fulfil their mission. They ask to be up and doing. A 36 hundred years later we cling to the message and go to sleep.

37 Talking about faith and belief and doctrine is easy, but it is so 38 difficult to build character and to stem the tide of the senses. We 39 succumb. We become hypocrites. ...

40 [Religion] is not a doctrine, [not] a rule. It is a process. That is 41 all. [Doctrines and rules] are all for exercise. By that exercise we 42 get strong and at last break the bonds and become free. Doctrine is 43 of no use except for gymnastics. ...Through exercise the soul
44 becomes perfect. That exercise is stopped when you say, "I believe."
45 ...

46 "Whenever virtue subsides and immorality abounds, I take 47 human form. In every age I come for the salvation of the good, for 48 the destruction of the wicked, for the establishment of spirituality.
49 '...

1 [Such] are the great messengers of light. They are our great 2 teachers, our elder brothers. But we must go our own way!

VILVAMANGALA

This is a story from one of the books of India, called "Lives of Saints". There was a young man, a Brahmin by birth, in a certain village. The man fell in love with a bad woman in another village. There was a big river between the two villages, and this man, every day, used to go to that girl, crossing this river in a ferry boat. Now, one day he had to perform the obsequies of his father, and so, although he was longing, almost dying to go to the girl, he could not. The ceremonies had to be performed, and all those things had to be undergone; it is absolutely necessary in Hindu society. He was fretting and fuming and all that, but could not help it. At last the ceremony ended, and night came, and with the night, a tremendous howling storm arose. The rain was pouring down, and the river was lashed into gigantic waves. It was very dangerous to cross. Yet he went to the bank of the river. There was no ferry boat. The ferrymen were afraid to cross, but he would go; his heart was becoming mad with love for the girl, so he would go. There was a log floating down, and he got that, and with the help of it, crossed the river, and getting to the other side dragged the log up, threw it on the bank, and went to the house. The doors were closed. He knocked at the door, but the wind was howling, and nobody heard him. So he went round the walls and at last found what he thought to be a rope, hanging from the wall. He clutched at it, saying to himself, "Oh, my love has left a rope for me to climb." By the help of that rope he climbed over the wall, got to the other side, missed his footing, and fell, and the noise aroused the inmates of the house, and the girl came out and found the man there in a faint. She revived him, and noticing that he was smelling very unpleasantly, she said, "What is the matter with you? Why this stench on your body? How did you come into the house?" He said, "Why, did not my love put that rope there?" She smiled, and said, "What love? We are for money, and do you think that I let down a rope for you, fool that you are? How did you cross the river?" "Why, I got hold of a log of wood." "Let us go and see," said the girl. The rope was a cobra, a tremendously poisonous serpent, whose least touch is death. It had its head in a hole, and was getting in when the man caught hold of its tail, and he thought it was a rope. The madness of love made him do it. When the serpent has its head in its hole, and its body out, and you catch hold of it, it will not let its head come out; so the man climbed up by it, but the force of the pull killed the serpent. "Where did you get the log?" "It was floating down the river." It was a festering dead body; the stream had washed it down and that he took for a log, which explained why he had such an unpleasant odour. The woman looked at him and said, "I never believed in love; we never do; but, if this is not love, the Lord have mercy on me. We do not know what love is. But, my friend, why do you give that heart to a woman like me? Why do you not give it to God? You will be perfect." It was a thunderbolt to the man's brain. He got a glimpse of the beyond for a moment. "Is there a God?" "Yes, yes, my friend, there is," said the woman. And the man walked on, went into a forest, began to weep and pray. "I want Thee, Oh Lord! This tide of my love cannot find a receptacle in little human beings. I want to love where this mighty river of my love can go, the ocean of love;

1 this rushing tremendous river of my love cannot enter into little 2 pools, it wants the infinite ocean. Thou art there; come Thou to me."
3 So he remained there for years. After years he thought he had 4 succeeded, he became a Sannyasin and he came into the cities. One 5 day he was sitting on the bank of a river, at one of the bathing 6 places, and a beautiful young girl, the wife of a merchant of the city, 7 with her servant, came and passed the place. The old man was 8 again up in him, the beautiful face again attracted him. The Yogi 9 looked and looked, stood up and followed the girl to her home.
10 Presently the husband came by, and seeing the Sannyasin in the 11 yellow garb he said to him, "Come in, sir, what can I do for you?"
12 The Yogi said, "I will ask you a terrible thing." "Ask anything, sir, I 13 am a Grihastha (householder), and anything that one asks I am 14 ready to give." "I want to see your wife." The man said, "Lord, what 15 is this! Well, I am pure, and my wife is pure, and the Lord is a 16 protection to all. Welcome; come in sir." He came in, and the 17 husband introduced him to his wife. "What can I do for you?" asked 18 the lady. He looked and looked, and then said, "Mother, will you 19 give me two pins from your hair?" "Here they are." He thrust them 20 into his two eyes saying, "Get away, you rascals! Henceforth no 21 fleshy things for you. If you are to see, see the Shepherd of the 22 groves of Vrindaban with the eyes of the soul. Those are all the eyes 23 you have." So he went back into the forest. There again he wept 24 and wept and wept. It was all that great flow of love in the man that 25 was struggling to get at the truth, and at last he succeeded; he gave 26 his soul, the river of his love, the right direction, and it came to the 27 Shepherd. The story goes that he saw God in the form of Krishna.
28 Then, for once, he was sorry that he had lost his eyes, and that he 29 could only have the internal vision. He wrote some beautiful poems 30 of love. In all Sanskrit books, the writers first of all salute their 31 Gurus. So he saluted that girl as his first Guru.

THE SOUL AND GOD

(Delivered in San Francisco, March 23, 1900)

Whether it was fear or mere inquisitiveness which first led man to think of powers superior to himself, we need not discuss. ...These raised in the mind peculiar worship tendencies, and so on. There never have been [times in the history of mankind] without [some ideal] of worship. Why? What makes us all struggle for something beyond what we see--whether it be a beautiful morning or a fear of dead spirits? ...We need not go back into prehistoric times, for it is a fact present today as it was two thousand years ago. We do not find satisfaction here. Whatever our station in life--[even if we are] powerful and wealthy--we cannot find satisfaction.

Desire is infinite. Its fulfilment is very limited. There is no end to our desires; but when we go to fulfil them, the difficulty comes. It has been so with the most primitive minds, when their desires were [few]. Even [these] could not be accomplished. Now, with our arts and sciences improved and multiplied, our desires cannot be fulfilled [either]. On the other hand, we are struggling to perfect means for the fulfilment of desires, and the desires are increasing. ...

The most primitive man naturally wanted help from outside for things which he could not accomplish. ...He desired something, and it could not be obtained. He wanted help from other powers. The most ignorant and primitive man and the most cultivated man today, each appealing to God and asking for the fulfilment of some desire, are exactly the same. What difference? [Some people] find a great deal of difference. We are always finding much difference in things when there is no difference at all. Both [the primitive man and the cultivated man] plead to the same [power]. You may call it God or Allah or Jehovah. Human beings want something and cannot get it by their own powers, and are after someone who will help them. This is primitive, and it is still present with us. ...We are all born savages and gradually civilise ourselves. ...All of us here, if we search, will find the same fact. Even now this fear does not leave us. We may talk big, become philosophers and all that; but when the blow comes, we find that we must beg for help. We believe in all the superstitions that ever existed. [But] there is no superstition in the world [that does not have some basis of truth]. If I cover my face and only the tip of my [nose] is showing, still it is a bit of my face. So [with] the superstitions--the little bits are true.

You see, the lowest sort of manifestation of religion came with the burial of the departed. ...First they wrapped them up and put them in mounds, and the spirits of the departed came and lived in the [mounds, at night]. ...Then they began to bury them. ...At the gate stands a terrible goddess with a thousand teeth. ...Then [came] the burning of the body and the flames bore the spirit up. ...The Egyptians brought food and water for the departed.

The next great idea was that of the tribal gods. This tribe had one god and that tribe another. The Jews had their God Jehovah, who was their own tribal god and fought against all the other gods

1 and tribes. That god would do anything to please his own people. If 2 he killed a whole tribe not protected by him, that was all right, 3 quite good. A little love was given, but that love was confined to a 4 small section.

5 Gradually, higher ideals came. The chief of the conquering
6 tribe was the Chief of chiefs, God of gods. ...So with the Persians 7 when they conquered Egypt. The Persian emperor was the Lord of 8 [lords], and before the emperor nobody could stand. Death was the 9 penalty for anyone who looked at the Persian emperor.

10 Then came the ideal of God Almighty and All-powerful, the 11 omnipotent, omniscient Ruler of the universe: He lives in heaven, 12 and man pays special tribute to his Most Beloved, who creates 13 everything for man. The whole world is for man. The sun and moon 14 and stars are [for him]. All who have those ideas are primitive men, 15 not civilised and not cultivated at all. All the superior religions had 16 their growth between the Ganga and the Euphrates. ...Outside of 17 India we will find no further development [of religion beyond this 18 idea of God in heaven]. That was the highest knowledge ever 19 obtained outside of India. There is the local heaven where he is and 20 [where] the faithful shall go when they die. ...As far as I have seen, 21 we should call it a very primitive idea. ...Mumbo jumbo in Africa
22 [and] God in heaven--the same. He moves the world, and of course 23 his will is being done everywhere. ...

24 The old Hebrew people did not care for any heaven. That is 25 one of the reasons they [opposed] Jesus of Nazareth--because he 26 taught life after death. Paradise in Sanskrit means land beyond this 27 life. So the paradise was to make up for all this evil. The primitive 28 man does not care [about] evil. ...He never questions why there 29 should be any. ...

30 ...The word devil is a Persian word. ...The Persians and 31 Hindus [share the Aryan ancestry] upon religious grounds, 32 and...they spoke the same language, only the words one sect uses 33 for good the other uses for bad. The word Deva is an old Sanskrit 34 word for God, the same word in the Aryan languages. Here the 35 word means the devil. ...

36 Later on, when man developed [his inner life], he began to 37 question, and to say that God is good. The Persians said that there 38 were two gods--one was bad and one was good. [Their idea was 39 that] everything in this life was good: beautiful country, where there 40 was spring almost the whole year round and nobody died; there 41 was no disease, everything was fine. Then came this Wicked One, 42 and he touched the land, and then came death and disease and 43 mosquitoes and tigers and lions. Then the Aryans left their 44 fatherland and migrated southward. The old Aryans must have lived 45 way to the north. The Jews learnt it [the idea of the devil] from the 46 Persians. The Persians also taught that there will come a day when 47 this wicked god will be killed, and it is our duty to stay with the 48 good god and add our force to him in this eternal struggle between 49 him and the wicked one. ...The whole world will be burnt out and 50 everyone will get a new body.

51 The Persian idea was that even the wicked will be purified

1 and not be bad any more. The nature of the Aryan was love and 2 poetry. They cannot think of their being burnt [for eternity]. They 3 will all receive new bodies. Then no more death. So that is the best 4 about [religious] ideas outside of India. ...

5 Along with that is the ethical strain. All that man has to do is 6 to take care of three things: good thought, good word, good deed.
7 That is all. It is a practical, wise religion. Already there has come a 8 little poetry in it. But there is higher poetry and higher thought.

9 In India we see this Satan in the most ancient part of the 10 Vedas. He just (appears) and immediately disappears. ...In the 11 Vedas the bad god got a blow and disappeared. He is gone, and the 12 Persians took him. We are trying to make him leave the world
13 [all]together. Taking the Persian idea, we are going to make a 14 decent gentleman of him; give him a new body. There was the end 15 of the Satan idea in India.

16 But the idea of God went on; but mind you, here comes 17 another fact. The idea of God grew side by side with the idea of 18 [materialism] until you have traced it up to the emperor of Persia.
19 But on the other hand comes in metaphysics, philosophy. There is 20 another line of thought, the idea of [the non-dual Atman, man's] 21 own soul. That also grows. So, outside of India ideas about God had 22 to remain in that concrete form until India came to help them out a 23 bit.The other nations stopped with that old concrete idea. In this 24 country, there are millions who believe that God is [has?] a 25 body. ...Whole sects say it. [They believe that] He rules the world, 26 but there is a place where He has a body. He sits upon a throne.
27 They light candles and sing songs just as they do in our temples.

28 But in India they are sensible enough never to make [their 29 God a physical being]. You never see in India a temple of Brahma.
30 Why? Because the idea of the soul always existed. The Hebrew race 31 never questioned about the soul. There is no soul idea in the Old 32 Testament at all. The first is in the New Testament. The Persians, 33 they became so practical--wonderfully practical people--a fighting, 34 conquering race. They were the English people of the old time, 35 always fighting and destroying their neighbours--too much engaged 36 in that sort of thing to think about the soul. ...

37 The oldest idea of [the] soul [was that of] a fine body inside 38 this gross one. The gross one disappears and the fine one appears.
39 In Egypt that fine one also dies, and as soon as the gross body 40 disintegrates, the fine one also disintegrates. That is why they built 41 those pyramids [and embalmed the dead bodies of their ancestors, 42 thus hoping to secure immortality for the departed. ...

43 The Indian people have no regard for the dead body at all.
44 [Their attitude is:] "Let us take it and burn it." The son has to set 45 fire to his father's body. ...

46 There are two sorts of races, the divine and the demonic. The 47 divine think that they are soul and spirit. The demonic think that 48 they are bodies. The old Indian philosophers tried to insist that the 49 body is nothing. "As a man emits his old garment and takes a new 50 one, even so the old body is [shed] and he takes a new one" (Gita,

1 II.22). In my case, all my surroundings and education were trying to 2 [make me] the other way. I was always associated with 3 Mohammedans and Christians, who take more care of the body. ...

4 It is only one step from [the body] to the spirit. ...[In India] 5 they became insistent on this ideal of the soul. It became 6 [synonymous with] the idea of God. ...If the idea of the soul begins 7 to expand, [man must arrive at the conclusion that it is beyond 8 name and form]. ...The Indian idea is that the soul is formless.
9 Whatever is form must break sometime or other. There cannot be 10 any form unless it is the result of force and matter; and all 11 combinations must dissolve. If such is the case, [if] your soul is 12 [made of name and form, it disintegrates], and you die, and you are 13 no more immortal. If it is double, it has form and it belongs to 14 nature and it obeys nature's laws of birth and death. ...They find 15 that this [soul] is not the mind...neither a double. ...

16 Thoughts can be guided and controlled. ...[The Yogis of India]
17 practised to see how far the thoughts can be guided and controlled.
18 By dint of hard work, thoughts may be silenced altogether. If 19 thoughts were [the real man], as soon as thought ceases, he ought 20 to die. Thought ceases in meditation; even the mind's elements are 21 quite quiet. Blood circulation stops. His breath stops, but he is not 22 dead. If thought were he, the whole thing ought to go, but they find 23 it does not go. That is practical [proof]. They came to the conclusion 24 that even mind and thought were not the real man. Then 25 speculation showed that it could not be.

26 I come, I think and talk. In the midst of all [this activity is] 27 this unity [of the Self]. My thought and action are varied, many 28 [fold]...but in and through them runs...that one unchangeable One.
29 It cannot be the body. That is changing every minute. It cannot be 30 the mind; new and fresh thoughts [come] all the time. It is neither 31 the body nor the mind. Both body and mind belong to nature and 32 must obey nature's laws. A free mind never will. ...

33 Now, therefore, this real man does not belong to nature. It is 34 the person whose mind and body belong to nature. So much of 35 nature we are using. Just as you come to use the pen and ink and 36 chair, so he uses so much of nature in fine and in gross form; gross 37 form, the body, and fine form, the mind. If it is simple, it must be 38 formless. In nature alone are forms. That which is not of nature 39 cannot have any forms, fine or gross. It must be formless. It must 40 be omnipresent. Understand this. [Take] this glass on the table. The 41 glass is form and the table is form. So much of the glass-ness goes 42 off, so much of table-ness [when they break]. ...

43 The soul...is nameless because it is formless. It will neither go 44 to heaven nor [to hell] any more than it will enter this glass. It takes 45 the form of the vessel it fills. If it is not in space, either of two 46 things is possible. Either the [soul permeates] space or space is in 47 [it]. You are in space and must have a form. Space limits us, binds 48 us, and makes a form of us. If you are not in space, space is in you.
49 All the heavens and the world are in the person. ...

50 So it must be with God. God is omnipresent. "Without hands 51 [he grasps] everything; without feet he can move. .." He [is] the 1 formless, the deathless, the eternal. The idea of God came. ...He is 2 the Lord of souls, just as my soul is the [lord] of my body. If my soul 3 left the body, the body would not be for a moment. If He left my 4 soul, the soul would not exist. He is the creator of the universe; of 5 everything that dies He is the destroyer. His shadow is death; His 6 shadow is life.

7 [The ancient Indian philosophers] thought: ...This filthy world 8 is not fit for man's attention. There is nothing in the universe that is 9 [permanent--neither good nor evil]. ...

10 I told you...Satan...did not have much chance [in India]. Why?
11 Because they were very bold in religion. They were not babies.
12 Have you seen that characteristic of children? They are always 13 trying to throw the blame on someone else. Baby minds [are] trying, 14 when they make a mistake, to throw the blame upon someone 15 [else]. On the one hand, we say, "Give me this; give me that." On the 16 other hand, we say, "I did not do this; the devil tempted me. The 17 devil did it." That is the history of mankind, weak mankind. ...

18 Why is evil? Why is [the world] the filthy, dirty hole? We have 19 made it. Nobody is to blame. We put our hand in the fire. The Lord 20 bless us, [man gets] just what he deserves. Only He is merciful. If 21 we pray to Him, He helps us. He gives Himself to us.

22 That is their idea. They are [of a] poetic nature. They go crazy 23 over poetry. Their philosophy is poetry. This philosophy is a 24 poem. ...All [high thought] in the Sanskrit is written in poetry.
25 Metaphysics, astronomy--all in poetry.

26 We are responsible, and how do we come to mischief? [You 27 may say], "I was born poor and miserable. I remember the hard 28 struggle all my life." Philosophers say that you are to blame. You do 29 not mean to say that all this sprang up without any cause whatever?
30 You are a rational being. Your life is not without cause, and you are 31 the cause. You manufacture your own life all the time. ...You make 32 and mould your own life. You are responsible for yourself. Do not 33 lay the blame upon anybody, any Satan. You will only get punished a 34 little more. ...

35 [A man] is brought up before God, and He says, "Thirty-one 36 stripes for you,"...when comes another man. He says, "Thirty 37 stripes: fifteen for that fellow, and fifteen for the teacher--that awful 38 man who taught him." That is the awful thing in teaching. I do not 39 know what I am going to get. I go all over the world. If I have to get 40 fifteen for each one I have taught!...

41 We have to come to this idea: "This My Maya is divine." It is 42 My activity [My] divinity. "[My Maya] is hard to cross, but those that 43 take refuge in me [go beyond Maya]." But you find out that it is very 44 difficult to cross this ocean [of Maya by] yourself. You cannot. It is 45 the old question--hen and egg. If you do any work, that work 46 becomes the cause and produces the effect. That effect [again]
47 becomes the cause and produces the effect. And so on. If you push 48 this down, it never stops. Once you set a thing in motion, there is no 49 more stopping. I do some work, good or bad, [and it sets up a chain 50 reaction]... I cannot stop now.

1 It is impossible for us to get out from this bondage [by 2 ourselves]. It is only possible if there is someone more powerful 3 than this law of causation, and if he takes mercy on us and drags us
4 out.

5 And we declare that there is such a one--God. There is such a 6 being, all merciful. ...If there is a God, then it is possible for me to 7 be saved. How can you be saved by your own will? Do you see the 8 philosophy of the doctrine of salvation by grace? You Western 9 people are wonderfully clever, but when you undertake to explain 10 philosophy, you are so wonderfully complicated. How can you save 11 yourself by work, if by salvation you mean that you will be taken out 12 of all this nature? Salvation means just standing upon God, but if 13 you understand what is meant by salvation, then you are the 14 Self. ...You are not nature. You are the only thing outside of souls 15 and gods and nature. These are the external existences, and God 16 [is] interpenetrating both nature and soul.

17 Therefore, just as my soul is [to] my body, we, as it were, are 18 the bodies of God. God-souls-nature--it is one. The One, because, as 19 I say, I mean the body, soul, and mind. But, we have seen, the law of 20 causation pervades every bit of nature, and once you have got 21 caught you cannot get out. When once you get into the meshes of 22 law, a possible way of escape is not [through work done] by you.
23 You can build hospitals for every fly and flea that ever lived. ...All 24 this you may do, but it would never lead to salvation. ...[Hospitals] 25 go up and they come down again. [Salvation] is only possible if 26 there is some being whom nature never caught, who is the Ruler of 27 nature. He rules nature instead of being ruled by nature. He wills 28 law instead of being downed by law. ...He exists and he is all 29 merciful. The moment you seek Him [He will save you].

30 Why has He not taken us out? You do not want Him. You want 31 everything but Him. The moment you want Him, that moment you 32 get Him. We never want Him. We say, "Lord, give me a fine house."
33 We want the house, not Him. "Give me health! Save me from this 34 difficulty!" When a man wants nothing but Him, [he gets Him]. "The 35 same love which wealthy men have for gold and silver and 36 possessions, Lord, may I have the same love for Thee. I want 37 neither earth nor heaven, nor beauty nor learning. I do not want 38 salvation. Let me go to hell again and again. But one thing I want:
39 to love Thee, and for love's sake--not even for heaven."

40 Whatever man desires, he gets. If you always dream of having 41 a body, [you will get another body]. When this body goes away he 42 wants another, and goes on begetting body after body. Love matter 43 and you become matter. You first become animals. When I see a dog 44 gnawing a bone, I say, "Lord help us!" Love body until you become 45 dogs and cats! Still degenerate, until you become minerals--all body 46 and nothing else. ...

47 There are other people, who would have no compromise. The 48 road to salvation is through truth. That was another watchword. ...

49 [Man began to progress spiritually] when he kicked the devil 50 out. He stood up and took the responsibility of the misery of the 51 world upon his own shoulders. But whenever he looked [at the] past

1 and future and [at the] law of causation, he knelt down and said,
2 "Lord, save me, [thou] who [art] our creator, our father, and dearest 3 friend." That is poetry, but not very good poetry, I think. Why not? It 4 is the painting of the Infinite [no doubt]. You have it in every 5 language how they paint the Infinite. [But] it is the infinite of the 6 senses, of the muscles. ...

7 "[Him] the sun [does not illumine], nor the moon, nor the 8 stars, [nor] the flash of lightning." That is another painting of the 9 Infinite, by negative language. ...And the last Infinite is painted in 10 [the] spirituality of the Upanishads. Not only is Vedanta the highest 11 philosophy in the world, but it is the greatest poem. ...

12 Mark today, this is the ...difference between the first part of 13 the Vedas and the second. In the first, it is all in [the domain of] 14 sense. But all religions are only [concerned with the] infinite of the 15 external world--nature and nature's God. ...[Not so Vedanta]. This is 16 the first light that the human mind throws back [of] all that. No 17 satisfaction [comes] of the infinite [in] space.

18 "[The] Self-existent [One] has [created] the [senses as 19 turned]... to the outer world. Those therefore who [seek] outside 20 will never find that [which is within]. There are the few who, 21 wanting to know the truth, turn their eyes inward and in their own 22 souls behold the glory [of the Self]."

23 It is not the infinite of space, but the real Infinite, beyond 24 space, beyond time. ...Such is the world missed by the 25 Occident. ...Their minds have been turned to external nature and 26 nature's God. Look within yourself and find the truth that you had 27 [forgotten]. Is it possible for mind to come out of this dream without 28 the help of the gods? Once you start the action, there is no help 29 unless the merciful Father takes us out.

30 That would not be freedom, [even] at the hands of the 31 merciful God. Slavery is slavery. The chain of gold is quite as bad as 32 the chain of iron. Is there a way out?

33 You are not bound. No one was ever bound. [The Self] is 34 beyond. It is the all. You are the One; there are no two. God was 35 your own reflection cast upon the screen of Maya. The real God [is 36 the Self]. He [whom man] ignorantly worships is that reflection.
37 [They say that] the Father in heaven is God. Why God? [It is 38 because He is] your own reflection that [He] is God. Do you see how 39 you are seeing God all the time? As you unfold yourself, the 40 reflection grows [clearer].

41 "Two beautiful birds are there sitting upon the same tree. The 42 one [is] calm, silent, majestic; the one below [the individual self], is 43 eating the fruits, sweet and bitter, and becoming happy and sad.
44 [But when the individual self beholds the worshipful Lord as his 45 own true Self, he grieves no more.]"

46 ...Do not say "God". Do not say "Thou". Say "I". The language 47 of [dualism] says, "God, Thou, my Father." The language of [non-48 dualism] says, "Dearer unto me than I am myself. I would have no 49 name for Thee. The nearest I can use is I...

1 "God is true. The universe is a dream. Blessed am I that I
2 know this moment that I [have been and] shall be free all
3 eternity; ...that I know that I am worshipping only myself; that no
4 nature, no delusion, had any hold on me. Vanish nature from me, 5 vanish [these] gods; vanish worship; ...vanish superstitions, for I 6 know myself. I am the Infinite. All these--Mrs. So-and-so, Mr. So-7 and-so, responsibility, happiness, misery--have vanished. I am the 8 Infinite. How can there be death for me, or birth? Whom shall I
9 fear? I am the One. Shall I be afraid of myself? Who is to be afraid 10 of [whom]? I am the one Existence. Nothing else exists. I am 11 everything."

12 It is only the question of memory [of your true nature], not 13 salvation by work. Do you get salvation? You are [already] free.

14 Go on saying, "I am free". Never mind if the next moment 15 delusion comes and says, "I am bound." Dehypnotise the whole 16 thing.

17 [This truth] is first to be heard. Hear it first. Think on it day 18 and night. Fill the mind [with it] day and night: "I am It. I am the 19 Lord of the universe. Never was there any delusion..." Meditate 20 upon it with all the strength of the mind till you actually see these 21 walls, houses, everything, melt away--[until] body, everything, 22 vanishes. "I will stand alone. I am the One." Struggle on! "Who 23 cares! We want to be free; [we] do not want any powers. Worlds we 24 renounce; heavens we renounce; hells we renounce. What do I care 25 about all these powers, and this and that! What do I care if the 26 mind is controlled or uncontrolled! Let it run on. What of that! I am 27 not the mind. Let it go on!"

28 The sun [shines on the just and on the unjust]. Is he touched 29 by the defective [character] of anyone? "I am He. Whatever [my] 30 mind does, I am not touched. The sun is not touched by shining on 31 filthy places, I am Existence."

32 This is the religion of [non-dual] philosophy. [It is] difficult.
33 Struggle on! Down with all superstitions! Neither teachers nor 34 scriptures nor gods [exist]. Down with temples, with priests, with 35 gods, with incarnations, with God himself? I am all the God that 36 ever existed! There, stand up philosophers! No fear! Speak no more 37 of God and [the] superstition of the world. Truth alone triumphs, 38 and this is true. I am the Infinite.

39 All religious superstitions are vain imaginations. ...This 40 society, that I see you before me, and [that] I am talking to you--this 41 is all superstition; all must be given up. Just see what it takes to 42 become a philosopher! This is the [path] of [Jnana-] Yoga, the way 43 through knowledge. The other [paths] are easy, slow, ...but this is 44 pure strength of mind. No weakling [can follow this path of 45 knowledge. You must be able to say:] "I am the Soul, the ever free; 46 [I] never was bound. Time is in me, not I in time. God was born in 47 my mind. God the Father, Father of the universe--he is created by 48 me in my own mind..."

49 Do you call yourselves philosophers? Show it! Think of this, 50 talk [of] this, and [help] each other in this path, and give up all

1 superstition!

BREATHING

(Delivered in San Francisco, March 28, 1900)

Breathing exercises have been very popular in India from the most ancient times, so much so [that] they form a part of their religion, just as going to church and repeating certain prayers. ...I will try to bring those ideas before you.

I have told you how the Indian philosopher reduces the whole universe into two parts--Prana and Akasha.

Prana means force--all that is manifesting itself as movement or possible movement, force, or attraction. ...Electricity, magnetism, all the movements in the body, all [the movements] in the mind--all these are various manifestations of one thing called Prana. The best form of Prana, however, is in [the brain], manifesting itself as light [of understanding]. This light is under the guidance of thought.

The mind ought to control every bit of Prana that has been worked up in the body. ...[The] mind should have entire control of the body. That is not [the case] with all. With most of us it is the other way. The mind should be able to control every part of [the body] just at will. That is reason, philosophy; but [when] we come to matters of fact, it is not so. For you, on the other hand, the cart is before the horse. It is the body mastering the mind. If my finger gets pinched, I become sorry. The body works upon the mind. If anything happens which I do not like to happen, I am worried; my mind [is] thrown off its balance. The body is master of the mind. We have become bodies. We are nothing else but bodies just now.

Here [comes] the philosopher to show us the way out, to teach us what we really are. You may reason it out and understand it intellectually, but there is a long way between intellectual understanding and the practical realisation of it. Between the plan of the building and the building itself there is quite a long distance. Therefore there must be various methods [to reach the goal of religion]. In the last course, we have been studying the method of philosophy, trying to bring everything under control, once more asserting the freedom of the soul. ..."It is very difficult. This way is not for [every]body. The embodied mind tries it with great trouble" (Gita, XII. 5).

A little physical help will make the mind comfortable. What would be more rational than to have the mind itself accomplish the thing? But it cannot. The physical help is necessary for most of us. The system of Raja- Yoga is to utilise these physical helps, to make use of the powers and forces in the body to produce certain mental states, to make the mind stronger and stronger until it regains its lost empire. By sheer force of will if anyone can attain to that, so much the better. But most of us cannot, so we will use physical means, and help the will on its way.

...The whole universe is a tremendous case of unity in variety. There is only one mass of mind. Different [states] of that mind have different names. [They are] different little whirlpools in this ocean of mind. We are universal and individual at the same time. Thus is

1 the play going on. ...In reality this unity is never broken. [Matter, 2 mind, spirit are all one.]

3 All these are but various names. There is but one fact in the 4 universe, and we look at it from various standpoints. The same 5 [fact] looked at from one standpoint becomes matter. The same one 6 from another standpoint becomes mind. There are not two things.
7 Mistaking the rope for the snake, fear came [to a man] and made 8 him call somebody else to kill the snake. [His] nervous system 9 began to shake; his heart began to beat. ...All these manifestations 10 [came] from fear, and he discovered it was a rope, and they all 11 vanished. This is what we see in reality. What even the senses see-- 12 what we call matter--that [too] is the real; only not as we have seen 13 it. The mind [which] saw the rope [and] took it for a snake was not 14 under a delusion. If it had been, it would not have seen anything.
15 One thing is taken for another, not as something that does not exist.
16 What we see here is body, and we take the Infinite as matter. ...We 17 are but seeking that Reality. We are never deluded. We always 18 know truth, only our reading of truth is mistaken at times. You can 19 perceive only one thing at a time. When I see the snake, the rope 20 has vanished entirely. And when I see the rope, the snake has 21 vanished. It must be one thing. ...

22 When we see the world, how can we see God? Think in your 23 own mind. What is meant by the world is God as seen as all things 24 [by] our senses. Here you see the snake; the rope is not. When you 25 know the Spirit, everything else will vanish. When you see the Spirit 26 itself, you see no matter, because that which you called matter is 27 the very thing that is Spirit. All these variations are [superimposed] 28 by our senses. The same sun, reflected by a thousand little 29 wavelets, will represent to us thousands of little suns. If I am 30 looking at the universe with my senses, I interpret it as matter and 31 force. It is one and many at the same time. The manifold does not 32 destroy the unity. The millions of waves do not destroy the unity of 33 the ocean. It remains the same ocean. When you look at the 34 universe, remember that we can reduce it to matter or to force. If 35 we increase the velocity, the mass decreases. ...On the other hand, 36 we can increase the mass and decrease the velocity. ...We may 37 almost come to a point where all the mass will entirely disappear. ...

38 Matter cannot be said to cause force nor [can] force [be] the 39 cause of matter. Both are so [related] that one may disappear in the 40 other. There must be a third [factor], and that third something is 41 the mind. You cannot produce the universe from matter, neither 42 from force. Mind is something [which is] neither force nor matter, 43 yet begetting force and matter all the time. In the long run, mind is 44 begetting all force, and that is what is meant by the universal mind, 45 the sum total of all minds. Everyone is creating, and [in] the sum 46 total of all these creations you have the universe -unity in diversity.
47 It is one and it is many at the same time.

48 The Personal God is only the sum total of all, and yet it is an 49 individual by itself, just as you are the individual body of which each 50 cell is an individual part itself.

51 Everything that has motion is included in Prana or force. [It

1 is] this Prana which is moving the stars, sun, moon; Prana is 2 gravitation. ...

3 All forces of nature, therefore, must be created by the 4 universal mind. And we, as little bits of mind, [are] taking out that 5 Prana from nature, working it out again in our own nature, moving 6 our bodies and manufacturing our thought. If [you think] thought 7 cannot be manufactured, stop eating for twenty days and see how 8 you feel. Begin today and count. ...Even thought is manufactured by 9 food. There is no doubt about it.

10 Control of this Prana that is working everything, control of 11 this Prana in the body, is called Pranayama. We see with our 12 common sense that it is the breath [that] is setting everything in 13 motion. If I stop breathing, I stop. If the breath begins, [the body] 14 begins to move. What we want to get at is not the breath itself; it is 15 something finer behind the breath.

16 [There was once a minister to a great king. The] king, 17 displeased with the minister, ordered him to be confined in the top 18 of [a very high tower. This was done, and the minister was left there 19 to perish. His wife came to the tower at night and called to her 20 husband.] The minister said to her, "No use weeping." He told her 21 to take a little honey, [a beetle], a pack of fine thread, a ball of 22 twine, and a rope. She tied the fine thread to one of the legs of the 23 beetle and put honey on the top of its head and let it go [with its 24 head up]. [The beetle slowly crept onwards, in the hope of reaching 25 the honey, until at last it reached the top of the tower, when the 26 minister grasped the beetle, and got possession of the silken thread, 27 then the pack thread, then the stout twine, and lastly of the rope.
28 The minister descended from the tower by means of the rope, and 29 made his escape. In this body of ours the breath motion is the 30 "silken thread"; by laying hold of it we grasp the pack thread of 31 nerve currents, and from these the stout twine of our thoughts, and 32 lastly the rope of Prana, controlling which we reach freedom. (Vide 33 ante pp. 143-44).]

34 By the help of things on the material plane, we have to come 35 to finer and finer [perceptions]. The universe is one, whatever point 36 you touch. All the points are but variations of that one point.
37 Throughout the universe is a unity (at bottom). ...Even through such 38 a gross thing as breath I can get hold of the Spirit itself.

39 By the exercise of breathing we begin to feel all the 40 movements of the body that we [now] do not feel. As soon as we 41 begin to feel them, we begin to master them. Thoughts in the germ 42 will open to us, and we will be able to get hold of them. Of course, 43 not all of us have the opportunity nor the will nor the patience nor 44 the faith to pursue such a thing; but there is the common sense idea 45 that is of some benefit to everyone.

46 The first benefit is health. Ninety-nine per cent of us do not at 47 all breathe properly. We do not inflate the lungs 48 enough. ...Regularity [of breath] will purify the body. It quiets the 49 mind. ...When you are peaceful, your breath is going on peacefully, 50 [it is] rhythmic. If the breath is rhythmic, you must be peaceful.
51 When the mind is disturbed, the breath is broken. If you can bring

1 the breath into rhythm forcibly by practice, why can you not 2 become peaceful? When you are disturbed, go in to the room and 3 close the door. Do not try to control the mind, but go on with 4 rhythmic breathing for ten minutes. The heart will become 5 peaceful. These are common sense benefits that come to everyone.
6 The others belong to the Yogi. ...

7 Deep-breathing exercises [are only the first step]. There are 8 about eighty-four [postures for] various exercises. Some [people]
9 have taken up this breathing as the whole [pursuit] of life. They do 10 not do anything without consulting the breath. They are all the time 11 [observing] in which nostril there is more breath. When it is the 12 right, [they] will do certain things, and when [it is] the left, they do 13 other things. When [the breath is] flowing equally through both 14 nostrils, they will worship.

15 When the breath is coming rhythmically through both 16 nostrils, that is the time to control your mind. By means of the 17 breath you can make the currents of the body move through any 18 part of the body, just [at] will. Whenever [any] part of the body is ill, 19 send the Prana to that part, all by the breath.

20 Various other things are done. There are sects who are trying 21 not to breathe at all. They would not do anything that would make 22 them breathe hard. They go into a sort of trance. ...Scarcely any 23 part of the body [functions]. The heart almost ceases [to 24 beat]. ...Most of these exercises are very dangerous; the higher 25 methods [are] for acquiring higher powers. There are whole sects 26 trying to [lighten] the whole body by withdrawal of breath and then 27 they will rise up in the air. I have never seen anyone rise. ...I have 28 never seen anyone fly through the air, but the books say so. I do not 29 pretend to know everything. All the time I am seeing most 30 wonderful things. ...[Once I observed a] man bringing out fruits and 31 flowers, etc. [out of nowhere].

32The Yogi, when he becomes perfect, can make his body so 33 small it will pass through this wall--this very body. He can become 34 so heavy, two hundred persons cannot lift him. He will be able to fly 35 through the air if he likes. [But] nobody can be as powerful as God 36 Himself. If they could, and one created, another would destroy. ...

37 This is in the books. I can [hardly] believe them, nor do I 38 disbelieve them. What I have seen I take. ...

39 If the study [improvement?] of things in this world is possible, 40 it is not by competition, it is by regulating the mind. Western people 41 say, "That is our nature; we cannot help it." Studying your social 42 problems, [I conclude] you cannot solve them either. In some things 43 you are worse off than we are, ...and all these things do not bring 44 the world anywhere at all. ...

45 The strong take everything; the weak go to the wall. The poor 46 are waiting. ...The man who can take, will take everything. The poor 47 hate that man. Why? Because they are waiting their turn. All the 48 systems they invent, they all teach the same thing. The problem can 49 only be solved in the mind of man. ...No law will ever make him do 50 what he does not want to do. ...It is only if [man] wills to be good

1 that he will be good. All the law and juries...cannot make him good.
2 The almighty man says, "I do not care." ...The only solution is if we 3 all want to be good. How can that be done?

4 All knowledge is within [the] mind. Who saw knowledge in the 5 stone, or astronomy in the star? It is all in the human being.

6 Let us realise [that] we are the infinite power. Who put a limit
7 to the power of mind? Let us realise we are all mind. Every drop 8 has the whole of the ocean in it. That is the mind of man. The Indian 9 mind reflects upon these [powers and potentialities] and wants to 10 bring [them] all out. For himself he doesn't care what happens. It 11 will take a great length of time [to reach perfection]. If it takes fifty 12 thousand years, what of that! ...

13 The very foundation of society, the formation of it, makes the 14 defect. [Perfection] is only possible if the mind of man is changed, if 15 he, of his own sweet will, changes his mind; and the great difficulty 16 is, neither can he force his own mind.

17 You may not believe in all the claims of this Raja-Yoga. It is 18 absolutely necessary that every individual can become divine. That 19 is only [possible] when every individual has absolute mastery over 20 his own thought. ...[The thoughts, the senses] should be all my 21 servants, not my masters. Then only is it possible that evils will 22 vanish. ...

23 Education is not filling the mind with a lot of facts. Perfecting 24 the instrument and getting complete mastery of my own mind [is 25 the ideal of education]. If I want to concentrate my mind upon a 26 point, it goes there, and the moment I call, it is free [again]. ...

27 That is the great difficulty. By great struggle we get a certain 28 power of concentration, the power of attachment of the mind to 29 certain things. But then there is not the power of detachment. I 30 would give half my life to take my mind off that object! I cannot. It 31 is the power of concentration and attachment as well as the power 32 of detachment [that we must develop]. [If] the man [is] equally 33 powerful in both--that man has attained manhood. You cannot make 34 him miserable even if the whole universe tumbles about his ears.
35 What books can teach you that? You may read any amount of books.
36 ...Crowd into the child fifty thousand words a moment, teach him all 37 the theories and philosophies. ...There is only one science that will 38 teach him facts, and that is psychology. ...And the work begins with 39 control of the breath.

40 Slowly and gradually you get into the chambers of the mind
41 and gradually get control of the mind. It is a long, [hard struggle]. It 42 must not be taken up as something curious. When one wants to do 43 something, he has a plan. [Raja-Yoga] proposes no faith, no belief, 44 no God. If you believe in two thousand gods, you can try that. Why 45 not? ...[But in Raja-Yoga] it is impersonal principles.

46 The greatest difficulty is what? We talk and theorise. The vast 47 majority of mankind must deal with things that are concrete. For 48 the dull people cannot see all the highest philosophy. Thus it ends.
49 You may be graduates [in] all sciences in the world, ...but if you 50 have not realised, you must become a baby and learn.

1 ...If you give them things in the abstract and infinite, they get 2 lost. Give them things [to do], a little at a time. [Tell them,] "You 3 take [in] so many breaths, you do this." They go on, [they] 4 understand it, and find pleasure in it. These are the kindergartens
5 of religion. That is why breathing exercises will be so beneficial. I 6 beg you all not to be merely curious. Practise a few days, and if you 7 do not find any benefit, then come and curse me. ...

8 The whole universe is a mass of energy, and it is present at 9 every point. One grain is enough for all of us, if we know how to get 10 what there is. ...

11 This having to do is the poison that is killing us. ...[Duty is] 12 what pleases slaves. ...[But] I am free! What I do is my play. [I am 13 not a slave. I am] having a little fun--that is all. ...

14 The departed spirits--they are weak, are trying to get vitality 15 from us. ...

16 Spiritual vitality can be given from one mind to another. The 17 man who gives is the Guru. The man who receives is the disciple.
18 That is the only way spiritual truth is brought into the world.

19 [At death] all the senses go into the [mind] and the mind goes 20 into Prana, vitality. The soul goes out and carries part of the mind 21 out with him. He carries a certain part of the vitality, and he carries 22 a certain amount of very fine material also, as the germ of the 23 spiritual body. The Prana cannot exist without some sort of 24 [vehicle]. ...It gets lodgement in the thoughts, and it will come out 25 again. So you manufacture this new body and new brain. Through 26 that it will manifest. ...

27 [Departed spirits] cannot manufacture a body; and those that 28 are very weak do not remember that they are dead. ...They try to 29 get more enjoyment from this [spirit] life by getting into the bodies 30 of others, and any person who opens his body to them runs a 31 terrible risk. They seek his vitality. ...

32 In this world nothing is permanent except God. ...Salvation 33 means knowing the truth. We do not become anything; we are what 34 we are. Salvation [comes] by faith and not by work. It is a question 35 of knowledge ! You must know what you are, and it is done. The 36 dream vanishes. This you [and others] are dreaming here. When 37 they die, they go to [the] heaven [of their dream]. They live in that 38 dream, and [when it ends], they take a nice body [here], and they 39 are good people. ...

40 [The wise man says,] "All these [desires] have vanished from 41 me. This time I will not go through all this paraphernalia." He tries 42 to get knowledge and struggles hard, and he sees what a dream, 43 what a nightmare this is--[this dreaming], and working up heavens
44 and worlds and worse. He laughs at it. According to SWAMI
45 VIVEKANANDA HIS SECOND VISIT TO THE WEST (P. 461), this 46 address was delivered on 29 March 1900 under the title "The 47 Science of Breathing".--Ed.

PRACTICAL RELIGION: BREATHING AND MEDITATION

(Delivered in San Francisco, April 5, 1900)

Everyone's idea of practical religion is according to his theory of practicality and the standpoint he starts from. There is work. There is the system of worship. There is knowledge.

The philosopher thinks...the difference between bondage and freedom is only caused by knowledge and ignorance. To him, knowledge is the goal, and his practicality is gaining that knowledge. ...The worshipper's practical religion is the power of love and devotion. The worker's practical religion consists in doing good works. And so, as in every other thing, we are always trying to ignore the standard of another, trying to bind the whole world to our standard.

Doing good to his fellow-beings is the practical religion of the man full of love. If men do not help to build hospitals, he thinks that they have no religion at all. But there is no reason why everyone should do that. The philosopher, in the same way, may denounce every man who does not have knowledge. People may build twenty thousand hospitals, and the philosopher declares they are but...the beasts of burden of the gods. The worshipper has his own idea and standard: Men who cannot love God are no good, whatever work they do. The [Yogi believes in] psychic [control and] the conquest of [internal] nature. "How much have you gained towards that? How much control over your senses, over your body?"--that is all the Yogi asks. And, as we said, each one judges the others by his own standard. Men may have given millions of dollars and fed rats and cats, as some do in India. They say that men can take care of themselves, but the poor animals cannot. That is their idea. But to the Yogi the goal is conquest of [internal] nature, and he judges man by that standard. ...

We are always talking [about] practical religion. But it must be practical in our sense. Especially [so] in the Western countries. The Protestants' ideal is good works. They do not care much for devotion and philosophy. They think there is not much in it. "What is your knowledge!" [they say]. "Man has to do something!"...A little humanitarianism! The churches rail day and night against callous agnosticism. Yet they seem to be veering rapidly towards just that. Callous slaves! Religion of utility! That is the spirit just now. And that is why some Buddhists have become so popular in the West. People do not know whether there is a God or not, whether there is a soul or not. [They think:] This world is full of misery. Try to help this world.

The Yoga doctrine, which we are having our lecture on, is not from that standpoint. [It teaches that] there is the soul, and inside this soul is all power. It is already there, and if we can master this body, all the power will be unfolded. All knowledge is in the soul. Why are people struggling? To lessen the misery. ...All unhappiness is caused by our not having mastery over the body. ...We are all putting the cart before the horse. ...Take the system of work, for

1 instance. We are trying to do good by...comforting the poor. We do
2 not get to the cause which created the misery. It is like taking a 3 bucket to empty out the ocean, and more [water] comes all the 4 time. The Yogi sees that this is nonsense. [He says that] the way out 5 of misery is to know the cause of misery first. ...We try to do the 6 good we can. What for? If there is an incurable disease, why should 7 we struggle and take care of ourselves? If the utilitarians say: "Do 8 not bother about soul and God!" what is that to the Yogi and what is 9 it to the world? The world does not derive any good [from such an 10 attitude]. More and more misery is going on all the time. ...

11 The Yogi says you are to go to the root of all this. Why is there 12 misery in the world? He answers: "It is all our own foolishness, not 13 having proper mastery of our own bodies. That is all." He advises 14 the means by which this misery can be [overcome]. If you can thus 15 get mastery of your body, all the misery of the world will vanish.
16 Every hospital is praying that more and more sick people will come 17 there. Every time you think of doing some charity, you think there is 18 some beggar to take your charity. If you say, "O Lord, let the world 19 be full of charitable people!"--you mean, let the world be full of 20 beggars also. Let the world be full of good works--let the world be 21 full of misery. This is out-and-out slavishness!

22 ...The Yogi says, religion is practical if you know first why 23 misery exists. All the misery in the world is in the senses. Is there 24 any ailment in the sun, moon, and stars? The same fire that cooks 25 your meal burns the child. Is it the fault of the fire? Blessed be the 26 fire! Blessed be this electricity! It gives light. ...Where can you lay 27 the blame? Not on the elements. The world is neither good nor bad; 28 the world is the world. The fire is the fire. If you burn your finger in 29 it, you are a fool. If you [cook your meal and with it satisfy your 30 hunger,] you are a wise man. That is all the difference.
31 Circumstances can never be good or bad. Only the individual man 32 can be good or bad. What is meant by the world being good or bad?
33 Misery and happiness can only belong to the sensuous individual 34 man.

35 The Yogis say that nature is the enjoyed; the soul is the 36 enjoyer. All misery and happiness--where is it? In the senses. It is 37 the touch of the senses that causes pleasure and pain, heat and 38 cold. If we can control the senses and order what they shall feel-- 39 not let them order us about as they are doing now--if they can obey 40 our commands, become our servants, the problem is solved at once.
41 We are bound by the senses; they play upon us, make fools of us all 42 the time.

43 Here is a bad odour. It will bring me unhappiness as soon as 44 it touches my nose. I am the slave of my nose. If I am not its slave, I 45 do not care. A man curses me. His curses enter my ears and are 46 retained in my mind and body. If I am the master, I shall say: "Let 47 these things go; they are nothing to me. I am not miserable. I do not 48 bother." This is the outright, pure, simple, clear-cut truth.

49 The other problem to be solved is--is it practical? Can man 50 attain to the power of mastery of the body? ...Yoga says it is 51 practical. ...Supposing it is not--suppose there are doubts in your

1 mind. You have got to try it. There is no other way out. ...

2 You may do good works all the time. All the same, you will be 3 the slave of your senses, you will be miserable and unhappy. You
4 may study the philosophy of every religion. Men in this country
5 carry loads and loads of books on their backs. They are mere 6 scholars, slaves of the senses, and therefore happy and unhappy.
7 They read two thousand books, and that is all right; but as soon as a 8 little misery comes, they are worried, anxious. ...You call yourselves 9 men! You stand up...and build hospitals. You are fools!

10 What is the difference between men and animals? ..."Food 11 and [sleep], procreation of the species, and fear exist in common 12 with the animals. There is one difference: Man can control all these 13 and become God, the master." Animals cannot do it. Animals can do 14 charitable work. Ants do it. Dogs do it. What is the difference then?
15 Men can be masters of themselves. They can resist the reaction to 16 anything. ...The animal cannot resist anything. He is held...by the 17 string of nature everywhere. That is all the distinction. One is the 18 master of nature, the other the slave of nature. What is nature? The 19 five senses...

20 [The conquest of internal nature] is the only way out, 21 according to Yoga. ...The thirst for God is religion. ...Good works 22 and all that [merely] make the mind a little quiet. To practise this-- 23 to be perfect--all depends upon our past. I have been studying 24 [Yoga] all my life and have made very little progress yet. But I have 25 got enough [result] to believe that this is the only true way. The day 26 will come when I will be master of myself. If not in this life, [in 27 another life]. I will struggle and never let go. Nothing is lost. If I die 28 this moment, all my past struggles [will come to my help]. Have you 29 not seen what makes the difference between one man and another?
30 It is their past. The past habits make one man a genius and another 31 man a fool. You may have the power of the past and can succeed in 32 five minutes. None can predict the moment of time. We all have to 33 attain [perfection] some time or other.

34 The greater part of the practical lessons which the Yogi gives 35 us is in the mind, the power of concentration and meditation. ...We 36 have become so materialistic. When we think of ourselves, we find 37 only the body. The body has become the ideal, nothing else.
38 Therefore a little physical help is necessary. ...

39 First, to sit in the posture in which you can sit still for a long 40 time. All the nerve currents which are working pass along the 41 spine. The spine is not intended to support the weight of the body.
42 Therefore the posture must be such that the weight of the body is 43 not on the spine. Let it be free from all pressure.

44 There are some other preliminary things. There is the great 45 question of food and exercise. ...

46 The food must be simple and taken several times [a day]
47 instead of once or twice. Never get very hungry. "He who eats too 48 much cannot be a Yogi. He who fasts too much cannot be a Yogi. He 49 who sleeps too much cannot be a Yogi, nor he who keeps awake too 50 much." He who does not do any work and he who works too hard

1 cannot succeed. Proper food, proper exercise, proper sleep, proper 2 wakefulness--these are necessary for any success.

3 What the proper food is, what kind, we have to determine 4 ourselves. Nobody can determine that [for us]. As a general 5 practice, we have to shun exciting food. ...We do not know how to 6 vary our diet with our occupation. We always forget that it is the 7 food out of which we manufacture everything we have. So the 8 amount and kind of energy that we want, the food must 9 determine. ...

10 Violent exercises are not all necessary. ...If you want to be 11 muscular, Yoga is not for you. You have to manufacture a finer 12 organism than you have now. Violent exercises are positively 13 hurtful. ...Live amongst those who do not take too much exercise. If 14 you do not take violent exercise, you will live longer. You do not 15 want to burn out your lamp in muscles! People who work with their 16 brains are the longest-lived people. ...Do not burn the lamp quickly.
17 Let it burn slowly and gently. ...Every anxiety, every violent 18 exercise--physical and mental--[means] you are burning the lamp.

19 The proper diet means, generally, simply do not eat highly 20 spiced foods. There are three sorts of mind, says the Yogi, 21 according to the elements of nature. One is the dull mind, which 22 covers the luminosity of the soul. Then there is that which makes 23 people active, and lastly, that which makes them calm and peaceful.

24 Now there are persons born with the tendency to sleep all the 25 time. Their taste will be towards that type of food with is rotting-- 26 crawling cheese. They will eat cheese that fairly jumps off the table.
27 It is a natural tendency with them.

28 Then active people. Their taste is for everything hot and 29 pungent, strong alcohol...

30 Sattvika people are very thoughtful, quiet, and patient. They 31 take food in small quantities, and never anything bad.

32 I am always asked the question: "Shall I give up meat?" My 33 Master said, "Why should you give up anything? It will give you up."
34 Do not give up anything in nature. Make it so hot for nature that 35 she will give you up. There will come a time when you cannot 36 possibly eat meat. The very sight of it will disgust you. There will 37 come a time when many things you are struggling to give up will be 38 distasteful, positively loathsome.

39 Then there are various sorts of breathing exercises. One 40 consists of three parts: the drawing in of the breath, the holding of 41 the breath--stopping still without breathing--and throwing the 42 breath out. [Some breathing exercises] are rather difficult, and 43 some of the complicated ones are attended with great danger if 44 done without proper diet. I would not advise you to go through any 45 one of these except the very simple ones.

46 Take a deep breath and fill the lungs. Slowly throw the breath
47 out. Take it through one nostril and fill the lungs, and throw it out 48 slowly through the other nostril. Some of us do not breathe deeply 49 enough. Others cannot fill the lungs enough. These breathings will

1 correct that very much. Half an hour in the morning and half an 2 hour in the evening will make you another person. This sort of 3 breathing is never dangerous. The other exercises should be 4 practised very slowly. And measure your strength. If ten minutes 5 are a drain, only take five.

6 The Yogi is expected to keep his own body well. These various 7 breathing exercises are a great help in regulating the different 8 parts of the body. All the different parts are inundated with breath.
9 It is through breath that we gain control of them all. Disharmony in 10 parts of the body is controlled by more flow of the nerve currents 11 towards them. The Yogi ought to be able to tell when in any part 12 pain is caused by less vitality or more. He has to equalise that. ...

13 Another condition [for success in Yoga] is chastity. It is the 14 corner-stone of all practice. Married or unmarried--perfect chastity.
15 It is a long subject, of course, but I want to tell you: Public 16 discussions of this subject are not to the taste of this country. These 17 Western countries are full of the most degraded beings in the shape 18 of teachers who teach men and women that if they are chaste they 19 will be hurt. How do they gather all this? ...People come to me-- 20 thousands come every year--with this one question. Someone has 21 told them that if they are chaste and pure they will be hurt 22 physically. ...How do these teachers know it? Have they been 23 chaste? Those unchaste, impure fools, lustful creatures, want to 24 drag the whole world down to their [level]! ...

25 Nothing is gained except by sacrifice. ...The holiest function 26 of our human consciousness, the noblest, do not make it unclean!
27 Do not degrade it to the level of the brutes. ...Make yourselves 28 decent men! ...Be chaste and pure! ...There is no other way. Did 29 Christ find any other way? ...If you can conserve and use the energy 30 properly, it leads you to God. Inverted, it is hell itself. ...

31 It is much easier to do anything upon the external plane, but 32 the greatest conqueror in the world finds himself a mere child when 33 he tries to control his own mind. This is the world he has to 34 conquer--the greater and more difficult world to conquer. Do not 35 despair! Awake, arise, and stop not until the goal is reached! ...

WORK AND ITS SECRET

(Delivered at Los Angeles, California, January 4, 1900)

One of the greatest lessons I have learnt in my life is to pay as much attention to the means of work as to its end. He was a great man from whom I learnt it, and his own life was a practical demonstration of this great principle. I have been always learning great lessons from that one principle, and it appears to be that all the secret of success is there; to pay as much attention to the means as to the end.

Our great defect in life is that we are so much drawn to the ideal, the goal is so much more enchanting, so much more alluring, so much bigger in our mental horizon, that we lose sight of the details altogether.

But whenever failure comes, if we analyse it critically, in ninety-nine per cent of cases we shall find that it was because we did not pay attention to the means. Proper attention to the finishing, strengthening, of the means is what we need. With the means all right, the end must come. We forget that it is the cause that produces the effect; the effect cannot come of itself; and unless the causes are exact, proper, and powerful, the effect will not be produced. Once the ideal is chosen and the means determined, we may almost let go the ideal, because we are sure it will be there, when the means are perfected. When the cause is there, there is no more difficulty about the effect, the effect is bound to come. If we take care of the cause, the effect will take care of itself. The realization of the ideal is the effect. The means are the cause: attention to the means, therefore, is the great secret of life. We also read this in the Gita and learn that we have to work, constantly work with all our power; to put our whole mind in the work, whatever it be, that we are doing. At the same time, we must not be attached. That is to say, we must not be drawn away from work by anything else; still, we must be able to quit the work whenever we like.

If we examine our own lives, we find that the greatest cause of sorrow is this: we take up something, and put our whole energy on it--perhaps it is a failure and yet we cannot give it up. We know that it is hurting us, that any further clinging to it is simply bringing misery on us; still, we cannot tear ourselves away from it. The bee came to sip the honey, but its feet stuck to the honey-pot and it could not get away. Again and again, we are finding ourselves in that state. That is the whole secret of existence. Why are we here? We came here to sip the honey, and we find our hands and feet sticking to it. We are caught, though we came to catch. We came to enjoy; we are being enjoyed. We came to rule; we are being ruled. We came to work; we are being worked. All the time, we find that. And this comes into every detail of our life. We are being worked upon by other minds, and we are always struggling to work on other minds. We want to enjoy the pleasures of life; and they eat into our vitals. We want to get everything from nature, but we find in the long run that nature takes everything from us--depletes us, and casts us aside.

1 Had it not been for this, life would have been all sunshine.
2 Never mind! With all its failures and successes, with all its joys and 3 sorrows, it can be one succession of sunshine, if only we are not 4 caught.

5 That is the one cause of misery: we are attached, we are 6 being caught. Therefore says the Gita: Work constantly; work, but 7 be not attached; be not caught. Reserve unto yourself the power of 8 detaching yourself from everything, however beloved, however 9 much the soul might yearn for it, however great the pangs of misery 10 you feel if you were going to leave it; still, reserve the power of 11 leaving it whenever you want. The weak have no place here, in this 12 life or in any other life. Weakness leads to slavery. Weakness leads 13 to all kinds of misery, physical and mental. Weakness is death.
14 There are hundreds of thousands of microbes surrounding us, but 15 they cannot harm us unless we become weak, until the body is 16 ready and predisposed to receive them. There may be a million 17 microbes of misery, floating about us. Never mind! They dare not 18 approach us, they have no power to get a hold on us, until the mind 19 is weakened. This is the great fact: strength is life, weakness is 20 death. Strength is felicity, life eternal, immortal; weakness is 21 constant strain and misery: weakness is death.

22 Attachment is the source of all our pleasures now. We are 23 attached to our friends, to our relatives; we are attached to our 24 intellectual and spiritual works; we are attached to external objects, 25 so that we get pleasure from them. What, again, brings misery but 26 this very attachment? We have to detach ourselves to earn joy. If 27 only we had power to detach ourselves at will, there would not be 28 any misery. That man alone will be able to get the best of nature, 29 who, having the power of attaching himself to a thing with all his 30 energy, has also the power to detach himself when he should do so.
31 The difficulty is that there must be as much power of attachment as 32 that of detachment. There are men who are never attracted by 33 anything. They can never love, they are hard-hearted and apathetic; 34 they escape most of the miseries of life. But the wall never feels 35 misery, the wall never loves, is never hurt; but it is the wall, after 36 all. Surely it is better to be attached and caught, than to be a wall.
37 Therefore the man who never loves who is hard and stony, escaping 38 most of the miseries of life, escapes also its joys. We do not want 39 that. That is weakness, that is death. That soul has not been 40 awakened that never feels weakness, never feels misery. That is a 41 callous state. We do not want that.

42 At the same time, we not only want this mighty power of love, 43 this mighty power of attachment, the power of throwing our whole 44 soul upon a single object, losing ourselves and letting ourselves be 45 annihilated, as it were, for other souls--which is the power of the 46 gods--but we want to be higher even than the gods. The perfect 47 man can put his whole soul upon that one point of love, yet he is 48 unattached. How comes this? There is another secret to learn.

49 The beggar is never happy. The beggar only gets a dole with 50 pity and scorn behind it, at least with the thought behind that the 51 beggar is a low object. He never really enjoys what he gets.

1 We are all beggars. Whatever we do, we want a return. We 2 are all traders. We are traders in life, we are traders in virtue, we 3 are traders in religion. And alas! we are also traders in love.

4 If you come to trade, if it is a question of give-and-take, if it is 5 a question of buy-and-sell, abide by the laws of buying and selling.
6 There is a bad time and there is a good time; there is a rise and a 7 fall in prices: always you expect the blow to come. It is like looking 8 at the mirror. Your face is reflected: you make a grimace--there is 9 one in the mirror; if you laugh, the mirror laughs. This is buying and 10 selling, giving and taking.

11 We get caught. How? Not by what we give, but by what we 12 expect. We get misery in return for our love; not from the fact that 13 we love, but from the fact that we want love in return. There is no 14 misery where there is no want. Desire, want, is the father of all 15 misery. Desires are bound by the laws of success and failure.
16 Desires must bring misery.

17 The great secret of true success, of true happiness, then, is 18 this: the man who asks for no return, the perfectly unselfish man, is 19 the most successful. It seems to be a paradox. Do we not know that 20 every man who is unselfish in life gets cheated, gets hurt?
21 Apparently, yes. "Christ was unselfish, and yet he was crucified." 22 True, but we know that his unselfishness is the reason, the cause of 23 a great victory--the crowning of millions upon millions of lives with 24 the blessings of true success.

25 Ask nothing; want nothing in return. Give what you have to 26 give; it will come back to you--but do not think of that now, it will 27 come back multiplied a thousand fold--but the attention must not be 28 on that. Yet have the power to give: give, and there it ends. Learn 29 that the whole of life is giving, that nature will force you to give. So, 30 give willingly. Sooner or later you will have to give up. You come 31 into life to accumulate. With clenched hands, you want to take. But 32 nature puts a hand on your throat and makes your hands open.
33 Whether you will it or not, you have to give. The moment you say, "I 34 will not", the blow comes; you are hurt. None is there but will be 35 compelled, in the long run, to give up everything. And the more one 36 struggles against this law, the more miserable one feels. It is 37 because we dare not give, because we are not resigned enough to 38 accede to this grand demand of nature, that we are miserable. The 39 forest is gone, but we get heat in return. The sun is taking up water 40 from the ocean, to return it in showers. You are a machine for 41 taking and giving: you take, in order to give. Ask, therefore, nothing 42 in return; but the more you give, the more will come to you. The 43 quicker you can empty the air out of this room, the quicker it will be 44 filled up by the external air; and if you close all the doors and every 45 aperture, that which is within will remain, but that which is outside 46 will never come in, and that which is within will stagnate, 47 degenerate, and become poisoned. A river is continually emptying 48 itself into the ocean and is continually filling up again. Bar not the 49 exit into the ocean. The moment you do that, death seizes you.

50 Be, therefore, not a beggar; be unattached. This is the most 51 terrible task of life! You do not calculate the dangers on the path.

1 Even by intellectually recognising the difficulties, we really do not 2 know them until we feel them. From a distance we may get a
3 general view of a park: well, what of that? We feel and really know 4 it when we are in it. Even if our every attempt is a failure, and we 5 bleed and are torn asunder, yet, through all this, we have to 6 preserve our heart--we must assert our God-head in the midst of all 7 these difficulties. Nature wants us to react, to return blow for blow, 8 cheating for cheating, lie for lie, to hit back with all our might. Then 9 it requires a superdivine power not to hit back, to keep control, to 10 be unattached.

11 Every day we renew our determination to be unattached. We 12 cast our eyes back and look at the past objects of our love and 13 attachment, and feel how every one of them made us miserable. We 14 went down into the depths of dependency because of our "love"! We 15 found ourselves mere slaves in the hands of others, we were 16 dragged down and down! And we make a fresh determination: 17 "Henceforth, I will be master of myself; henceforth, I will have 18 control over myself." But the time comes, and the same story once 19 more! Again the soul is caught and cannot get out. The bird is in a 20 net, struggling and fluttering. This is our life.

21 I know the difficulties. Tremendous they are, and ninety per 22 cent of us become discouraged and lose heart, and in our turn, 23 often become pessimists and cease to believe in sincerity, love, and 24 all that is grand and noble. So, we find men who in the freshness of 25 their lives have been forgiving, kind, simple, and guileless, become 26 in old age lying masks of men. Their minds are a mass of intricacy.
27 There may be a good deal of external policy, possibly. They are not 28 hot-headed, they do not speak, but it would be better for them to do 29 so; their hearts are dead and, therefore, they do not speak. They do 30 not curse, not become angry; but it would be better for them to be 31 able to be angry; a thousand times better, to be able to curse. They 32 cannot. There is death in the heart, for cold hands have seized upon 33 it, and it can no more act, even to utter a curse, even to use a harsh 34 word.

35 All this we have to avoid: therefore I say, we require 36 superdivine power. Superhuman power is not strong enough.
37 Superdivine strength is the only way, the one way out. By it alone 38 we can pass through all these intricacies, through these showers of 39 miseries, unscathed. We may be cut to pieces, torn asunder, yet our 40 hearts must grow nobler and nobler all the time.

41 It is very difficult, but we can overcome the difficulty by 42 constant practice. We must learn that nothing can happen to us, 43 unless we make ourselves susceptible to it. I have just said, no 44 disease can come to me until the body is ready; it does not depend 45 alone on the germs, but upon a certain predisposition which is 46 already in the body. We get only that for which we are fitted. Let us 47 give up our pride and understand this, that never is misery 48 undeserved. There never has been a blow undeserved: there never 49 has been an evil for which I did not pave the way with my own 50 hands. We ought to know that. Analyse yourselves and you will find 51 that every blow you have received, came to you because you 52 prepared yourselves for it. You did half, and the external world did

1 the other half: that is how the blow came. That will sober us down.
2 At the same time, from this very analysis will come a note of hope, 3 and the note of hope is: "I have no control of the external world, but 4 that which is in me and nearer unto me, my own world, is in my 5 control. If the two together are required to make a failure, if the 6 two together are necessary to give me a blow, I will not contribute 7 the one which is in my keeping; and how then can the blows come?
8 If I get real control of myself, the blow will never come."

9 We are all the time, from our childhood, trying to lay the 10 blame upon something outside ourselves. We are always standing 11 up to set right other people, and not ourselves. If we are miserable, 12 we say, "Oh, the world is a devil's world." We curse others and say, 13 "What infatuated fools!" But why should we be in such a world, if 14 we really are so good? If this is a devil's world, we must be devils 15 also; why else should we be here? "Oh, the people of the world are 16 so selfish!" True enough; but why should we be found in that 17 company, if we be better? Just think of that.

18 We only get what we deserve. It is a lie when we say, the 19 world is bad and we are good. It can never be so. It is a terrible lie 20 we tell ourselves.

21 This is the first lesson to learn: be determined not to curse 22 anything outside, not to lay the blame upon any one outside, but be 23 a man, stand up, lay the blame on yourself. You will find, that is 24 always true. Get hold of yourself.

25 Is it not a shame that at one moment we talk so much of our 26 manhood, of our being gods--that we know everything, we can do 27 everything, we are blameless, spotless, the most unselfish people in 28 the world; and at the next moment, a little stone hurts us, a little 29 anger from a little Jack wounds us--any fool in the street makes 30 "these gods" miserable! Should this be so if we are such gods? Is it 31 true that the world is to blame? Could God, who is the purest and 32 noblest of souls, be made miserable by any of our tricks? If you are 33 so unselfish, you are like God. What world can hurt you? You would 34 go through the seventh hell unscathed, untouched. But the very fact 35 that you complain and want to lay blame upon the external world 36 shows that you feel the external world--the very fact that you feel 37 shows that you are not what you claim to be. You only make your 38 offence greater by heaping misery upon misery, by imagining that 39 the external world is hurting you, and crying out, "Oh, this devil's 40 world! This man hurts me; that man hurts me!" and so forth. It is 41 adding lies to misery.

42 We are to take care of ourselves--that much we can do--and 43 give up attending to others for a time. Let us perfect the means; the 44 end will take care of itself. For the world can be good and pure, 45 only if our lives are good and pure. It is an effect, and we are the 46 means. Therefore, let us purify ourselves. Let us make ourselves 47 perfect.

THE POWERS OF THE MIND

(Delivered at Los Angeles, California, January 8, 1900)

All over the world there has been the belief in the supernatural throughout the ages. All of us have heard of extraordinary happenings, and many of us have had some personal experience of them. I would rather introduce the subject by telling you certain facts which have come within my own experience. I once heard of a man who, if any one went to him with questions in his mind, would answer them immediately; and I was also informed that he foretold events. I was curious and went to see him with a few friends. We each had something in our minds to ask, and, to avoid mistakes, we wrote down our questions and put them in our pockets. As soon as the man saw one of us, he repeated our questions and gave the answers to them. Then he wrote something on paper, which he folded up, asked me to sign on the back, and said, "Don't look at it; put it in your pocket and keep it there till I ask for it again." And so on to each one of us. He next told us about some events that would happen to us in the future. Then he said, "Now, think of a word or a sentence, from any language you like." I thought of a long sentence from Sanskrit, a language of which he was entirely ignorant. "Now, take out the paper from your pocket," he said. The Sanskrit sentence was written there! He had written it an hour before with the remark, "In confirmation of what I have written, this man will think of this sentence." It was correct. Another of us who had been given a similar paper which he had signed and placed in his pocket, was also asked to think of a sentence. He thought of a sentence in Arabic, which it was still less possible for the man to know; it was some passage from the Koran. And my friend found this written down on the paper.

Another of us was a physician. He thought of a sentence from a German medical book. It was written on his paper.

Several days later I went to this man again, thinking possibly I had been deluded somehow before. I took other friends, and on this occasion also he came out wonderfully triumphant.

Another time I was in the city of Hyderabad in India, and I was told of a Brahmin there who could produce numbers of things from where, nobody knew. This man was in business there; he was a respectable gentleman. And I asked him to show me his tricks. It so happened that this man had a fever, and in India there is a general belief that if a holy man puts his hand on a sick man he would be well. This Brahmin came to me and said, "Sir, put your hand on my head, so that my fever may be cured." I said, "Very good; but you show me your tricks." He promised. I put my hand on his head as desired, and later he came to fulfil his promise. He had only a strip of cloth about his loins, we took off everything else from him. I had a blanket which I gave him to wrap round himself, because it was cold, and made him sit in a corner. Twenty-five pairs of eyes were looking at him. And he said, "Now, look, write down anything you want." We all wrote down names of fruits that never grew in that country, bunches of grapes, oranges, and so on. And

1 we gave him those bits of paper. And there came from under his 2 blanket, bushels of grapes, oranges, and so forth, so much that if all 3 that fruit was weighed, it would have been twice as heavy as the 4 man. He asked us to eat the fruit. Some of us objected, thinking it
5 was hypnotism; but the man began eating himself--so we all ate. It 6 was all right.

7 He ended by producing a mass of roses. Each flower was 8 perfect, with dew-drops on the petals, not one crushed, not one 9 injured. And masses of them! When I asked the man for an 10 explanation, he said, "It is all sleight of hand."

11 Whatever it was, it seemed to be impossible that it could be 12 sleight of hand merely. From whence could he have got such large 13 quantities of things?

14 Well, I saw many things like that. Going about India you find 15 hundreds of similar things in different places. These are in every 16 country. Even in this country you will find some such wonderful 17 things. Of course there is a great deal of fraud, no doubt; but then, 18 whenever you see fraud, you have also to say that fraud is an 19 imitation. There must be some truth somewhere, that is being 20 imitated; you cannot imitate nothing. Imitation must be of 21 something substantially true.

22 In very remote times in India, thousands of years ago, these 23 facts used to happen even more than they do today. It seems to me 24 that when a country becomes very thickly populated, psychical
25 power deteriorates. Given a vast country thinly inhabited, there 26 will, perhaps, be more of psychical power there. These facts, the 27 Hindus, being analytically minded, took up and investigated. And 28 they came to certain conclusions; that is, they made a science of it.
29 They found out that all these, though extraordinary, are also 30 natural; there is nothing supernatural. They are under laws just the 31 same as any other physical phenomenon. It is not a freak of nature 32 that a man is born with such powers. They can be systematically 33 studied, practised, and acquired. This science they call the science 34 of Raja-Yoga. There are thousands of people who cultivate the study 35 of this science, and for the whole nation it has become a part of 36 daily worship.

37 The conclusion they have reached is that all these 38 extraordinary powers are in the mind of man. This mind is a part of 39 the universal mind. Each mind is connected with every other mind.
40 And each mind, wherever it is located, is in actual communication 41 with the whole world.

42 Have you ever noticed the phenomenon that is called thought-43 transference? A man here is thinking something, and that thought 44 is manifested in somebody else, in some other place. With 45 preparations--not by chance--a man wants to send a thought to 46 another mind at a distance, and this other mind knows that a 47 thought is coming, and he receives it exactly as it is sent out.
48 Distance makes no difference. The thought goes and reaches the 49 other man, and he understands it. If your mind were an isolated 50 something here, and my mind were an isolated something there, 51 and there were no connection between the two, how would it be

1 possible for my thought to reach you? In the ordinary cases, it is not 2 my thought that is reaching you direct; but my thought has got to 3 be dissolved into ethereal vibrations and those ethereal vibrations 4 go into your brain, and they have to be resolved again into your own 5 thoughts. Here is a dissolution of thought, and there is a resolution 6 of thought. It is a roundabout process. But in telepathy, there is no 7 such thing; it is direct.

8 This shows that there is a continuity of mind, as the Yogis call 9 it. The mind is universal. Your mind, my mind, all these little minds, 10 are fragments of that universal mind, little waves in the ocean; and 11 on account of this continuity, we can convey our thoughts directly to 12 one another.

13 You see what is happening all around us. The world is one of 14 influence. Part of our energy is used up in the preservation of our 15 own bodies. Beyond that, every particle of our energy is day and 16 night being used in influencing others. Our bodies, our virtues, our 17 intellect, and our spirituality, all these are continuously influencing 18 others; and so, conversely, we are being influenced by them. This is 19 going on all around us. Now, to take a concrete example. A man 20 comes; you know he is very learned, his language is beautiful, and 21 he speaks to you by the hour; but he does not make any impression.
22 Another man comes, and he speaks a few words, not well arranged, 23 ungrammatical perhaps; all the same, he makes an immense 24 impression. Many of you have seen that. So it is evident that words 25 alone cannot always produce an impression. Words, even thoughts 26 contribute only one-third of the influence in making an impression, 27 the man, two-thirds. What you call the personal magnetism of the 28 man--that is what goes out and impresses you.

29 In our families there are the heads; some of them are 30 successful, others are not. Why? We complain of others in our 31 failures. The moment I am unsuccessful, I say, so-and-so is the 32 cause of the failure. In failure, one does not like to confess one's 33 own faults and weaknesses. Each person tries to hold himself 34 faultless and lay the blame upon somebody or something else, or 35 even on bad luck. When heads of families fail, they should ask 36 themselves, why it is that some persons manage a family so well 37 and others do not. Then you will find that the difference is owing to 38 the man--his presence, his personality.

39 Coming to great leaders of mankind, we always find that it 40 was the personality of the man that counted. Now, take all the great 41 authors of the past, the great thinkers. Really speaking, how many 42 thoughts have they thought? Take all the writings that have been 43 left to us by the past leaders of mankind; take each one of their 44 books and appraise them. The real thoughts, new and genuine, that 45 have been thought in this world up to this time, amount to only a 46 handful. Read in their books the thoughts they have left to us. The 47 authors do not appear to be giants to us, and yet we know that they 48 were great giants in their days. What made them so? Not simply the 49 thoughts they thought, neither the books they wrote, nor the 50 speeches they made, it was something else that is now gone, that is 51 their personality. As I have already remarked, the personality of the 52 man is two-thirds, and his intellect, his words, are but one-third. It

1 is the real man, the personality of the man, that runs through us.
2 Our actions are but effects. Actions must come when the man is 3 there; the effect is bound to follow the cause.

4 The ideal of all education, all training, should be this man-5 making. But, instead of that, we are always trying to polish up the 6 outside. What use in polishing up the outside when there is no
7 inside? The end and aim of all training is to make the man grow.
8 The man who influences, who throws his magic, as it were, upon his 9 fellow-beings, is a dynamo of power, and when that man is ready, he 10 can do anything and everything he likes; that personality put upon 11 anything will make it work.

12 Now, we see that though this is a fact, no physical laws that 13 we know of will explain this. How can we explain it by chemical and 14 physical knowledge? How much of oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, how 15 many molecules in different positions, and how many cells, etc., etc.
16 can explain this mysterious personality? And we still see, it is a fact, 17 and not only that, it is the real man; and it is that man that lives and 18 moves and works, it is that man that influences, moves his fellow-19 beings, and passes out, and his intellect and books and works are 20 but traces left behind. Think of this. Compare the great teachers of 21 religion with the great philosophers. The philosophers scarcely 22 influenced anybody's inner man, and yet they wrote most 23 marvellous books. The religious teachers, on the other hand, moved 24 countries in their lifetime. The difference was made by personality.
25 In the philosopher it is a faint personality that influences; in the 26 great prophets it is tremendous. In the former we touch the 27 intellect, in the latter we touch life. In the one case, it is simply a 28 chemical process, putting certain chemical ingredients together 29 which may gradually combine and under proper circumstances 30 bring out a flash of light or may fail. In the other, it is like a torch 31 that goes round quickly, lighting others.

32 The science of Yoga claims that it has discovered the laws 33 which develop this personality, and by proper attention to those 34 laws and methods, each one can grow and strengthen his 35 personality. This is one of the great practical things, and this is the 36 secret of all education. This has a universal application. In the life 37 of a householder, in the life of the poor, the rich, the man of 38 business, the spiritual man, in every one's life, it is a great thing, 39 the strengthening of this personality. There are laws, very fine, 40 which are behind the physical laws, as we know. That is to say, 41 there are no such realities as a physical world, a mental world, a 42 spiritual world. Whatever is, is one. Let us say, it is a sort of 43 tapering existence; the thickest part is here, it tapers and becomes 44 finer and finer. The finest is what we call spirit; the grossest, the 45 body. And just as it is here in microcosm, it is exactly the same in 46 the macrocosm. The universe of ours is exactly like that; it is the 47 gross external thickness, and it tapers into something finer and 48 finer until it becomes God.

49 We also know that the greatest power is lodged in the fine, 50 not the coarse. We see a man take up a huge weight, we see his 51 muscles swell, and all over his body we see signs of exertion, and 52 we think the muscles are powerful things. But it is the thin thread-

1 like things, the nerves, which bring power to the muscles; the 2 moment one of these threads is cut off from reaching the muscles, 3 they are not able to work at all. These tiny nerves bring the power 4 from something still finer, and that again in its turn brings it from 5 something finer still--thought, and so on. So we can see the 6 movements in the gross; but when fine movements take place, we 7 cannot see them. When a gross thing moves, we catch it, and thus 8 we naturally identify movement with things which are gross. But all 9 the power is really in the fine. We do not see any movement in the 10 fine, perhaps, because the movement is so intense that we cannot 11 perceive it. But if by any science, any investigation, we are helped 12 to get hold of these finer forces which are the cause of the 13 expression, the expression itself will be under control. There is a 14 little bubble coming out of the bottom of a lake; we do not see it 15 coming all the time, we see it only when it bursts on the surface; so, 16 we can perceive thoughts only after they develop a great deal, or 17 after they become actions. We constantly complain that we have no 18 control over our actions, over our thoughts. But how can we have 19 it? If we can get control over the fine movements, if we can get hold 20 of thought at the root, before it has become thought, before it has 21 become action, then it would be possible for us to control the 22 whole. Now, if there is a method by which we can analyse, 23 investigate, understand, and finally grapple with those finer 24 powers, the finer causes, then alone is it possible to have control 25 over ourselves, and the man who has control over his own mind 26 assuredly will have control over every other mind. That is why 27 purity and morality have been always the object of religion; a pure, 28 moral man has control of himself. And all minds are the same, 29 different parts of one Mind. He who knows one lump of clay has 30 known all the clay in the universe. He who knows and controls his 31 own mind knows the secret of every mind and has power over every 32 mind.

33 Now, a good deal of our physical evil we can get rid of, if we 34 have control over the fine parts; a good many worries we can throw 35 off, if we have control over the fine movements; a good many 36 failures can be averted, if we have control over these fine powers.
37 So far, is utility. Yet beyond, there is something higher.

38 Now, I shall tell you a theory, which I will not argue now, but 39 simply place before you the conclusion. Each man in his childhood 40 runs through the stages through which his race has come up; only 41 the race took thousands of years to do it, while the child takes a few 42 years. The child is first the old savage man--and he crushes a 43 butterfly under his feet. The child is at first like the primitive 44 ancestors of his race. As he grows, he passes through different 45 stages until he reaches the development of his race. Only he does it 46 swiftly and quickly. Now, take the whole of humanity as a race, or 47 take the whole of the animal creation, man and the lower animals, 48 as one whole. There is an end towards which the whole is moving.
49 Let us call it perfection. Some men and women are born who 50 anticipate the whole progress of mankind. Instead of waiting and 51 being reborn over and over again for ages until the whole human 52 race has attained to that perfection, they, as it were, rush through

1 them in a few short years of their life. And we know that we can 2 hasten these processes, if we be true to ourselves. If a number of 3 men, without any culture, be left to live upon an island, and are 4 given barely enough food, clothing, and shelter, they will gradually 5 go on and on, evolving higher and higher stages of civilisation. We 6 know also, that this growth can be hastened by additional means.
7 We help the growth of trees, do we not? Left to nature they would 8 have grown, only they would have taken a longer time; we help 9 them to grow in a shorter time than they would otherwise have 10 taken. We are doing all the time the same thing, hastening the 11 growth of things by artificial means. Why cannot we hasten the 12 growth of man? We can do that as a race. Why are teachers sent to 13 other countries? Because by these means we can hasten the growth 14 of races. Now, can we not hasten the growth of individuals? We can.
15 Can we put a limit to the hastening? We cannot say how much a 16 man can grow in one life. You have no reason to say that this much 17 a man can do and no more. Circumstances can hasten him 18 wonderfully. Can there be any limit then, till you come to 19 perfection? So, what comes of it?--That a perfect man, that is to say, 20 the type that is to come of this race, perhaps millions of years 21 hence, that man can come today. And this is what the Yogis say, that 22 all the great incarnations and prophets are such men; that they 23 reached perfection in this one life. We have had such men at all 24 periods of the world's history and at all times. Quite recently, there 25 was such a man who lived the life of the whole human race and 26 reached the end--even in this life. Even this hastening of the growth 27 must be under laws. Suppose we can investigate these laws and 28 understand their secrets and apply them to our own needs; it 29 follows that we grow. We hasten our growth, we hasten our 30 development, and we become perfect, even in this life. This is the 31 higher part of our life, and the science of the study of mind and its 32 powers has this perfection as its real end. Helping others with 33 money and other material things and teaching them how to go on 34 smoothly in their daily life are mere details.

35 The utility of this science is to bring out the perfect man, and 36 not let him wait and wait for ages, just a plaything in the hands of 37 the physical world, like a log of drift-wood carried from wave to 38 wave and tossing about in the ocean. This science wants you to be 39 strong, to take the work in your own hand, instead of leaving it in 40 the hands of nature, and get beyond this little life. That is the great 41 idea.

42 Man is growing in knowledge, in power, in happiness.
43 Continuously, we are growing as a race. We see that is true, 44 perfectly true. Is it true of individuals? To a certain extent, yes. But 45 yet, again comes the question: Where do you fix the limit? I can see 46 only at a distance of so many feet. But I have seen a man close his 47 eyes and see what is happening in another room. If you say you do 48 not believe it, perhaps in three weeks that man can make you do 49 the same. It can be taught to anybody. Some persons, in five 50 minutes even, can be made to read what is happening in another 51 man's mind. These facts can be demonstrated.

52 Now, if these things are true, where can we put a limit? If a

1 man can read what is happening in another's mind in the corner of 2 this room, why not in the next room? Why not anywhere? We cannot 3 say, why not. We dare not say that it is not possible. We can only 4 say, we do not know how it happens. Material scientists have no 5 right to say that things like this are not possible; they can only say, 6 "We do not know." Science has to collect facts, generalise upon 7 them, deduce principles, and state the truth--that is all. But if we 8 begin by denying the facts, how can a science be?

9 There is no end to the power a man can obtain. This is the 10 peculiarity of the Indian mind, that when anything interests it, it 11 gets absorbed in it and other things are neglected. You know how 12 many sciences had their origin in India. Mathematics began there.
13 You are even today counting 1,2,3, etc. to zero, after Sanskrit 14 figures, and you all know that algebra also originated in India, and 15 that gravitation was known to the Indian thousands of years before 16 Newton was born.

17 You see the peculiarity. At a certain period of Indian history, 18 this one subject of man and his mind absorbed all their interest.
19 And it was so enticing, because it seemed the easiest way to 20 achieve their ends. Now, the Indian mind became so thoroughly 21 persuaded that the mind could do anything and everything 22 according to law, that its powers became the great object of study.
23 Charms, magic, and other powers, and all that were nothing 24 extraordinary, but a regularly taught science, just as the physical 25 sciences they had taught before that. Such a conviction in these 26 things came upon the race that physical sciences nearly died out. It 27 was the one thing that came before them. Different sects of Yogis 28 began to make all sorts of experiments. Some made experiments 29 with light, trying to find out how lights of different colours produced 30 changes in the body. They wore a certain coloured cloth, lived 31 under a certain colour, and ate certain coloured foods. All sorts of 32 experiments were made in this way. Others made experiments in 33 sound by stopping and unstopping their ears. And still others 34 experimented in the sense of smell, and so on.

35 The whole idea was to get at the basis, to reach the fine parts 36 of the thing. And some of them really showed most marvellous 37 powers. Many of them were trying to float in the air or pass through 38 it. I shall tell you a story which I heard from a great scholar in the 39 West. It was told him by a Governor of Ceylon who saw the 40 performance. A girl was brought forward and seated cross-legged 41 upon a stool made of sticks crossed. After she had been seated for a 42 time, the show-man began to take out, one after another, these 43 cross-bars; and when all were taken out, the girl was left floating in 44 the air. The Governor thought there was some trick, so he drew his 45 sword and violently passed it under the girl; nothing was there.
46 Now, what was this? It was not magic or something extraordinary.
47 That is the peculiarity. No one in India would tell you that things 48 like this do not exist. To the Hindu it is a matter of course. You know 49 what the Hindus would often say when they have to fight their 50 enemies--"Oh, one of our Yogis will come and drive the whole lot 51 out!" It is the extreme belief of the race. What power is there in the 52 hand or the sword? The power is all in the spirit.

1 If this is true, it is temptation enough for the mind to exert its 2 highest. But as with every other science it is very difficult to make 3 any great achievement, so also with this, nay much more. Yet most 4 people think that these powers can be easily gained. How many are 5 the years you take to make a fortune? Think of that! First, how 6 many years do you take to learn electrical science or engineering?
7 And then you have to work all the rest of your life.

8 Again, most of the other sciences deal with things that do not 9 move, that are fixed. You can analyse the chair, the chair does not 10 fly from you. But this science deals with the mind, which moves all 11 the time; the moment you want to study it, it slips. Now the mind is 12 in one mood, the next moment, perhaps, it is different, changing, 13 changing all the time. In the midst of all this change it has to be 14 studied, understood, grasped and controlled. How much more 15 difficult, then, is this science! It requires rigorous training. People 16 ask me why I do not give them practical lessons. Why, it is no joke. I 17 stand upon this platform talking to you and you go home and find no 18 benefit; nor do I. Then you say, "It is all bosh." It is because you 19 wanted to make a bosh of it. I know very little of this science, but 20 the little that I gained I worked for thirty years of my life, and for 21 six years I have been telling people the little that I know. It took me 22 thirty years to learn it; thirty years of hard struggle. Sometimes I 23 worked at it twenty hours during the twenty-four; sometimes I slept 24 only one hour in the night; sometimes I worked whole nights; 25 sometimes I lived in places where there was hardly a sound, hardly 26 a breath; sometimes I had to live in caves. Think of that. And yet I 27 know little or nothing; I have barely touched the hem of the 28 garment of this science. But I can understand that it is true and 29 vast and wonderful.

30 Now, if there is any one amongst you who really wants to 31 study this science, he will have to start with that sort of 32 determination, the same as, nay even more than, that which he puts 33 into any business of life.

34 And what an amount of attention does business require, and 35 what a rigorous taskmaster it is! Even if the father, the mother, the 36 wife, or the child dies, business cannot stop! Even if the heart is 37 breaking, we still have to go to our place of business, when every 38 hour of work is a pang. That is business, and we think that it is just, 39 that it is right.

40 This science calls for more application than any business can 41 ever require. Many men succeed in business; very few in this.
42 Because so much depends upon the particular constitution of the 43 person studying it. As in business all may not make a fortune, but 44 everyone can make something, so in the study of this science each 45 one can get a glimpse which will convince him of its truth and of the 46 fact that there have been men who realised it fully.

47 This is the outline of the science. It stands upon its own feet 48 and in its own light, and challenges comparison with any other 49 science. There have been charlatans, there have been magicians, 50 there have been cheats, and more here than in any other field.
51 Why? For the same reason, that the more profitable the business,

1 the greater the number of charlatans and cheats. But that is no
2 reason why the business should not be good. And one thing more; it 3 may be good intellectual gymnastics to listen to all the arguments 4 and an intellectual satisfaction to hear of wonderful things. But, if 5 any one of you really wants to learn something beyond that, merely 6 attending lectures will not do. That cannot be taught in lectures, for 7 it is life; and life can only convey life. If there are any amongst you 8 who are really determined to learn it, I shall be very glad to help 9 them.

HINTS ON PRACTICAL SPIRITUALITY

(Delivered at the Home of Truth, Los Angeles, California)

This morning I shall try to present to you some ideas about breathing and other exercises. We have been discussing theories so long that now it will be well to have a little of the practical. A great many books have been written in India upon this subject. Just as your people are practical in many things, so it seems our people are practical in this line. Five persons in this country will join their heads together and say, "We will have a joint-stock company", and in five hours it is done; in India they could not do it in fifty years; they are so unpractical in matters like this. But, mark you, if a man starts a system of philosophy, however wild its theory may be, it will have followers. For instance, a sect is started to teach that if a man stands on one leg for twelve years, day and night, he will get salvation--there will be hundreds ready to stand on one leg. All the suffering will be quietly borne. There are people who keep their arms upraised for years to gain religious merit. I have seen hundreds of them. And, mind you, they are not always ignorant fools, but are men who will astonish you with the depth and breadth of their intellect. So, you see, the word practical is also relative.

We are always making this mistake in judging others; we are always inclined to think that our little mental universe is all that is; our ethics, our morality, our sense of duty, our sense of utility, are the only things that are worth having. The other day when I was going to Europe, I was passing through Marseilles, where a bull-fight was being held. All the Englishmen in the steamer were mad with excitement, abusing and criticising the whole thing as cruel. When I reached England, I heard of a party of prize-fighters who had been to Paris, and were kicked out unceremoniously by the French, who thought prize-fighting very brutal. When I hear these things in various countries, I begin to understand the marvellous saying of Christ: "Judge not that ye be not judged." The more we learn, the more we find out how ignorant we are, how multiform and multi-sided is this mind of man. When I was a boy, I used to criticise the ascetic practices of my countrymen; great preachers in our own land have criticised them; the greatest man that was ever born, Buddha himself, criticised them. But all the same, as I am growing older, I feel that I have no right to judge. Sometimes I wish that, in spite of all their incongruities, I had one fragment of their power to do and to suffer. Often I think that my judgment and my criticism do not proceed from any dislike of torture, but from sheer cowardice--because I cannot do it--I dare not do it.

Then, you see that strength, power, and courage are things which are very peculiar. We generally say, "A courageous man, a brave man, a daring man", but we must bear in mind that courage or bravery or any other trait does not always characterise the man. The same man who would rush to the mouth of a cannon shrinks from the knife of the surgeon; and another man who never dares to face a gun will calmly bear a severe surgical operation, if need be. Now, in judging others you must always define your terms of

1 courage or greatness. The man whom I am criticising as not good 2 may be wonderfully so in some points in which I am not.

3 Take another example. You often note, when people are 4 discussing as to what man and woman can do, always the same 5 mistake is made. They think they show man at his best because he 6 can fight, for instance, and undergo tremendous physical exertion; 7 and this is pitted against the physical weakness and the non-8 combating quality of woman. This is unjust. Woman is as 9 courageous as man. Each is equally good in his or her way. What 10 man can bring up a child with such patience, endurance, and love 11 as the woman can? The one has developed the power of doing; the 12 other, the power of suffering. If woman cannot act, neither can man 13 suffer. The whole universe is one of perfect balance. I do not know, 14 but some day we may wake up and find that the mere worm has 15 something which balances our manhood. The most wicked person 16 may have some good qualities that I entirely lack. I see that every 17 day of my life. Look at the savage! I wish I had such a splendid 18 physique! He eats, he drinks, to his heart's content, without 19 knowing perhaps what sickness is, while I am suffering every 20 minute. How many times would I have been glad to have changed
21 my brain for his body! The whole universe is only a wave and a 22 hollow; there can be no wave without a hollow. Balance 23 everywhere. You have one thing great, your neighbour has another 24 thing great. When you are judging man and woman, judge them by 25 the standard of their respective greatness. One cannot be in other's 26 shoes. The one has no right to say that the other is wicked. It is the 27 same old superstition that says, "If this is done, the world will go to 28 ruin." But in spite of this the world has not yet come to ruin. It was 29 said in this country that if the Negroes were freed, the country 30 would go to ruin--but did it? It was also said that if the masses were 31 educated, the world would come to ruin--but it was only made 32 better. Several years ago a book came out depicting the worst thing 33 that could happen to England. The writer showed that as 34 workmen's wages were rising, English commerce was declining. A 35 cry was raised that the workmen in England were exorbitant in 36 their demands, and that the Germans worked for less wages. A 37 commission was sent over to Germany to investigate this and it was 38 reported that the German labourers received higher wages. Why 39 was it so? Because of the education of the masses. Then how about 40 the world going to ruin if the masses are educated? In India, 41 especially, we meet with old fogies all over the land. They want to 42 keep everything secret from the masses. These people come to the 43 very satisfying conclusion that they are the crème de la crème of 44 this universe. They believed they cannot be hurt by these 45 dangerous experiments. It is only the masses that can be hurt by 46 them!

47 Now, coming back to the practical. The subject of the 48 practical application of psychology has been taken up in India from 49 very early times. About fourteen hundred years before Christ, there 50 flourished in India a great philosopher, Patanjali by name. He 51 collected all the facts, evidences, and researches in psychology and 52 took advantage of all the experiences accumulated in the past.

1 Remember, this world is very old; it was not created two or three 2 thousand years ago. It is taught here in the West that society began 3 eighteen hundred years ago, with the New Testament. Before that 4 there was no society. That may be true with regard to the West, but 5 it is not true as regards the whole world. Often, while I was 6 lecturing in London, a very intellectual and intelligent friend of 7 mine would argue with me, and one day after using all his weapons 8 against me, he suddenly exclaimed, "But why did not your Rishis 9 come to England to teach us?" I replied, "Because there was no 10 England to come to. Would they preach to the forests?"

11 "Fifty years ago," said Ingersoll to me, "you would have been 12 hanged in this country if you had come to preach. You would have 13 been burnt alive or you would have been stoned out of the villages."

14 So there is nothing unreasonable in the supposition that 15 civilisation existed fourteen hundred years before Christ. It is not 16 yet settled whether civilisation has always come from the lower to 17 the higher. The same arguments and proofs that have been brought 18 forward to prove this proposition can also be used to demonstrate 19 that the savage is only a degraded civilised man. The people of 20 China, for instance, can never believe that civilisation sprang from 21 a savage state, because the contrary is within their experience. But 22 when you talk of the civilisation of America, what you mean is the 23 perpetuity and the growth of your own race.

24 It is very easy to believe that the Hindus, who have been 25 declining for seven hundred years, were highly civilised in the past.
26 We cannot prove that it is not so.

27 There is not one single instance of any civilisation being 28 spontaneous. There was not a race in the world which became 29 civilised unless another civilised race came and mingled with that 30 race. The origin of civilisation must have belonged, so to say, to one 31 or two races who went abroad, spread their ideas, and intermingled 32 with other races and thus civilisation spread.

33 For practical purposes, let us talk in the language of modern 34 science. But I must ask you to bear in mind that, as there is 35 religious superstition, so also there is a superstition in the matter of 36 science. There are priests who take up religious work as their 37 specialty; so also there are priests of the physical laws, scientists.
38 As soon as a great scientist's name, like Darwin or Huxley, is cited, 39 we follow blindly. It is the fashion of the day. Ninety-nine per cent of 40 what we call scientific knowledge is mere theories. And many of 41 them are no better than the old superstitions of ghosts with many 42 heads and hands, but with this difference that the latter 43 differentiated man a little from stocks and stones. True science asks 44 us to be cautious. Just as we should be careful with the priests, so 45 we should be with the scientists. Begin with disbelief. Analyse, test, 46 prove everything, and then take it. Some of the most current beliefs 47 of modern science have not been proved. Even in such a science as 48 mathematics, the vast majority of its theories are only working 49 hypotheses. With the advent of greater knowledge they will be 50 thrown away.

51 In 1400 B.C. a great sage made an attempt to arrange,

1 analyse, and generalise upon certain psychological facts. He was 2 followed by many others who took up parts of what he had 3 discovered and made a special study of them. The Hindus alone of 4 all ancient races took up the study of this branch of knowledge in 5 right earnest. I am teaching you now about it, but how many of you 6 will practise it? How many days, how many months will it be before 7 you give it up? You are impractical on this subject. In India, they 8 will persevere for ages and ages. You will be astonished to hear that 9 they have no churches, no Common Prayers, or anything of the 10 kind; but they, every day, still practise the breathings and try to 11 concentrate the mind; and that is the chief part of their devotion.
12 These are the main points. Every Hindu must do these. It is the 13 religion of the country. Only, each one may have a special method--a 14 special form of breathing, a special form of concentration, and what 15 is one's special method, even one's wife need not know; the father 16 need not know the son's. But they all have to do these. And there is 17 nothing occult about these things. The word "occult" has no bearing 18 on them. Near the Ganga thousands and thousands of people may 19 be seen daily sitting on its banks breathing and concentrating with 20 closed eyes. There may be two reasons that make certain practices 21 impracticable for the generality of mankind. One is, the teachers 22 hold that the ordinary people are not fit for them. There may be 23 some truth in this, but it is due more to pride. The second is the 24 fear of persecution. A man, for instance, would not like to practise 25 breathing publicly in this country, because he would be thought so 26 queer; it is not the fashion here. On the other hand, in India, if a 27 man prayed, "Give us this day our daily bread", people would laugh 28 at him. Nothing could be more foolish to the Hindu mind than to 29 say, "Our Father which art in Heaven." The Hindu, when he 30 worships, thinks that God is within himself.

31 According to the Yogis, there are three principal nerve 32 currents; one they call the Idâ, the other the Pingalâ, and the 33 middle one the Sushumnâ, and all these are inside the spinal 34 column. The Ida and the Pingala, the left and the right, are clusters 35 of nerves, while the middle one, the Sushumna, is hollow and is not 36 a cluster of nerves. This Sushumna is closed, and for the ordinary 37 man is of no use, for he works through the Ida and the Pingala only.
38 Currents are continually going down and coming up through these 39 nerves, carrying orders all over the body through other nerves 40 running to the different organs of the body.

41 It is the regulation and the bringing into rhythm of the Ida 42 and Pingala that is the great object of breathing. But that itself is 43 nothing--it is only so much air taken into the lungs; except for 44 purifying the blood, it is of no more use. There is nothing occult in 45 the air that we take in with our breath and assimilate to purify the 46 blood; the action is merely a motion. This motion can be reduced to 47 the unit movement we call Prâna; and everywhere, all movements 48 are the various manifestations of this Prana. This Prana is 49 electricity, it is magnetism; it is thrown out by the brain as thought.
50 Everything is Prana; it is moving the sun, the moon, and the stars.

51 We say, whatever is in this universe has been projected by the 52 vibration of the Prana. The highest result of vibration is thought. If 1 there be any higher, we cannot conceive of it. The nerves, Ida and 2 Pingala, work through the Prana. It is the Prana that is moving 3 every part of the body, becoming the different forces. Give up that 4 old idea that God is something that produces the effect and sits on a 5 throne dispensing justice. In working we become exhausted

6 because we use up so much Prana.

7 The breathing exercises, called Prânâyâma, bring about 8 regulation of the breathing, rhythmic action of the Prana. When the 9 Prana is working rhythmically, everything works properly. When the 10 Yogis get control over their own bodies, if there is any disease in 11 any part, they know that the Prana is not rhythmic there and they 12 direct the Prana to the affected part until the rhythm is re-13 established.

14 Just as you can control the Prana in your own body, so, if you 15 are powerful enough, you can control, even from here another 16 man's Prana in India. It is all one. There is no break; unity is the 17 law. Physically, psychically, mentally, morally, metaphysically, it is all 18 one. Life is only a vibration. That which vibrates this ocean of ether, 19 vibrates you. Just as in a lake, various strata of ice of various 20 degrees of solidity are formed, or as in an ocean of vapour there are 21 various degrees of density, so is this universe an ocean of matter.
22 This is an ocean of ether in which we find the sun, moon, stars, and 23 ourselves--in different states of solidity; but the continuity is not 24 broken; it is the same throughout.

25 Now, when we study metaphysics, we come to know the 26 world is one, not that the spiritual, the material, the mental, and the 27 world of energies are separate. It is all one, but seen from different 28 planes of vision. When you think of yourself as a body, you forget 29 that you are a mind, and when you think of yourself as a mind, you 30 will forget the body. There is only one thing, that you are; you can 31 see it either as matter or body--or you can see it as mind or spirit.
32 Birth, life, and death are but old superstitions. None was ever born, 33 none will ever die; one changes one's position--that is all. I am sorry 34 to see in the West how much they make of death; always trying to 35 catch a little life. "Give us life after death! Give us life!" They are so 36 happy if anybody tells them that they are going to live afterwards!
37 How can I ever doubt such a thing! How can I imagine that I am 38 dead! Try to think of yourself as dead, and you will see that you are 39 present to see your own dead body. Life is such a wonderful reality 40 that you cannot for a moment forget it. You may as well doubt that 41 you exist. This is the first fact of consciousness--I am. Who can 42 imagine a state of things which never existed? It is the most self-43 evident of all truths. So, the idea of immortality is inherent in man.
44 How can one discuss a subject that is unimaginable? Why should 45 we want to discuss the pros and cons of a subject that is self-46 evident?

47 The whole universe, therefore, is a unit, from whatever 48 standpoint you view it. Just now, to us, this universe is a unit of 49 Prana and Akasha, force and matter. And mind you, like all other 50 basic principles, this is also self-contradictory. For what is force?-- 51 that which moves matter. And what is matter?--that which is moved 52 by force. It is a seesaw! Some of the fundamentals of our reasoning

1 are most curious, in spite of our boast of science and knowledge. 'It 2 is a headache without a head", as the Sanskrit proverb says. This 3 state of things has been called Maya. It has neither existence nor 4 non-existence. You cannot call it existence, because that only exists 5 which is beyond time and space, which is self-existence. Yet this 6 world satisfies to a certain degree our idea of existence. Therefore 7 it has an apparent existence.

8 But there is the real existence in and through everything; and 9 that reality, as it were, is caught in the meshes of time, space, and 10 causation. There is the real man, the infinite, the beginningless, the 11 endless, the ever-blessed, the ever-free. He has been caught in the 12 meshes of time, space, and causation. So has everything in this 13 world. The reality of everything is the same infinite. This is not 14 idealism; it is not that the world does not exist. It has a relative 15 existence, and fulfils all its requirements. But it has no independent 16 existence. It exists because of the Absolute Reality beyond time, 17 space, and causation.

18 I have made long digressions. Now, let us return to our main 19 subject.

20 All the automatic movements and all the conscious 21 movements are the working of Prana through the nerves. Now, you 22 see, it will be a very good thing to have control over the 23 unconscious actions.

24 On some other occasions, I told you the definition of God and 25 man. Man is an infinite circle whose circumference is nowhere, but 26 the centre is located in one spot; and God is an infinite circle whose 27 circumference is nowhere, but whose centre is everywhere. He 28 works through all hands, sees through all eyes, walks on all feet, 29 breathes through all bodies, lives in all life, speaks through every 30 mouth, and thinks through every brain. Man can become like God 31 and acquire control over the whole universe if he multiplies 32 infinitely his centre of self-consciousness. Consciousness, therefore, 33 is the chief thing to understand. Let us say that here is an infinite 34 line amid darkness. We do not see the line, but on it there is one 35 luminous point which moves on. As it moves along the line, it lights 36 up its different parts in succession, and all that is left behind 37 becomes dark again. Our consciousness may well be likened to this 38 luminous point. Its past experiences have been replaced by the 39 present, or have become subconscious. We are not aware of their 40 presence in us; but there they are, unconsciously influencing our 41 body and mind. Every movement that is now being made without 42 the help of consciousness was previously conscious. Sufficient 43 impetus has been given to it to work of itself.

44 The great error in all ethical systems, without exception, has 45 been the failure of teaching the means by which man could refrain 46 from doing evil. All the systems of ethics teach, "Do not steal!" Very 47 good; but why does a man steal? Because all stealing, robbing, and 48 other evil actions, as a rule, have become automatic. The systematic 49 robber, thief, liar, unjust man and woman, are all these in spite of 50 themselves! It is really a tremendous psychological problem. We 51 should look upon man in the most charitable light. It is not so easy

1 to be good. What are you but mere machines until you are free?
2 Should you be proud because you are good? Certainly not. You are 3 good because you cannot help it. Another is bad because he cannot 4 help it. If you were in his position, who knows what you would have 5 been. The woman in the street, or the thief in the jail, is the Christ
6 that is being sacrificed that you may be a good man. Such is the law 7 of balance. All the thieves and the murderers, all the unjust, the 8 weakest, the wickedest, the devils, they are all my Christ! I owe a 9 worship to the God Christ and to the demon Christ! That is my 10 doctrine, I cannot help it. My salutation goes to the feet of the good, 11 the saintly, and to the feet of the wicked and the devilish! They are 12 all my teachers, all are my spiritual fathers, all are my Saviours. I 13 may bless one and yet benefit by his failings; I may bless another 14 and benefit by his good deeds. This is as true as that I stand here. I 15 have to sneer at the woman walking in the street, because society 16 wants it! She, my Saviour, she, whose street-walking is the cause of 17 the chastity of other women! Think of that. Think, men and women, 18 of this question in your mind. It is a truth--a bare, bold truth! As I 19 see more of the world, see more of the men and women, this 20 conviction grows stronger. Whom shall I blame? Whom shall I 21 praise? Both sides of the shield must be seen.

22 The task before us is vast; and first and foremost, we must 23 seek to control the vast mass of sunken thoughts which have 24 become automatic with us. The evil deed is, no doubt, on the 25 conscious plane; but the cause which produced the evil deed was 26 far beyond in the realms of the unconscious, unseen, and therefore 27 more potent.

28 Practical psychology directs first of all its energies in 29 controlling the unconscious, and we know that we can do it. Why?
30 Because we know the cause of the unconscious is the conscious; the 31 unconscious thoughts are the submerged millions of our old 32 conscious thoughts, old conscious actions become petrified--we do 33 not look at them, do not know them, have forgotten them. But mind 34 you, if the power of evil is in the unconscious, so also is the power 35 of good. We have many things stored in us as in a pocket. We have 36 forgotten them, do not even think of them, and there are many of 37 them, rotting, becoming positively dangerous; they come forth, the 38 unconscious causes which kill humanity. True psychology would, 39 therefore, try to bring them under the control of the conscious. The 40 great task is to revive the whole man, as it were, in order to make 41 him the complete master of himself. Even what we call the 42 automatic action of the organs within our bodies, such as the liver 43 etc., can be made to obey our commands.

44 This is the first part of the study, the control of the 45 unconscious. The next is to go beyond the conscious. Just as 46 unconscious work is beneath consciousness, so there is another 47 work which is above consciousness. When this superconscious state 48 is reached, man becomes free and divine; death becomes 49 immortality, weakness becomes infinite power, and iron bondage 50 becomes liberty. That is the goal, the infinite realm of the 51 superconscious.

52 So, therefore, we see now that there must be a twofold work.

1 First, by the proper working of the Ida and the Pingala, which are 2 the two existing ordinary currents, to control the subconscious
3 action; and secondly, to go beyond even consciousness.

4 The books say that he alone is the Yogi who, after long 5 practice in self-concentration, has attained to this truth. The 6 Sushumna now opens and a current which never before entered 7 into this new passage will find its way into it, and gradually ascend 8 to (what we call in figurative language) the different lotus centres, 9 till at last it reaches the brain. Then the Yogi becomes conscious of 10 what he really is, God Himself.

11 Everyone without exception, everyone of us, can attain to this 12 culmination of Yoga. But it is a terrible task. If a person wants to 13 attain to this truth, he will have to do something more than to listen 14 to lectures and take a few breathing exercises. Everything lies in 15 the preparation. How long does it take to strike a light? Only a 16 second; but how long it takes to make the candle! How long does it 17 take to eat a dinner? Perhaps half an hour. But hours to prepare the 18 food! We want to strike the light in a second, but we forget that the 19 making of the candle is the chief thing.

20 But though it is so hard to reach the goal, yet even our 21 smallest attempts are not in vain. We know that nothing is lost. In 22 the Gita, Arjuna asks Krishna, "Those who fail in attaining 23 perfection in Yoga in this life, are they destroyed like the clouds of 24 summer?" Krishna replies, "Nothing, my friend, is lost in this world.
25 Whatever one does, that remains as one's own, and if the fruition of 26 Yoga does not come in this life, one takes it up again in the next 27 birth." Otherwise, how do you explain the marvellous childhood of 28 Jesus, Buddha, Shankara?

29 Breathing, posturing, etc. are no doubt helps in Yoga; but 30 they are merely physical. The great preparations are mental. The 31 first thing necessary is a quiet and peaceable life.

32 If you want to be a Yogi, you must be free, and place yourself 33 in circumstances where you are alone and free from all anxiety. He 34 who desires a comfortable and nice life and at the same time wants 35 to realise the Self is like the fool who, wanting to cross the river, 36 caught hold of a crocodile, mistaking it for a log of wood.¹ "Seek ye 37 first the kingdom of God, and everything shall be added unto you." 38 This is the one great duty, this is renunciation. Live for an ideal, and 39 leave no place in the mind for anything else. Let us put forth all our 40 energies to acquire that which never fails--our spiritual perfection.
41 If we have true yearning for realisation, we must struggle, and 42 through struggle growth will come. We shall make mistakes, but 43 they may be angels unawares.

44 The greatest help to spiritual life is meditation (Dhyana). In 45 meditation we divest ourselves of all material conditions and feel 46 our divine nature. We do not depend upon any external help in 47 meditation. The touch of the soul can paint the brightest colour 48 even in the dingiest places; it can cast a fragrance over the vilest

1 thing; it can make the wicked divine--and all enmity, all selfishness 2 is effaced. The less the thought of the body, the better. For it is the 3 body that drags us down. It is attachment, identification, which 4 makes us miserable. That is the secret: To think that I am the spirit 5 and not the body, and that the whole of this universe with all its 6 relations, with all its good and all its evil, is but as a series of 7 paintings--scenes on a canvas--of which I am the witness.

BHAKTI OR DEVOTION

The idea of a Personal God has obtained in almost every religion, except a very few. With the exception of the Buddhist and the Jain, perhaps all the religions of the world have the idea of a Personal God, and with it comes the idea of devotion and worship. The Buddhists and the Jains, although they have no Personal God, worship the founders of their religions in precisely the same way as others worship a Personal God. This idea of devotion and worship to some higher being who can reflect back the love to man is universal. In various religions this love and devotion is manifested in various degrees, at different states. The lowest stage is that of ritualism, when abstract ideas are almost impossible, and are dragged down to the lowest plane, and made concrete. Forms come into play, and, along with them, various symbols. Throughout the history of the world, we find that man is trying to grasp the abstract through thought-forms, or symbols. All the external manifestations of religion--bells, music, rituals, books, and images--come under that head. Anything that appeals to the senses, anything that helps man to form a concrete image of the abstract, is taken hold of, and worshipped.

From time to time, there have been reformers in every religion who have stood against all symbols and rituals. But vain has been their opposition, for so long as man will remain as he is, the vast majority will always want something concrete to hold on to, something around which, as it were, to place their ideas, something which will be the centre of all the thought-forms in their minds. The great attempts of the Mohammedans and of the Protestants have been directed to this one end, of doing away with all rituals, and yet we find that even with them, rituals have crept in. They cannot be kept out; after long struggle, the masses simply change one symbol for another. The Mohammedan, who thinks that every ritual, every form, image, or ceremony, used by a non-Mohammedan is sinful, does not think so when he comes to his own shrine, the Caaba. Every religious Mohammedan wherever he prays, must imagine that he is standing before the Caaba. When he makes a pilgrimage there, he must kiss the black stone in the wall of the shrine. All the kisses that have been imprinted on that stone, by millions and millions of pilgrims, will stand up as witnesses for the benefit of the faithful on the last day of judgment. Then, there is the well of Zimzim. Mohammedans believe that whoever draws a little water out of that well will have his sins pardoned, and he will, after the day of resurrection, have a fresh body, and live for ever. In others, we find that the symbology comes in the form of buildings. Protestants hold that churches are more sacred than other places. The church, as it is, stands for a symbol. Or there is the Book. The idea of the Book, to them, is much holier than any other symbol.

It is vain to preach against the use of symbols, and why should we preach against them? There is no reason why man should not use symbols. They have them in order to represent the ideas signified behind them. This universe is a symbol, in and

1 through which we are trying to grasp the thing signified, which is 2 beyond and behind. The spirit is the goal, and not matter. Forms, 3 images, bells, candles, books, churches, temples, and all holy 4 symbols are very good, very helpful to the growing plant of 5 spirituality, but thus far and no farther. In the vast majority of cases, 6 we find that the plant does not grow. It is very good to be born in a 7 church, but it is very bad to die in a church. It is very good to be 8 born within the limits of certain forms that help the little plant of 9 spirituality, but if a man dies within the bounds of these forms, it 10 shows that he has not grown, that there has been no development 11 of the soul.

12 If, therefore, any one says that symbols, rituals, and forms are 13 to be kept for ever, he is wrong; but if he says, that these symbols 14 and rituals are a help to the growth of the soul, in its low and 15 undeveloped state, he is right. But, you must not mistake this 16 development of the soul as meaning anything intellectual. A man 17 can be of gigantic intellect, yet spiritually he may be a baby. You 18 can verify it this minute. All of you have been taught to believe in an 19 Omnipresent God. Try to think of it. How few of you can have any 20 idea of what omnipresence means! If you struggle hard, you will get 21 something like the idea of the ocean, or of the sky, or of a vast 22 stretch of green earth, or of a desert. All these are material images, 23 and so long as you cannot conceive of the abstract as abstract, of 24 the ideal as the ideal, you will have to resort to these forms, these 25 material images. It does not make much difference whether these 26 images are inside or outside the mind. We are all born idolaters, 27 and idolatry is good, because it is in the nature of man. Who can get 28 beyond it? Only the perfect man, the God-man. The rest are all 29 idolaters. So long as we see this universe before us, with its forms 30 and shapes, we are all idolaters. This is a gigantic symbol we are 31 worshipping. He who says he is the body is a born idolater. We are 32 spirit, spirit that has no form or shape, spirit that is infinite, and not 33 matter. Therefore, anyone who cannot grasp the abstract, who 34 cannot think of himself as he is, except in and through matter, as 35 the body, is an idolater. And yet how people fight among 36 themselves, calling one another idolaters! In other words, each 37 says, his idol is right, and the others' are wrong.

38 Therefore, we should get rid of these childish notions. We 39 should get beyond the prattle of men who think that religion is 40 merely a mass of frothy words, that it is only a system of doctrines; 41 to whom religion is only a little intellectual assent or dissent; to 42 whom religion is believing in certain words which their own priests 43 tell them; to whom religion is something which their forefathers 44 believed; to whom religion is a certain form of ideas and 45 superstitions to which they cling because they are their national 46 superstitions. We should get beyond all these and look at humanity 47 as one vast organism, slowly coming towards light--a wonderful 48 plant, slowly unfolding itself to that wonderful truth which is called 49 God--and the first gyrations, the first motions, towards this are 50 always through matter and through ritual.

51 In the heart of all these ritualisms, there stands one idea 52 prominent above all the rest--the worship of a name. Those of you

1 who have studied the older forms of Christianity, those of you who 2 have studied the other religions of the world, perhaps have marked 3 that there is this idea with them all, the worship of a name. A name 4 is said to be very sacred. In the Bible we read that the holy name of 5 God was considered sacred beyond compare, holy beyond 6 everything. It was the holiest of all names, and it was thought that 7 this very Word was God. This is quite true. What is this universe but 8 name and form? Can you think without words? Word and thought 9 are inseparable. Try if any one of you can separate them. Whenever 10 you think, you are doing so through word forms. The one brings the 11 other; thought brings the word, and the word brings the thought.
12 Thus the whole universe is, as it were, the external symbol of God, 13 and behind that stands His grand name. Each particular body is a 14 form, and behind that particular body is its name. As soon as you 15 think of your friend So-and-so, there comes the idea of his body, and 16 as soon as you think of your friend's body, you get the idea of his 17 name. This is in the constitution of man. That is to say, 18 psychologically, in the mind-stuff of man, there cannot come the 19 idea of name without the idea of form, and there cannot come the 20 idea of form without the idea of name. They are inseparable; they 21 are the external and the internal sides of the same wave. As such, 22 names have been exalted and worshipped all over the world--
23 consciously or unconsciously, man found the glory of names.

24 Again, we find that in many different religions, holy 25 personages have been worshipped. They worship Krishna, they 26 worship Buddha, they worship Jesus, and so forth. Then, there is 27 the worship of saints; hundreds of them have been worshipped all 28 over the world, and why not? The vibration of light is everywhere.
29 The owl sees it in the dark. That shows it is there, though man 30 cannot see it. To man, that vibration is only visible in the lamp, in 31 the sun, in the moon, etc. God is omnipresent, He is manifesting 32 Himself in every being; but for men, He is only visible, 33 recognisable, in man. When His light, His presence, His spirit, 34 shines through the human face, then and then alone, can man 35 understand Him. Thus, man has been worshipping God through 36 men all the time, and must do so as long as he is a man. He may cry 37 against it, struggle against it, but as soon as he attempts to realise 38 God, he will find the constitutional necessity of thinking of God as a 39 man.

40 So we find that in almost every religion these are the three 41 primary things which we have in the worship of God--forms or 42 symbols, names, God-men. All religions have these, but you find 43 that they want to fight with each other. One says, "My name is the 44 only name; my form is the only form; and my God-men are the only 45 God-men in the world; yours are simply myths." In modern times, 46 Christian clergymen have become a little kinder, and they allow that 47 in the older religions, the different forms of worship were 48 foreshadowings of Christianity, which of course, they consider, is 49 the only true form. God tested Himself in older times, tested His 50 powers by getting these things into shape which culminated in 51 Christianity. This, at least, is a great advance. Fifty years ago they 52 would not have said even that; nothing was true except their own

1 religion. This idea is not limited to any religion, nation, or class of 2 persons; people are always thinking that the only right thing to be 3 done by others is what they themselves are doing. And it is here 4 that the study of different religions helps us. It shows us that the 5 same thoughts that we have been calling ours, and ours alone, were 6 present hundreds of years ago in others, and sometimes even in a 7 better form of expression than our own.

8 These are the external forms of devotion, through which man 9 has to pass; but if he is sincere, if he really wants to reach the 10 truth, he goes higher than these, to a plane where forms are as 11 nothing. Temples or churches, books or forms, are simply the 12 kindergarten of religion, to make the spiritual child strong enough 13 to take higher steps; and these first steps are necessary if he wants 14 religion. With the thirst, the longing for God, comes real devotion, 15 real Bhakti. Who has the longing? That is the question. Religion is 16 not in doctrines, in dogmas, nor in intellectual argumentation; it is 17 being and becoming, it is realisation. We hear so many talking 18 about God and the soul, and all the mysteries of the universe, but if 19 you take them one by one, and ask them, "Have you realised God?
20 Have you seen your Soul?"--how many can say they have? And yet 21 they are all fighting with one another! At one time, in India, 22 representatives of different sects met together and began to 23 dispute. One said that the only God was Shiva; another said, the 24 only God was Vishnu, and so on; and there was no end to their 25 discussion. A sage was passing that way, and was invited by the 26 disputants to decide the matter. He first asked the man who was 27 claiming Shiva as the greatest God. "Have you seen Shiva? Are you 28 acquainted with Him? If not, how do you know He is the greatest 29 God?" Then turning to the worshipper of Vishnu, he asked, "Have 30 you seen Vishnu?" And after asking this question to all of them, he 31 found out that not one of them knew anything of God. That was why 32 they were disputing so much, for had they really known, they would 33 not have argued. When a jar is being filled with water, it makes a 34 noise, but when it is full, there is no noise. So, the very fact of these 35 disputations and fighting among sects shows that they do not know 36 anything about religion. Religion to them is a mere mass of frothy 37 words, to be written in books. Each one hurries to write a big book, 38 to make it as massive as possible, stealing his materials from every 39 book he can lay his hands upon, and never acknowledging his 40 indebtedness. Then he launches his book upon the world, adding to 41 the disturbance that is already existing there.

42 The vast majority of men are atheists. I am glad that, in 43 modern times, another class of atheists has come into existence in 44 the Western world--I mean the materialists. They are sincere 45 atheists. They are better than the religious atheists, who are 46 insincere, who fight and talk about religion, and yet do not want it, 47 never try to realise it, never try to understand it. Remember the 48 words of Christ: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall 49 find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." These words are 50 literally true, not figures or fiction. They were the outflow of the 51 heart's blood of one the greatest sons of God who have ever come 52 to this world of ours; words which came as the fruit of realisation,

1 from a man who had felt and realised God himself; who had spoken
2 with God, lived with God, a hundred times more intensely than you
3 or I see this building. Who wants God? That is the question. Do you 4 think that all this mass of people in the world want God, and cannot 5 get Him? That cannot be. What want is there without its object 6 outside? Man wants to breathe, and there is air for him to breathe.
7 Man wants to eat, and there is food to eat. What creates these 8 desires? The existence of external things. It was the light that made 9 the eyes; it was the sound that made the ears. So every desire in 10 human beings has been created by something which already existed 11 outside. This desire for perfection, for reaching the goal and getting 12 beyond nature, how can it be there, until something has created it 13 and drilled it into the soul of man, and makes it live there? He, 14 therefore, in whom this desire is awakened, will reach the goal. We 15 want everything but God. This is not religion that you see all around 16 you. My lady has furniture in her parlour, from all over the world, 17 and now it is the fashion to have something Japanese; so she buys a 18 vase and puts it in her room. Such is religion with the vast majority; 19 they have all sorts of things for enjoyment, and unless they add a 20 little flavour of religion, life is not all right, because society would 21 criticise them. Society expects it; so they must have some religion.
22 This is the present state of religion in the world.

23 A disciple went to his master and said to him, "Sir, I want 24 religion." The master looked at the young man, and did not speak, 25 but only smiled. The young man came every day, and insisted that 26 he wanted religion. But the old man knew better than the young 27 man. One day, when it was very hot, he asked the young man to go 28 to the river with him and take a plunge. The young man plunged in, 29 and the old man followed him and held the young man down under 30 the water by force. After the young man had struggled for a while, 31 he let him go and asked him what he wanted most while he was 32 under the water. "A breath of air", the disciple answered. "Do you 33 want God in that way? if you do, you will get Him in a moment," 34 said the master. Until you have that thirst, that desire, you cannot 35 get religion, however you may struggle with your intellect, or your 36 books, or your forms. Until that thirst is awakened in you, you are 37 no better than any atheist; only the atheist is sincere, and you are 38 not.

39 A great sage used to say, "Suppose there is a thief in a room, 40 and somehow he comes to know that there is a vast mass of gold in 41 the next room, and that there is only a thin partition between the 42 two rooms. What would be the condition of that thief? He would be 43 sleepless, he would not be able to eat or do anything. His whole 44 mind would be on getting that gold. Do you mean to say that, if all 45 these people really believe that the Mine of Happiness, of 46 Blessedness, or Glory were here, they would act as they do in the 47 world, without trying to get God?" As soon as a man begins to 48 believe there is a God, he becomes mad with longing to get to Him.
49 Others may go their way, but as soon as a man is sure that there is 50 a much higher life than that which he is leading here, as soon as he 51 feels sure that the senses are not all, that this limited, material 52 body is as nothing compared with the immortal, eternal, undying

1 bliss of the Self, he becomes mad until he finds out this bliss for 2 himself. And this madness, this thirst, this mania, is what is called 3 the "awakening" to religion, and when that has come, a man is 4 beginning to be religious. But it takes a long time. All these forms 5 and ceremonies, these prayers and pilgrimages, these books, bells, 6 candles, and priests, are the preparations; they take off the 7 impurities from the soul. And when the soul has become pure, it 8 naturally wants to get to the mine of all purity, God Himself. Just as 9 a piece of iron, which had been covered with the dust of centuries, 10 might be lying near a magnet all the time, and yet not be attracted 11 by it, but as soon as the dust is cleared away, the iron is drawn by 12 the magnet; so, when the human soul, covered with the dust of 13 ages, impurities, wickednesses, and sins, after many births, 14 becomes purified enough by these forms and ceremonies, by doing 15 good to others, loving other beings, its natural spiritual attraction 16 comes, it wakes up and struggles towards God.

17 Yet, all these forms and symbols are simply the beginning, not 18 true love of God. Love we hear spoken of everywhere. Everyone 19 says, "Love God." Men do not know what it is to love; if they did, 20 they would not talk so glibly about it. Every man says he can love, 21 and then, in no time, finds out that there is no love in his nature.
22 Every woman says she can love and soon finds out that she cannot.
23 The world is full of the talk of love, but it is hard to love. Where is 24 love? How do you know that there is love? The first test of love is 25 that it knows no bargaining. So long as you see a man love another 26 only to get something from him, you know that that is not love; it is 27 shopkeeping. Wherever there is any question of buying and selling, 28 it is not love. So, when a man prays to God, "Give me this, and give 29 me that", it is not love. How can it be? I offer you a prayer, and you 30 give me something in return; that is what it is, mere shopkeeping.

31 A certain great king went to hunt in a forest, and there he 32 happened to meet a sage. He had a little conversation with him and 33 became so pleased with him that he asked him to accept a present 34 from him. "No," said the sage, "I am perfectly satisfied with my 35 condition; these trees give me enough fruit to eat; these beautiful 36 pure streams supply me with all the water I want; I sleep in these 37 caves. What do I care for your presents, though you be an 38 emperor?" The emperor said, "Just to purify me, to gratify me, come 39 with me into the city and take some present." At last the sage 40 consented to go with the emperor, and he was taken into the 41 emperor's palace, where there were gold, jewellery, marble, and 42 the most wonderful things. Wealth and power were manifest 43 everywhere. The emperor asked the sage to wait a minute, while he 44 repeated his prayer, and he went into a corner and began to pray, 45 "Lord, give me more wealth, more children, more territory." In the 46 meanwhile, the sage got up and began to walk away. The emperor 47 saw him going and went after him. "Stay, Sir, you did not take my 48 present and are going away." The sage turned to him and said, 49 "Beggar, I do not beg of beggars. What can you give? You have been 50 begging yourself all the time." That is not the language of love.
51 What is the difference between love and shopkeeping, if you ask 52 God to give you this, and give you that? The first test of love is that

1 it knows no bargaining. Love is always the giver, and never the 2 taker. Says the child of God, "If God wants, I give Him my 3 everything, but I do not want anything of Him. I want nothing in 4 this universe. I love Him, because I want to love Him, and I ask no
5 favour in return. Who cares whether God is almighty or not? I do 6 not want any power from Him nor any manifestation of His power.
7 Sufficient for me that He is the God of love. I ask no more
8 question."

9 The second test is that love knows no fear. So long as man 10 thinks of God as a Being sitting above the clouds, with rewards in 11 one hand and punishments in the other, there can be no love. Can 12 you frighten one into love? Does the lamb love the lion? The mouse, 13 the cat? The slave, the master? Slaves sometimes simulate love, but 14 is it love? Where do you ever see love in fear? It is always a sham.
15 With love never comes the idea of fear. Think of a young mother in 16 the street: if a dog barks at her, she flees in to the nearest house.
17 The next day she is in the street with her child, and suppose a lion 18 rushes upon the child, where will be her position? Just at the mouth 19 of the lion, protecting her child. Love conquered all her fear. So also 20 in the love of God. Who cares whether God is a rewarder or a 21 punisher? That is not the thought of a lover. Think of a judge when 22 he comes home, what does his wife see in him? Not a judge, or a 23 rewarder or punisher, but her husband, her love. What do his 24 children see in him? Their loving father, not the punisher or 25 rewarder. So the children of God never see in Him a punisher or a 26 rewarder. It is only people who have never tasted of love that fear 27 and quake. Cast off all fear--though these horrible ideas of God as a 28 punisher or rewarder may have their use in savage minds. Some 29 men, even the most intellectual, are spiritual savages, and these 30 ideas may help them. But to men who are spiritual, men who are 31 approaching religion, in whom spiritual insight is awakened, such 32 ideas are simply childish, simply foolish. Such men reject all ideas 33 of fear.

34 The third is a still higher test. Love is always the highest 35 ideal. When one has passed through the first two stages, when one 36 has thrown off all shopkeeping, and casts off all fear, one then 37 begins to realise that love is always the highest ideal. How many 38 times in this world we see a beautiful woman loving an ugly man?
39 How many times we see a handsome man loving an ugly woman!
40 What is the attraction? Lookers-on only see the ugly man or the 41 ugly woman, but not so the lover; to the lover the beloved is the 42 most beautiful being that ever existed. How is it? The woman who 43 loves the ugly man takes, as it were, the ideal of beauty which is in 44 her own mind, and projects it on the ugly man; and what she 45 worships and loves is not the ugly man, but her own ideal. That man 46 is, as it were, only the suggestion, and upon that suggestion she 47 throws her own ideal, and covers it; and it becomes her object of 48 worship. Now, this applies in every case where we love. Many of us 49 have very ordinary looking brothers or sisters; yet the very idea of 50 their being brothers or sisters makes them beautiful to us.

51 The philosophy in the background is that each one projects 52 his own ideal and worships that. This external world is only the 1 world of suggestion. All that we see, we project out of our own 2 minds. A grain of sand gets washed into the shell of an oyster and 3 irritates it. The irritation produces a secretion in the oyster, which 4 covers the grain of sand and the beautiful pearl is the result.

5 Similarly, external things furnish us with suggestions, over which 6 we project our own ideals and make our objects. The wicked see 7 this world as a perfect hell, and the good as a perfect heaven.
8 Lovers see this world as full of love, and haters as full of hatred; 9 fighters see nothing but strife, and the peaceful nothing but peace.
10 The perfect man sees nothing but God. So we always worship our 11 highest ideal, and when we have reached the point, when we love 12 the ideal as the ideal, all arguments and doubts vanish for ever.
13 Who cares whether God can be demonstrated or not? The ideal can 14 never go, because it is a part of my own nature. I shall only 15 question the ideal when I question my own existence, and as I 16 cannot question the one, I cannot question the other. Who cares 17 whether God can be almighty and all-merciful at the same time or 18 not? Who cares whether He is the rewarder of mankind, whether 19 He looks at us with the eyes of a tyrant or with the eyes of a 20 beneficent monarch?

21 The lover has passed beyond all these things, beyond rewards 22 and punishments, beyond fears and doubts, beyond scientific or any 23 other demonstration. Sufficient unto him is the ideal of love, and is 24 it not self-evident that this universe is but a manifestation of this 25 love? What is it that makes the atoms unite with atoms, molecules 26 with molecules, and causes planets to fly towards each other? What 27 is it that attracts man to man, man to woman, woman to man, and 28 animals to animals, drawing the whole universe, as it were, towards 29 one centre? It is what is called love. Its manifestation is from the 30 lowest atom to the highest being: omnipotent, all-pervading, is this 31 love. What manifests itself as attraction in the sentient and the 32 insentient, in the particular and in the universal, is the love of God.
33 It is the one motive power that is in the universe. Under the 34 impetus of that love, Christ gives his life for humanity, Buddha even 35 for an animal, the mother for the child, the husband for the wife. It 36 is under the impetus of the same love that men are ready to give up 37 their lives for their country, and strange to say, under the impetus 38 of the same love, the thief steals, the murderer murders. Even in 39 these cases, the spirit is the same, but the manifestation is 40 different. This is the one motive power in the universe. The thief 41 has love for gold; the love is there, but it is misdirected. So, in all 42 crimes, as well as in all virtuous actions, behind stands that eternal 43 love. Suppose a man writes a cheque for a thousand dollars for the 44 poor of New York, and at the same time, in the same room, another 45 man forges the name of a friend. The light by which both of them 46 write is the same, but each one will be responsible for the use he 47 makes of it. It is not the light that is to be praised or blamed.
48 Unattached, yet shining in everything, is love, the motive power of 49 the universe, without which the universe would fall to pieces in a 50 moment, and this love is God.

51 "None, O beloved, loves the husband for the husband's sake, 52 but for the Self that is in the husband; none, O beloved, ever loves

1 the wife for the wife's sake, but for the Self that is in the wife. None
2 ever loves anything else, except for the Self." Even this selfishness, 3 which is so much condemned, is but a manifestation of the same 4 love. Stand aside from this play, do not mix in it, but see this 5 wonderful panorama, this grand drama, played scene after scene, 6 and hear this wonderful harmony; all are the manifestation of the 7 same love. Even in selfishness, that self will multiply, grow and 8 grow. That one self, the one man, will become two selves when he 9 gets married; several, when he gets children; and thus he grows 10 until he feels the whole world as his Self, the whole universe as his 11 Self. He expands into one mass of universal love, infinite love--the 12 love that is God.

13 Thus we come to what is called supreme Bhakti, supreme 14 devotion, in which forms and symbols fall off. One who has reached 15 that cannot belong to any sect, for all sects are in him. To what shall 16 he belong? For all churches and temples are in him. Where is the 17 church big enough for him? Such a man cannot bind himself down 18 to certain limited forms. Where is the limit for unlimited love, with 19 which he has become one? In all religions which take up this ideal 20 of love, we find the struggle to express it. Although we understand 21 what this love means and see that everything in this world of 22 affections and attractions is a manifestation of that Infinite Love, 23 the expression of which has been attempted by sages and saints of 24 different nations, yet we find them using all the powers of language, 25 transfiguring even the most carnal expression into the divine.

26 Thus sang the royal Hebrew sage, thus sang they of India. "O 27 beloved, one kiss of Thy lips! Kissed by Thee, one's thirst for Thee 28 increaseth for ever! All sorrows cease, one forgets the past, 29 present, and future, and only thinks of Thee alone." That is the 30 madness of the lover, when all desires have vanished. "Who cares 31 for salvation? Who cares to be saved? Who cares to be perfect 32 even? Who cares for freedom?"--says the lover. "I do not want 33 wealth, nor even health; I do not want beauty, I do not want 34 intellect: let me be born again and again, amid all the evils that are 35 in the world; I will not complain, but let me love Thee, and that for 36 love's sake."

37 That is the madness of love which finds expression in these 38 songs. The highest, most expressive, strongest, and most attractive 39 human love is that between man and woman, and, therefore, that 40 language was used in expressing the deepest devotion. The 41 madness of this human love was the faintest echo of the mad love of 42 the saints. The true lovers of God want to become mad, inebriated 43 with the love of God, to become "God-intoxicated men." They want 44 to drink of the cup of love which has been prepared by the saints 45 and sages of every religion, who have poured their heart's blood 46 into it, and in which have been concentrated all the hopes of those 47 who have loved God without seeking reward, who wanted love for 48 itself only. The reward of love is love, and what a reward it is! It is 49 the only thing that takes off all sorrows, the only cup, by the 50 drinking of which this disease of the world vanishes. Man becomes 51 divinely mad and forgets that he is man.

52 Lastly, we find that all these various systems, in the end,

1 converge to that one point, that perfect union. We always begin as 2 dualists. God is a separate Being, and I am a separate being. Love
3 comes between, and man begins to approach God, and God, as it 4 were, begins to approach man. Man takes up all the various 5 relationships of life, as father, mother, friend, or lover; and the last 6 point is reached when he becomes one with the object of worship.
7 "I am you, and you are I; and worshipping you, I worship myself; 8 and in worshipping myself, I worship you." There we find the 9 highest culmination of that with which man begins. At the 10 beginning it was love for the self, but the claims of the little self 11 made love selfish; at the end came the full blaze of light, when that 12 self had become the Infinite. That God who at first was a Being 13 somewhere, became resolved, as it were, into Infinite Love. Man 14 himself was also transformed. He was approaching God, he was 15 throwing off the vain desires, of which he was full before. With 16 desires vanished selfishness, and, at the apex, he found that Love, 17 Lover, and Beloved were One.

THE NECESSITY OF RELIGION

(Delivered in London)

Of all the forces that have worked and are still working to mould the destinies of the human race, none, certainly, is more potent than that, the manifestation of which we call religion. All social organisations have as a background, somewhere, the workings of that peculiar force, and the greatest cohesive impulse ever brought into play amongst human units has been derived from this power. It is obvious to all of us that in very many cases the bonds religion have proved stronger than the bonds of race, or climate, or even of descent. It is a well-known fact that persons worshipping the same God, believing in the same religion, have stood by each other, with much greater strength and constancy, than people of merely the same descent, or even brothers. Various attempts have been made to trace the beginnings of religion. In all the ancient religions which have come down to us at the present day, we find one claim made--that they are all supernatural, that their genesis is not, as it were, in the human brain, but that they have originated somewhere outside of it.

Two theories have gained some acceptance amongst modern scholars. One is the spirit theory of religion, the other the evolution of the idea of the Infinite. One party maintains that ancestor worship is the beginning of religious ideas; the other, that religion originates in the personification of the power of nature. Man wants to keep up the memory of his dead relatives and thinks they are living even when the body is dissolved, and he wants to place food for them and, in a certain sense, to worship them. Out of that came the growth we call religion.

Studying the ancient religions of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Chinese, and many other races in America and elsewhere, we find very clear traces of this ancestor worship being the beginning of religion. With the ancient Egyptians, the first idea of the soul was that of a double. Every human body contained in it another being very similar to it; and when a man died, this double went out of the body and yet lived on. But the life of the double lasted only so long as the dead body remained intact, and that is why we find among the Egyptians so much solicitude to keep the body uninjured. And that is why they built those huge pyramids in which they preserved the bodies. For, if any portion of the external body was hurt, the double would be correspondingly injured. This is clearly ancestor worship. With the ancient Babylonians we find the same idea of the double, but with a variation. The double lost all sense of love; it frightened the living to give it food and drink, and to help it in various ways. It even lost all affection for its own children and its own wife. Among the ancient Hindus also, we find traces of this ancestor worship. Among the Chinese, the basis of their religion may also be said to be ancestor worship, and it still permeates the length and breadth of that vast country. In fact, the only religion that can really be said to flourish in China is that of ancestor worship. Thus it seems, on the one hand, a very good position is 1 made out for those who hold the theory of ancestor worship as the 2 beginning of religion.

3 On the other hand, there are scholars who from the ancient 4 Aryan literature show that religion originated in nature worship.
5 Although in India we find proofs of ancestor worship everywhere, 6 yet in the oldest records there is no trace of it whatsoever. In the 7 Rig-Veda Samhita, the most ancient record of the Aryan race, we do 8 not find any trace of it. Modern scholars think, it is the worship of 9 nature that they find there. The human mind seems to struggle to 10 get a peep behind the scenes. The dawn, the evening, the 11 hurricane, the stupendous and gigantic forces of nature, its 12 beauties, these have exercised the human mind, and it aspires to go 13 beyond, to understand something about them. In the struggle they 14 endow these phenomena with personal attributes, giving them souls 15 and bodies, sometimes beautiful, sometimes transcendent. Every 16 attempt ends by these phenomena becoming abstractions whether 17 personalised or not. So also it is found with the ancient Greeks; 18 their whole mythology is simply this abstracted nature worship. So 19 also with the ancient Germans, the Scandinavians, and all the other 20 Aryan races. Thus, on this side, too, a very strong case has been 21 made out, that religion has its origin in the personification of the 22 forces of nature.

23 These two views, though they seem to be contradictory, can 24 be reconciled on a third basis, which, to my mind, is the real germ 25 of religion, and that I propose to call the struggle to transcend the 26 limitations of the senses. Either, man goes to seek for the spirits of 27 his ancestors, the spirits of the dead, that is, he wants to get a 28 glimpse of what there is after the body is dissolved, or, he desires to 29 understand the power working behind the stupendous phenomena 30 of nature. Whichever of these is the case, one thing is certain, that 31 he tries to transcend the limitations of the senses. He cannot 32 remain satisfied with his senses; he wants to go beyond them. The 33 explanation need not be mysterious. To me it seems very natural 34 that the glimpse of religion should come through dreams. The first 35 idea of immortality man may well get through dreams. Is that not a 36 most wonderful state? And we know that children and untutored 37 minds find very little difference between dreaming and their 38 awakened state. What can be more natural than that they find, as 39 natural logic, that even during the sleep state when the body is 40 apparently dead, the mind goes on with all its intricate workings?
41 What wonder that men will at once come to the conclusion that 42 when this body is dissolved for ever, the same working will go on?
43 This, to my mind, would be a more natural explanation of the 44 supernatural, and through this dream idea the human mind rises to 45 higher and higher conceptions. Of course, in time, the vast majority 46 of mankind found out that these dreams are not verified by their 47 waking states, and that during the dream state it is not that man 48 has a fresh existence, but simply that he recapitulates the 49 experiences of the awakened state.

50 But by this time the search had begun, and the search was 51 inward, and man continued inquiring more deeply into the different 52 stages of the mind and discovered higher states than either the 1 waking or the dreaming. This state of things we find in all the 2 organised religions of the world, called either ecstasy or 3 inspiration. In all organised religions, their founders, prophets, and 4 messengers are declared to have gone into states of mind that were 5 neither waking nor sleeping, in which they came face to face with a 6 new series of facts relating to what is called the spiritual kingdom.

7 They realised things there much more intensely than we realise 8 facts around us in our waking state. Take, for instance, the religions 9 of the Brahmins. The Vedas are said to be written by Rishis. These 10 Rishis were sages who realised certain facts. The exact definition of 11 the Sanskrit word Rishi is a Seer of Mantras--of the thoughts 12 conveyed in the Vedic hymns. These men declared that they had 13 realised--sensed, if that word can be used with regard to the 14 supersensuous--certain facts, and these facts they proceeded to put 15 on record. We find the same truth declared amongst both the Jews 16 and the Christians.

17 Some exceptions may be taken in the case of the Buddhists as 18 represented by the Southern sect. It may be asked--if the Buddhists 19 do not believe in any God or soul, how can their religion be derived 20 from the supersensuous state of existence? The answer to this is 21 that even the Buddhists find an eternal moral law, and that moral 22 law was not reasoned out in our sense of the word. But Buddha 23 found it, discovered it, in a supersensuous state. Those of you who 24 have studied the life of Buddha, even as briefly given in that 25 beautiful poem, The Light of Asia, may remember that Buddha is 26 represented as sitting under the Bo-tree until he reached that 27 supersensuous state of mind. All his teachings came through this, 28 and not through intellectual cogitations.

29 Thus, a tremendous statement is made by all religions; that 30 the human mind, at certain moments, transcends not only the 31 limitations of the senses, but also the power of reasoning. It then 32 comes face to face with facts which it could never have sensed, 33 could never have reasoned out. These facts are the basis of all the 34 religions of the world. Of course we have the right to challenge 35 these facts, to put them to the test of reason. Nevertheless, all the 36 existing religions of the world claim for the human mind this 37 peculiar power of transcending the limits of the senses and the 38 limits of reason; and this power they put forward as a statement of 39 fact.

40 Apart from the consideration of the question how far these 41 facts claimed by religions are true, we find one characteristic 42 common to them all. They are all abstractions as contrasted with 43 the concrete discoveries of physics, for instance; and in all the 44 highly organised religions they take the purest form of Unit 45 Abstraction, either in the form of an Abstracted Presence, as an 46 Omnipresent Being, as an Abstract Personality called God, as a 47 Moral Law, or in the form of an Abstract Essence underlying every 48 existence. In modern times, too, the attempts made to preach 49 religions without appealing to the supersensuous state of mind have 50 had to take up the old abstractions of the Ancients and give 51 different names to them as "Moral Law", the "Ideal Unity", and so 52 forth, thus showing that these abstractions are not in the senses.

1 None of us have yet seen an "Ideal Human Being", and yet we are 2 told to believe in it. None of us have yet seen an ideally perfect
3 man, and yet without that ideal we cannot progress. Thus, this one 4 fact stands out from all these different religions, that there is an 5 Ideal Unit Abstraction, which is put before us, either in the form of 6 a Person or an Impersonal Being, or a Law, or a Presence, or an 7 Essence. We are always struggling to raise ourselves up to that 8 ideal. Every human being, whosoever and wheresoever he may be, 9 has an ideal of infinite power. Every human being has an ideal of 10 infinite pleasure. Most of the works that we find around us, the 11 activities displayed everywhere, are due to the struggle for this 12 infinite power or this infinite pleasure. But a few quickly discover 13 that although they are struggling for infinite power, it is not through 14 the senses that it can be reached. They find out very soon that that 15 infinite pleasure is not to be got through the senses, or, in other 16 words, the senses are too limited, and the body is too limited, to 17 express the Infinite. To manifest the Infinite through the finite is 18 impossible, and sooner or later, man learns to give up the attempt 19 to express the Infinite through the finite. This giving up, this 20 renunciation of the attempt, is the background of ethics.
21 Renunciation is the very basis upon which ethics stands. There 22 never was an ethical code preached which had not renunciation for 23 its basis.

24 Ethics always says, "Not I, but thou." Its motto is, "Not self, 25 but non-self." The vain ideas of individualism, to which man clings 26 when he is trying to find that Infinite Power or that Infinite Pleasure 27 through the senses, have to be given up--say the laws of ethics. You 28 have to put yourself last, and others before you. The senses say, 29 "Myself first." Ethics says, "I must hold myself last." Thus, all codes 30 of ethics are based upon this renunciation; destruction, not 31 construction, of the individual on the material plane. That Infinite 32 will never find expression upon the material plane, nor is it possible 33 or thinkable.

34 So, man has to give up the plane of matter and rise to other 35 spheres to seek a deeper expression of that Infinite. In this way the 36 various ethical laws are being moulded, but all have that one 37 central idea, eternal self-abnegation. Perfect self-annihilation is the 38 ideal of ethics. People are startled if they are asked not to think of 39 their individualities. They seem so very much afraid of losing what 40 they call their individuality. At the same time, the same men would 41 declare the highest ideals of ethics to be right, never for a moment 42 thinking that the scope, the goal, the idea of all ethics is the 43 destruction, and not the building up, of the individual.

44 Utilitarian standards cannot explain the ethical relations of 45 men, for, in the first place, we cannot derive any ethical laws from 46 considerations of utility. Without the supernatural sanction as it is 47 called, or the perception of the superconscious as I prefer to term 48 it, there can be no ethics. Without the struggle towards the Infinite 49 there can be no ideal. Any system that wants to bind men down to 50 the limits of their own societies is not able to find an explanation for 51 the ethical laws of mankind. The Utilitarian wants us to give up the 52 struggle after the Infinite, the reaching-out for the Super-sensuous,

1 as impracticable and absurd, and, in the same breath, asks us to 2 take up ethics and do good to society. Why should we do good?
3 Doing good is a secondary consideration. We must have an idea.
4 Ethics itself is not the end, but the means to the end. If the end is 5 not there, why should we be ethical? Why should I do good to other 6 men, and not injure them? If happiness is the goal of mankind, why 7 should I not make myself happy and others unhappy? What 8 prevents me? In the second place, the basis of utility is too narrow.
9 All the current social forms and methods are derived from society 10 as it exists, but what right has the Utilitarian to assume that society 11 is eternal? Society did not exist ages ago, possibly will not exist 12 ages hence. Most probably it is one of the passing stages through 13 which we are going towards a higher evolution, and any law that is 14 derived from society alone cannot be eternal, cannot cover the 15 whole ground of man's nature. At best, therefore, Utilitarian 16 theories can only work under present social conditions. Beyond that 17 they have no value. But a morality, an ethical code, derived from 18 religion and spirituality, has the whole of infinite man for its scope.
19 It takes up the individual, but its relations are to the Infinite, and it 20 takes up society also--because society is nothing but numbers of 21 these individuals grouped together; and as it applies to the 22 individual and his eternal relations, it must necessarily apply to the 23 whole of society, in whatever condition it may be at any given time.
24 Thus we see that there is always the necessity of spiritual religion 25 for mankind. Man cannot always think of matter, however 26 pleasurable it may be.

27 It has been said that too much attention to things spiritual 28 disturbs our practical relations in this world. As far back as in the 29 days of the Chinese sage Confucius, it was said, "Let us take care of 30 this world: and then, when we have finished with this world, we will 31 take care of other world." It is very well that we should take care of 32 this world. But if too much attention to the spiritual may affect a 33 little our practical relations, too much attention to the so-called 34 practical hurts us here and hereafter. It makes us materialistic. For 35 man is not to regard nature as his goal, but something higher.

36 Man is man so long as he is struggling to rise above nature,
37 and this nature is both internal and external. Not only does it 38 comprise the laws that govern the particles of matter outside us 39 and in our bodies, but also the more subtle nature within, which is, 40 in fact, the motive power governing the external. It is good and very 41 grand to conquer external nature, but grander still to conquer our 42 internal nature. It is grand and good to know the laws that govern 43 the stars and planets; it is infinitely grander and better to know the 44 laws that govern the passions, the feelings, the will, of mankind.
45 This conquering of the inner man, understanding the secrets of the 46 subtle workings that are within the human mind, and knowing its 47 wonderful secrets, belong entirely to religion. Human nature--the 48 ordinary human nature, I mean--wants to see big material facts. The 49 ordinary man cannot understand anything that is subtle. Well has it 50 been said that the masses admire the lion that kills a thousand 51 lambs, never for a moment thinking that it is death to the lambs, 52 although a momentary triumph for the lion; because they find

1 pleasure only in manifestations of physical strength. Thus it is with 2 the ordinary run of mankind. They understand and find pleasure in 3 everything that is external. But in every society there is a section 4 whose pleasures are not in the senses, but beyond, and who now 5 and then catch glimpses of something higher than matter and 6 struggle to reach it. And if we read the history of nations between 7 the lines, we shall always find that the rise of a nation comes with 8 an increase in the number of such men; and the fall begins when 9 this pursuit after the Infinite, however vain Utilitarians may call it, 10 has ceased. That is to say, the mainspring of the strength of every 11 race lies in its spirituality, and the death of that race begins the day 12 that spirituality wanes and materialism gains ground.

13 Thus, apart from the solid facts and truths that we may learn 14 from religion, apart from the comforts that we may gain from it, 15 religion, as a science, as a study, is the greatest and healthiest 16 exercise that the human mind can have. This pursuit of the Infinite, 17 this struggle to grasp the Infinite, this effort to get beyond the 18 limitations of the senses--out of matter, as it were--and to evolve the 19 spiritual man--this striving day and night to make the Infinite one 20 with our being--this struggle itself is the grandest and most glorious 21 that man can make. Some persons find the greatest pleasure in 22 eating. We have no right to say that they should not. Others find the 23 greatest pleasure in possessing certain things. We have no right to 24 say that they should not. But they also have no right to say "no" to 25 the man who finds his highest pleasure in spiritual thought. The 26 lower the organisation, the greater the pleasure in the senses. Very 27 few men can eat a meal with the same gusto as a dog or a wolf. But 28 all the pleasures of the dog or the wolf have gone, as it were into 29 the senses. The lower types of humanity in all nations find pleasure 30 in the senses, while the cultured and the educated find it in 31 thought, in philosophy, in arts and sciences. Spirituality is a still 32 higher plane. The subject being infinite, that plane is the highest, 33 and the pleasure there is the highest for those who can appreciate 34 it. So, even on the utilitarian ground that man is to seek for 35 pleasure, he should cultivate religious thought, for it is the highest 36 pleasure that exists. Thus religion, as a study, seems to me to be 37 absolutely necessary.

38 We can see it in its effects. It is the greatest motive power 39 that moves the human mind. No other ideal can put into us the 40 same mass of energy as the spiritual. So far as human history goes, 41 it is obvious to all of us that this has been the case and that its 42 powers are not dead. I do not deny that men, on simply utilitarian 43 grounds, can be very good and moral. There have been many great 44 men in this world perfectly sound, moral, and good, simply on 45 utilitarian grounds. But the world-movers, men who bring, as it 46 were, a mass of magnetism into the world, whose spirit works in 47 hundreds and in thousands, whose life ignites others with a 48 spiritual fire--such men, we always find, have that spiritual 49 background. Their motive power came from religion. Religion is the 50 greatest motive power for realising that infinite energy which is the 51 birthright and nature of every man. In building up character, in 52 making for everything that is good and great, in bringing peace to 1 others and peace to one's own self, religion is the highest motive 2 power and, therefore, ought to be studied from that standpoint.

3 Religion must be studied on a broader basis than formerly. All 4 narrow, limited, fighting ideas of religion have to go. All sect ideas
5 and tribal or national ideas of religion must be given up. That each 6 tribe or nation should have its own particular God and think that 7 every other is wrong is a superstition that should belong to the 8 past. All such ideas must be abandoned.

9 As the human mind broadens, its spiritual steps broaden too.
10 The time has already come when a man cannot record a thought 11 without its reaching to all corners of the earth; by merely physical 12 means, we have come into touch with the whole world; so the 13 future religions of the world have to become as universal, as wide.

14 The religious ideals of the future must embrace all that exists 15 in the world and is good and great, and, at the same time, have 16 infinite scope for future development. All that was good in the past 17 must be preserved; and the doors must be kept open for future 18 additions to the already existing store. Religions must also be 19 inclusive, and not look down with contempt upon one another, 20 because their particular ideals of God are different. In my life I have 21 seen a great many spiritual men, a great many sensible persons, 22 who did not believe in God at all, that is to say, not in our sense of 23 the word. Perhaps they understood God better than we can ever do.
24 The Personal idea of God or the Impersonal, the Infinite, Moral 25 Law, or the Ideal Man-these all have to come under the definition 26 of religion. And when religions have become thus broadened, their 27 power for good will have increased a hundredfold. Religions, having 28 tremendous power in them, have often done more injury to the 29 world than good, simply on account of their narrowness and 30 limitations.

31 Even at the present time we find many sects and societies, 32 with almost the same ideas, fighting each other, because one does 33 not want to set forth those ideas in precisely the same way as 34 another. Therefore, religions will have to broaden. Religious ideas 35 will have to become universal, vast, and infinite; and then alone we 36 shall have the fullest play of religion, for the power of religion has 37 only just begun to manifest in the world. It is sometimes said that 38 religions are dying out, that spiritual ideas are dying out of the 39 world. To me it seems that they have just begun to grow. The power 40 of religion, broadened and purified, is going to penetrate every part 41 of human life. So long as religion was in the hands of a chosen few 42 or of a body of priests, it was in temples, churches, books, dogmas, 43 ceremonials, forms, and rituals. But when we come to the real, 44 spiritual, universal concept, then, and then alone, religion will 45 become real and living; it will come into our very nature, live in our 46 every movement, penetrate every pore of our society, and be 47 infinitely more a power for good than it has ever been before.

48 What is needed is a fellow-feeling between the different types 49 of religion, seeing that they all stand or fall together, a fellow-50 feeling which springs from mutual esteem and mutual respect, and 51 not the condescending, patronising, niggardly expression of 52 goodwill, unfortunately in vogue at the present time with many. And 1 above all, this is needed between types of religious expression 2 coming from the study of mental phenomena--unfortunately, even 3 now laying exclusive claim to the name of religion--and those 4 expressions of religion whose heads, as it were, are penetrating 5 more into the secrets of heaven though their feet are clinging to the 6 earth, I mean, the so-called materialistic sciences.

7 To bring about this harmony, both will have to make 8 concessions, sometimes very large, nay more, sometimes painful, 9 but each will find itself the better for the sacrifice and more 10 advanced in truth. And in the end, the knowledge which is confined 11 within the domain of time and space will meet and become one with 12 that which is beyond them both, where the mind and senses cannot 13 reach--the Absolute, the Infinite, the One without a second.

THE REAL NATURE OF MAN

(Delivered in London)

Great is the tenacity with which man clings to the senses. Yet, however substantial he may think the external world in which he lives and moves, there comes a time in the lives of individuals and of races when, involuntarily, they ask, "Is this real?" To the person who never finds a moment to question the credentials of his senses, whose every moment is occupied with some sort of sense-enjoyment—even to him death comes, and he also is compelled to ask, "Is this real?" Religion begins with this question and ends with its answer. Even in the remote past, where recorded history cannot help us, in the mysterious light of mythology, back in the dim twilight of civilisation, we find the same question was asked, "What becomes of this? What is real?"

One of the most poetical of the Upanishads, the Katha Upanishad, begins with the inquiry: "When a man dies, there is a dispute. One party declares that he has gone for ever, the other insists that he is still living. Which is true?" Various answers have been given. The whole sphere of metaphysics, philosophy, and religion is really filled with various answers to this question. At the same time, attempts have been made to suppress it, to put a stop to the unrest of mind which asks, "What is beyond? What is real?" But so long as death remains, all these attempts at suppression will always prove to be unsuccessful. We may talk about seeing nothing beyond and keeping all our hopes and aspirations confined to the present moment, and struggle hard not to think of anything beyond the world of senses; and, perhaps, everything outside helps to keep us limited within its narrow bounds. The whole world may combine to prevent us from broadening out beyond the present. Yet, so long as there is death, the question must come again and again, "Is death the end of all these things to which we are clinging, as if they were the most real of all realities, the most substantial of all substances?" The world vanishes in a moment and is gone. Standing on the brink of a precipice beyond which is the infinite yawning chasm, every mind, however hardened, is bound to recoil and ask, "Is this real?" The hopes of a lifetime, built up little by little with all the energies of a great mind, vanish in a second. Are they real? This question must be answered. Time never lessens its power; on the other hand, it adds strength to it.

Then there is the desire to be happy. We run after everything to make ourselves happy; we pursue our mad career in the external world of senses. If you ask the young man with whom life is successful, he will declare that it is real; and he really thinks so. Perhaps, when the same man grows old and finds fortune ever eluding him, he will then declare that it is fate. He finds at last that his desires cannot be fulfilled. Wherever he goes, there is an adamant wall beyond which he cannot pass. Every sense-activity results in a reaction. Everything is evanescent. Enjoyment, misery, luxury, wealth, power, and poverty, even life itself, are all

1 evanescent.

2 Two positions remain to mankind. One is to believe with the 3 nihilists that all is nothing, that we know nothing, that we can never 4 know anything either about the future, the past, or even the 5 present. For we must remember that he who denies the past and 6 the future and wants to stick to the present is simply a madman.
7 One may as well deny the father and mother and assert the child. It 8 would be equally logical. To deny the past and future, the present 9 must inevitably be denied also. This is one position, that of the 10 nihilists. I have never seen a man who could really become a nihilist 11 for one minute. It is very easy to talk.

12 Then there is the other position--to seek for an explanation, to 13 seek for the real, to discover in the midst of this eternally changing 14 and evanescent world whatever is real. In this body which is an 15 aggregate of molecules of matter, is there anything which is real?
16 This has been the search throughout the history of the human mind.
17 In the very oldest times, we often find glimpses of light coming into 18 men's minds. We find man, even then, going a step beyond this 19 body, finding something which is not this external body, although 20 very much like it, much more complete, much more perfect, and 21 which remains even when this body is dissolved. We read in the 22 hymns of the Rig-Veda, addressed to the God of Fire who is burning 23 a dead body, "Carry him, O Fire, in your arms gently, give him a 24 perfect body, a bright body, carry him where the fathers live, where 25 there is no more sorrow, where there is no more death." The same 26 idea you will find present in every religion. And we get another idea 27 with it. It is a significant fact that all religions, without one 28 exception, hold that man is a degeneration of what he was, whether 29 they clothe this in mythological words, or in the clear language of 30 philosophy, or in the beautiful expressions of poetry. This is the one 31 fact that comes out of every scripture and of every mythology that 32 the man that is, is a degeneration of what he was. This is the kernel 33 of truth within the story of Adam's fall in the Jewish scripture. This 34 is again and again repeated in the scriptures of the Hindus; the 35 dream of a period which they call the Age of Truth, when no man 36 died unless he wished to die, when he could keep his body as long 37 as he liked, and his mind was pure and strong. There was no evil 38 and no misery; and the present age is a corruption of that state of 39 perfection. Side by side with this, we find the story of the deluge 40 everywhere. That story itself is a proof that this present age is held 41 to be a corruption of a former age by every religion. It went on 42 becoming more and more corrupt until the deluge swept away a 43 large portion of mankind, and again the ascending series began. It 44 is going up slowly again to reach once more the early state of 45 purity. You are all aware of the story of the deluge in the Old 46 Testament. The same story was current among the ancient 47 Babylonians, the Egyptians, the Chinese, and the Hindus. Manu, a 48 great ancient sage, was praying on the bank of the Ganga, when a 49 little minnow came to him for protection, and he put it into a pot of 50 water he had before him. "What do you want?" asked Manu. The 51 little minnow declared he was pursued by a bigger fish and wanted 52 protection. Manu carried the little fish to his home, and in the 1 morning he had become as big as the pot and said, "I cannot live in 2 this pot any longer". Manu put him in a tank, and the next day he 3 was as big as the tank and declared he could not live there any 4 more. So Manu had to take him to a river, and in the morning the 5 fish filled the river. Then Manu put him in the ocean, and he 6 declared, "Manu, I am the Creator of the universe. I have taken this 7 form to come and warn you that I will deluge the world. You build 8 an ark and in it put a pair of every kind of animal, and let your 9 family enter the ark, and there will project out of the water my 10 horn. Fasten the ark to it; and when the deluge subsides, come out 11 and people the earth." So the world was deluged, and Manu saved 12 his own family and two of every kind of animal and seeds of every 13 plant. When the deluge subsided, he came and peopled the world; 14 and we are called "man", because we are the progeny of Manu.

15 Now, human language is the attempt to express the truth that 16 is within. I am fully persuaded that a baby whose language consists 17 of unintelligible sounds is attempting to express the highest 18 philosophy, only the baby has not the organs to express it nor the 19 means. The difference between the language of the highest 20 philosophers and the utterances of babies is one of degree and not 21 of kind. What you call the most correct, systematic, mathematical 22 language of the present time, and the hazy, mystical, mythological 23 languages of the ancients, differ only in degree. All of them have a 24 grand idea behind, which is, as it were, struggling to express itself; 25 and often behind these ancient mythologies are nuggets of truth; 26 and often, I am sorry to say, behind the fine, polished phrases of the 27 moderns is arrant trash. So, we need not throw a thing overboard 28 because it is clothed in mythology, because it does not fit in with the 29 notions of Mr. So-and-so and Mrs. So-and-so of modern times. If 30 people should laugh at religion because most religions declare that 31 men must believe in mythologies taught by such and such a 32 prophet, they ought to laugh more at these moderns. In modern 33 times, if a man quotes a Moses or a Buddha or a Christ, he is 34 laughed at; but let him give the name of a Huxley, a Tyndall, or a 35 Darwin, and it is swallowed without salt. "Huxley has said it", that 36 is enough for many. We are free from superstitions indeed! That 37 was a religious superstition, and this is a scientific superstition; 38 only, in and through that superstition came life-giving ideas of 39 spirituality; in and through this modern superstition come lust and 40 greed. That superstition was worship of God, and this superstition 41 is worship of filthy lucre, of fame and power. That is the difference.

42 To return to mythology. Behind all these stories we find one 43 idea standing supreme--that man is a degeneration of what he was.
44 Coming to the present times, modern research seems to repudiate 45 this position absolutely. Evolutionists seem to contradict entirely 46 this assertion. According to them, man is the evolution of the 47 mollusc; and, therefore, what mythology states cannot be true.
48 There is in India, however, a mythology which is able to reconcile 49 both these positions. The Indian mythology has a theory of cycles, 50 that all progression is in the form of waves. Every wave is attended 51 by a fall, and that by a rise the next moment, that by a fall in the 52 next, and again another rise. The motion is in cycles. Certainly it is 1 true, even on the grounds of modern research, that man cannot be 2 simply an evolution. Every evolution presupposes an involution. The 3 modern scientific man will tell you that you can only get the amount 4 of energy out of a machine which you have previously put into it.

5 Something cannot be produced out of nothing. If a man is an 6 evolution of the mollusc, then the perfect man--the Buddha-man, 7 the Christ-man--was evolved in the mollusc. If it is not so, whence 8 come these gigantic personalities? Something cannot come out of 9 nothing. Thus we are in the position of reconciling the scriptures 10 with modern light. That energy which manifests itself slowly 11 through various stages until it becomes the perfect man, cannot 12 come out of nothing. It existed somewhere; and if the mollusc or the 13 protoplasm is the first point to which you can trace it, that 14 protoplasm, somehow or other, must have contained the energy.

15 There is a great discussion going on as to whether the 16 aggregate of materials we call the body is the cause of 17 manifestation of the force we call the soul, thought, etc., or whether 18 it is the thought that manifests this body. The religions of the world 19 of course hold that the force called thought manifests the body, and 20 not the reverse. There are schools of modern thought which hold 21 that what we call thought is simply the outcome of the adjustment 22 of the parts of the machine which we call body. Taking the second 23 position that the soul or the mass of thought, or however you may 24 call it, is the outcome of this machine, the outcome of the chemical 25 and physical combinations of matter making up the body and brain, 26 leaves the question unanswered. What makes the body? What force 27 combines the molecules into the body form? What force is there 28 which takes up material from the mass of matter around and forms 29 my body one way, another body another way, and so on? What 30 makes these infinite distinctions? To say that the force called soul is 31 the outcome of the combinations of the molecules of the body is 32 putting the cart before the horse. How did the combinations come; 33 where was the force to make them? If you say that some other force 34 was the cause of these combinations, and soul was the outcome of 35 that matter, and that soul--which combined a certain mass of 36 matter--was itself the result of the combinations, it is no answer.
37 That theory ought to be taken which explains most of the facts, if 38 not all, and that without contradicting other existing theories. It is 39 more logical to say that the force which takes up the matter and 40 forms the body is the same which manifests through that body. To 41 say, therefore, that the thought forces manifested by the body are 42 the outcome of the arrangement of molecules and have no 43 independent existence has no meaning; neither can force evolve out 44 of matter. Rather it is impossible to demonstrate that what we call 45 matter does not exist at all. It is only a certain state of force.
46 Solidity, hardness, or any other state of matter can be proved to be 47 the result of motion. Increase of vortex motion imparted to fluids 48 gives them the force of solids. A mass of air in vortex motion, as in a 49 tornado, becomes solid-like and by its impact breaks or cuts 50 through solids. A thread of a spider's web, if it could be moved at 51 almost infinite velocity, would be as strong as an iron chain and 52 would cut through an oak tree. Looking at it in this way, it would be 53 easier to prove that what we call matter does not exist. But the 1 other way cannot be proved.

2 What is the force which manifests itself through the body? It 3 is obvious to all of us, whatever that force be, that it is taking 4 particles up, as it were, and manipulating forms out of them--the 5 human body. None else comes here to manipulate bodies for you
6 and me. I never saw anybody eat food for me. I have to assimilate it, 7 manufacture blood and bones and everything out of that food. What 8 is this mysterious force? Ideas about the future and about the past 9 seem to be terrifying to many. To many they seem to be mere 10 speculation.

11 We will take the present theme. What is this force which is 12 now working through us? We know how in old times, in all the 13 ancient scriptures, this power, this manifestation of power, was 14 thought to be a bright substance having the form of this body, and 15 which remained even after this body fell. Later on, however, we find 16 a higher idea coming--that this bright body did not represent the 17 force. Whatsoever has form must be the result of combinations of 18 particles and requires something else behind it to move it. If this 19 body requires something which is not the body to manipulate it, the 20 bright body, by the same necessity, will also require something 21 other than itself to manipulate it. So, that something was called the 22 soul, the Atman in Sanskrit. It was the Atman which through the 23 bright body, as it were, worked on the gross body outside. The 24 bright body is considered as the receptacle of the mind, and the 25 Atman is beyond that. It is not the mind even; it works the mind, 26 and through the mind the body. You have an Atman, I have another, 27 each one of us has a separate Atman and a separate fine body, and 28 through that we work on the gross external body. Questions were 29 then asked about this Atman, about its nature. What is this Atman, 30 this soul of man, which is neither the body nor the mind? Great 31 discussions followed. Speculations were made, various shades of 32 philosophic inquiry came into existence; and I shall try to place 33 before you some of the conclusions that have been reached about 34 this Atman.

35 The different philosophies seem to agree that this Atman, 36 whatever it be, has neither form nor shape, and that which has 37 neither form nor shape must be omnipresent. Time begins with 38 mind, space also is in the mind. Causation cannot stand without 39 time. Without the idea of succession there cannot be any idea of 40 causation. Time, space and causation, therefore, are in the mind, 41 and as this Atman is beyond the mind and formless, it must be 42 beyond time, beyond space, and beyond causation. Now, if it is 43 beyond time, space, and causation, it must be infinite. Then comes 44 the highest speculation in our philosophy. The infinite cannot be 45 two. If the soul be infinite, there can be only one Soul, and all ideas 46 of various souls--you having one soul, and I having another and so 47 forth--are not real. The Real Man, therefore, is one and infinite, the 48 omnipresent Spirit. And the apparent man is only a limitation of 49 that Real Man. In that sense the mythologies are true that the 50 apparent man, however great he may be, is only a dim reflection of 51 the Real Man who is beyond. The Real Man, the Spirit, being 52 beyond cause and effect, not bound by time and space, must,

1 therefore, be free. He was never bound, and could not be bound.
2 The apparent man, the reflection, is limited by time, space, and 3 causation, and is, therefore, bound. Or in the language of some of 4 our philosophers, he appears to be bound, but really is not. This is 5 the reality in our souls, this omnipresence, this spiritual nature, this 6 infinity. Every soul is infinite, therefore there is no question of birth 7 and death. Some children were being examined. The examiner put 8 them rather hard questions, and among them was this one: "Why 9 does not the earth fall?" He wanted to evoke answers about 10 gravitation. Most of the children could not answer at all; a few 11 answered that it was gravitation or something. One bright little girl 12 answered it by putting another question: "Where should it fall?" The 13 question is nonsense. Where should the earth fall? There is no 14 falling or rising for the earth. In infinite space there is no up or 15 down; that is only in the relative. Where is the going or coming for 16 the infinite? Whence should it come and whither should it go?

17 Thus, when people cease to think of the past or future, when 18 they give up the idea of body, because the body comes and goes and 19 is limited, then they have risen to a higher ideal. The body is not the 20 Real Man, neither is the mind, for the mind waxes and wanes. It is 21 the Spirit beyond, which alone can live for ever. The body and mind 22 are continually changing, and are, in fact, only names of series of 23 changeful phenomena, like rivers whose waters are in a constant 24 state of flux, yet presenting the appearance of unbroken streams.
25 Every particle in this body is continually changing; no one has the 26 same body for many minutes together, and yet we think of it as the 27 same body. So with the mind; one moment it is happy, another 28 moment unhappy; one moment strong, another weak; an ever-29 changing whirlpool. That cannot be the Spirit which is infinite.
30 Change can only be in the limited. To say that the infinite changes 31 in any way is absurd; it cannot be. You can move and I can move, as 32 limited bodies; every particle in this universe is in a constant state 33 of flux, but taking the universe as a unit, as one whole, it cannot 34 move, it cannot change. Motion is always a relative thing. I move in 35 relation to something else. Any particle in this universe can change 36 in relation to any other particle; but take the whole universe as one, 37 and in relation to what can it move? There is nothing besides it. So 38 this infinite Unit is unchangeable, immovable, absolute, and this is 39 the Real Man. Our reality, therefore, consists in the Universal and 40 not in the limited. These are old delusions, however comfortable 41 they are, to think that we are little limited beings, constantly 42 changing. People are frightened when they are told that they are 43 Universal Being, everywhere present. Through everything you 44 work, through every foot you move, through every lip you talk, 45 through every heart you feel.

46 People are frightened when they are told this. They will again 47 and again ask you if they are not going to keep their individuality.
48 What is individuality? I should like to see it. A baby has no 49 moustache; when he grows to be a man, perhaps he has a 50 moustache and beard. His individuality would be lost, if it were in 51 the body. If I lose one eye, or if I lose one of my hands, my 52 individuality would be lost if it were in the body. Then, a drunkard

1 should not give up drinking because he would lose his individuality.
2 A thief should not be a good man because he would thereby lose his 3 individuality. No man ought to change his habits for fear of this.
4 There is no individuality except in the Infinite. That is the only 5 condition which does not change. Everything else is in a constant 6 state of flux. Neither can individuality be in memory. Suppose, on 7 account of a blow on the head I forget all about my past; then, I 8 have lost all individuality; I am gone. I do not remember two or 9 three years of my childhood, and if memory and existence are one, 10 then whatever I forget is gone. That part of my life which I do not 11 remember, I did not live. That is a very narrow idea of individuality.

12 We are not individuals yet. We are struggling towards 13 individuality, and that is the Infinite, that is the real nature of man.
14 He alone lives whose life is in the whole universe, and the more we 15 concentrate our lives on limited things, the faster we go towards 16 death. Those moments alone we live when our lives are in the 17 universe, in others; and living this little life is death, simply death, 18 and that is why the fear of death comes. The fear of death can only 19 be conquered when man realises that so long as there is one life in 20 this universe, he is living. When he can say, "I am in everything, in 21 everybody, I am in all lives, I am the universe," then alone comes 22 the state of fearlessness. To talk of immortality in constantly 23 changing things is absurd. Says an old Sanskrit philosopher: It is 24 only the Spirit that is the individual, because it is infinite. No 25 infinity can be divided; infinity cannot be broken into pieces. It is 26 the same one, undivided unit for ever, and this is the individual 27 man, the Real Man. The apparent man is merely a struggle to 28 express, to manifest this individuality which is beyond; and 29 evolution is not in the Spirit. These changes which are going on--the 30 wicked becoming good, the animal becoming man, take them in 31 whatever way you like--are not in the Spirit. They are the evolution 32 of nature and manifestation of Spirit. Suppose there is a screen 33 hiding you from me, in which there is a small hole through which I 34 can see some of the faces before me, just a few faces. Now suppose 35 the hole begins to grow larger and larger, and as it does so, more 36 and more of the scene before me reveals itself and when at last the 37 whole screen has disappeared, I stand face to face with you all. You 38 did not change at all in this case; it was the hole that was evolving, 39 and you were gradually manifesting yourselves. So it is with the 40 Spirit. No perfection is going to be attained. You are already free 41 and perfect. What are these ideas of religion and God and 42 searching for the hereafter? Why does man look for a God? Why 43 does man, in every nation, in every state of society, want a perfect 44 ideal somewhere, either in man, in God, or elsewhere? Because that 45 idea is within you. It was your own heart beating and you did not 46 know; you were mistaking it for something external. It is the God 47 within your own self that is propelling you to seek for Him, to 48 realise Him. After long searches here and there, in temples and in 49 churches, in earths and in heavens, at last you come back, 50 completing the circle from where you started, to your own soul and 51 find that He for whom you have been seeking all over the world, for 52 whom you have been weeping and praying in churches and 53 temples, on whom you were looking as the mystery of all mysteries

1 shrouded in the clouds, is nearest of the near, is your own Self, the 2 reality of your life, body, and soul. That is your own nature. Assert 3 it, manifest it. Not to become pure, you are pure already. You are 4 not to be perfect, you are that already. Nature is like that screen
5 which is hiding the reality beyond. Every good thought that you 6 think or act upon is simply tearing the veil, as it were; and the 7 purity, the Infinity, the God behind, manifests Itself more and more.

8 This is the whole history of man. Finer and finer becomes the 9 veil, more and more of the light behind shines forth, for it is its 10 nature to shine. It cannot be known; in vain we try to know it. Were 11 it knowable, it would not be what it is, for it is the eternal subject.
12 Knowledge is a limitation, knowledge is objectifying. He is the 13 eternal subject of everything, the eternal witness in this universe, 14 your own Self. Knowledge is, as it were, a lower step, a 15 degeneration. We are that eternal subject already; how can we 16 know it? It is the real nature of every man, and he is struggling to 17 express it in various ways; otherwise, why are there so many ethical 18 codes? Where is the explanation of all ethics? One idea stands out 19 as the centre of all ethical systems, expressed in various forms, 20 namely, doing good to others. The guiding motive of mankind should 21 be charity towards men, charity towards all animals. But these are 22 all various expressions of that eternal truth that, "I am the universe; 23 this universe is one." Or else, where is the reason? Why should I do 24 good to my fellowmen? Why should I do good to others? What 25 compels me? It is sympathy, the feeling of sameness everywhere.
26 The hardest hearts feel sympathy for beings sometimes. Even the 27 man who gets frightened if he is told that this assumed individuality 28 is really a delusion, that it is ignoble to try to cling to this apparent 29 individuality, that very man will tell you that extreme self-30 abnegation is the centre of all morality. And what is perfect self-31 abnegation? It means the abnegation of this apparent self, the 32 abnegation of all selfishness. This idea of "me and mine"--Ahamkâra 33 and Mamatâ--is the result of past superstition, and the more this 34 present self passes away, the more the real Self becomes manifest.
35 This is true self-abnegation, the centre, the basis, the gist of all 36 moral teaching; and whether man knows it or not, the whole world 37 is slowly going towards it, practising it more or less. Only, the vast 38 majority of mankind are doing it unconsciously. Let them do it 39 consciously. Let them make the sacrifice, knowing that this "me and 40 mine" is not the real Self, but only a limitation. But one glimpse of 41 that infinite reality which is behind--but one spark of that infinite 42 fire that is the All--represents the present man; the Infinite is his 43 true nature.

44 What is the utility, the effect, the result, of this knowledge? In 45 these days, we have to measure everything by utility--by how many 46 pounds, shillings, and pence it represents. What right has a person 47 to ask that truth should be judged by the standard of utility or 48 money? Suppose there is no utility, will it be less true? Utility is not 49 the test of truth. Nevertheless, there is the highest utility in this.
50 Happiness, we see, is what everyone is seeking for, but the majority 51 seek it in things which are evanescent and not real. No happiness 52 was ever found in the senses. There never was a person who found

1 happiness in the senses or in the enjoyment of the senses.
2 Happiness is only found in the Spirit. Therefore the highest utility 3 for mankind is to find this happiness in the Spirit. The next point is 4 that ignorance is the great mother of all misery, and the 5 fundamental ignorance is to think that the Infinite weeps and cries, 6 that He is finite. This is the basis of all ignorance that we, the 7 immortal, the ever pure, the perfect Spirit, think that we are little 8 minds, that we are little bodies; it is the mother of all selfishness.
9 As soon as I think that I am a little body, I want to preserve it, to 10 protect it, to keep it nice, at the expense of other bodies; then you 11 and I become separate. As soon as this idea of separation comes, it 12 opens the door to all mischief and leads to all misery. This is the 13 utility that if a very small fractional part of human beings living 14 today can put aside the idea of selfishness, narrowness, and 15 littleness, this earth will become a paradise tomorrow; but with 16 machines and improvements of material knowledge only, it will 17 never be. These only increase misery, as oil poured on fire increase 18 the flame all the more. Without the knowledge of the Spirit, all 19 material knowledge is only adding fuel to fire, only giving into the 20 hands of selfish man one more instrument to take what belongs to 21 others, to live upon the life of others, instead of giving up his life for 22 them.

23 Is it practical?--is another question. Can it be practised in 24 modern society? Truth does not pay homage to any society, ancient 25 or modern. Society has to pay homage to Truth or die. Societies 26 should be moulded upon truth, and truth has not to adjust itself to 27 society. If such a noble truth as unselfishness cannot be practised in 28 society, it is better for man to give up society and go into the forest.
29 That is the daring man. There are two sorts of courage. One is the 30 courage of facing the cannon. And the other is the courage of 31 spiritual conviction. An Emperor who invaded India was told by his 32 teacher to go and see some of the sages there. After a long search 33 for one, he found a very old man sitting on a block of stone. The 34 Emperor talked with him a little and became very impressed by his 35 wisdom. He asked the sage to go to his country with him. "No," said 36 the sage, "I am quite satisfied with my forest here." Said the 37 Emperor, "I will give you money, position, wealth. I am the Emperor 38 of the world." "No," replied the man. "I don't care for those things."
39 The Emperor replied, "If you do not go, I will kill you." The man 40 smiled serenely and said, "That is the most foolish thing you have 41 ever said, Emperor. You cannot kill me. Me the sun cannot dry, fire 42 cannot burn, sword cannot kill, for I am the birthless, the deathless, 43 the ever-living omnipotent, omnipresent Spirit." This is spiritual 44 boldness, while the other is the courage of a lion or a tiger. In the 45 Mutiny of 1857 there was a Swami, a very great soul, whom a 46 Mohammedan mutineer stabbed severely. The Hindu mutineers 47 caught and brought the man to the Swami, offering to kill him. But 48 the Swami looked up calmly and said, "My brother, thou art He, 49 thou art He!" and expired. This is another instance. What good is it 50 to talk of the strength of your muscles, of the superiority of your 51 Western institutions, if you cannot make Truth square with your 52 society, if you cannot build up a society into which the highest Truth 53 will fit? What is the good of this boastful talk about your grandeur

1 and greatness, if you stand up and say, "This courage is not 2 practical." Is nothing practical but pounds, shillings, and pence? If 3 so, why boast of your society? Truth does not pay homage to any 4 society, ancient or modern. Society has to pay homage to Truth or 5 die. Societies should be moulded upon truth, and truth has not to 6 adjust itself to society. That society is the greatest, where the 7 highest truths become practical. That is my opinion; and if society is 8 not fit for the highest truths, make it so; and the sooner, the better.
9 Stand up, men and women, in this spirit, dare to believe in the 10 Truth, dare to practise the Truth! The world requires a few hundred 11 bold men and women. Practise that boldness which dares know the 12 Truth, which dares show the Truth in life, which does not quake 13 before death, nay, welcomes death, makes a man know that he is 14 the Spirit, that, in the whole universe, nothing can kill him. Then 15 you will be free. Then you will know your real Soul. "This Atman is 16 first to be heard, then thought about and then meditated upon."

17 There is a great tendency in modern times to talk too much of 18 work and decry thought. Doing is very good, but that comes from 19 thinking. Little manifestations of energy through the muscles are 20 called work. But where there is no thought, there will be no work.
21 Fill the brain, therefore, with high thoughts, highest ideals, place 22 them day and night before you, and out of that will come great 23 work. Talk not about impurity, but say that we are pure. We have 24 hypnotised ourselves into this thought that we are little, that we are 25 born, and that we are going to die, and into a constant state of fear.

26 There is a story about a lioness, who was big with young, 27 going about in search of prey; and seeing a flock of sheep, she 28 jumped upon them. She died in the effort; and a little baby lion was 29 born, motherless. It was taken care of by the sheep and the sheep 30 brought it up, and it grew up with them, ate grass, and bleated like 31 the sheep. And although in time it became a big, full-grown lion, it 32 thought it was a sheep. One day another lion came in search of prey 33 and was astonished to find that in the midst of this flock of sheep 34 was a lion, fleeing like the sheep at the approach of danger. He 35 tried to get near the sheep-lion, to tell it that it was not a sheep but 36 a lion; but the poor animal fled at his approach. However, he 37 watched his opportunity and one day found the sheep-lion sleeping.
38 He approached it and said, "You are a lion." "I am a sheep," cried 39 the other lion and could not believe the contrary but bleated. The 40 lion dragged him towards a lake and said, "Look here, here is my 41 reflection and yours." Then came the comparison. It looked at the 42 lion and then at its own reflection, and in a moment came the idea 43 that it was a lion. The lion roared, the bleating was gone. You are 44 lions, you are souls, pure, infinite, and perfect. The might of the 45 universe is within you. "Why weepest thou, my friend? There is 46 neither birth nor death for thee. Why weepest thou? There is no 47 disease nor misery for thee, but thou art like the infinite sky; clouds 48 of various colours come over it, play for a moment, then vanish. But 49 the sky is ever the same eternal blue." Why do we see wickedness?
50 There was a stump of a tree, and in the dark, a thief came that way 51 and said, "That is a policeman." A young man waiting for his 52 beloved saw it and thought that it was his sweetheart. A child who 1 had been told ghost stories took it for a ghost and began to shriek.

2 But all the time it was the stump of a tree. We see the world as we 3 are. Suppose there is a baby in a room with a bag of gold on the 4 table and a thief comes and steals the gold. Would the baby know it
5 was stolen? That which we have inside, we see outside. The baby 6 has no thief inside and sees no thief outside. So with all knowledge.
7 Do not talk of the wickedness of the world and all its sins. Weep
8 that you are bound to see wickedness yet. Weep that you are bound 9 to see sin everywhere, and if you want to help the world, do not 10 condemn it. Do not weaken it more. For what is sin and what is 11 misery, and what are all these, but the results of weakness? The 12 world is made weaker and weaker every day by such teachings.
13 Men are taught from childhood that they are weak and sinners.
14 Teach them that they are all glorious children of immortality, even 15 those who are the weakest in manifestation. Let positive, strong, 16 helpful thought enter into their brains from very childhood. Lay 17 yourselves open to these thoughts, and not to weakening and 18 paralysing ones. Say to your own minds, "I am He. I am He." Let it 19 ring day and night in your minds like a song, and at the point of 20 death declare, "I am He." That is the Truth; the infinite strength of 21 the world is yours. Drive out the superstition that has covered your 22 minds. Let us be brave. Know the Truth and practise the Truth. The 23 goal may be distant, but awake, arise, and stop not till the goal is 24 reached.

MAYA AND ILLUSION

(Delivered in London)

Almost all of you have heard of the word Maya. Generally it is used, though incorrectly, to denote illusion, or delusion, or some such thing. But the theory of Maya forms one of the pillars upon which the Vedanta rests; it is, therefore, necessary that it should be properly understood. I ask a little patience of you, for there is a great danger of its being misunderstood. The oldest idea of Maya that we find in the Vedic literature is the sense of delusion; but then the real theory had not been reached. We find such passages as, "Indra through his Maya assumed various forms." Here it is true the word Maya means something like magic, and we find various other passages, always taking the same meaning. The word Maya then dropped out of sight altogether. But in the meantime the idea was developing. Later, the question was raised: "Why can't we know this secret of the universe?" And the answer given was very significant: "Because we talk in vain, and because we are satisfied with the things of the senses, and because we are running after desires; therefore, we, as it were, cover the Reality with a mist." Here the word Maya is not used at all, but we get the idea that the cause of our ignorance is a kind of mist that has come between us and the Truth. Much later on, in one of the latest Upanishads, we find the word Maya reappearing, but this time, a transformation has taken place in it, and a mass of new meaning has attached itself to the word. Theories had been propounded and repeated, others had been taken up, until at last the idea of Maya became fixed. We read in the Shvetashvatara Upanishad, "Know nature to be Maya and the Ruler of this Maya is the Lord Himself." Coming to our philosophers, we find that this word Maya has been manipulated in various fashions, until we come to the great Shankaracharya. The theory of Maya was manipulated a little by the Buddhists too, but in the hands of the Buddhists it became very much like what is called Idealism, and that is the meaning that is now generally given to the word Maya. When the Hindu says the world is Maya, at once people get the idea that the world is an illusion. This interpretation has some basis, as coming through the Buddhistic philosophers, because there was one section of philosophers who did not believe in the external world at all. But the Maya of the Vedanta, in its last developed form, is neither Idealism nor Realism, nor is it a theory. It is a simple statement of facts--what we are and what we see around us.

As I have told you before, the minds of the people from whom the Vedas came were intent upon following principles, discovering principles. They had no time to work upon details or to wait for them; they wanted to go deep into the heart of things. Something beyond was calling them, as it were, and they could not wait. Scattered through the Upanishads, we find that the details of subjects which we now call modern sciences are often very erroneous, but, at the same time, their principles are correct. For instance, the idea of ether, which is one of the latest theories of

1 modern science, is to be found in our ancient literature in forms 2 much more developed than is the modern scientific theory of ether 3 today, but it was in principle. When they tried to demonstrate the 4 workings of that principle, they made many mistakes. The theory of 5 the all-pervading life principle, of which all life in this universe is 6 but a differing manifestation was understood in Vedic times; it is 7 found in the Brahmanas. There is a long hymn in the Samhitas in 8 praise of Prana of which all life is but a manifestation. By the by, it 9 may interest some of you to know that there are theories in the 10 Vedic philosophy about the origin of life on this earth very similar to 11 those which have been advanced by some modern European 12 scientists. You, of course, all know that there is a theory that life 13 came from other planets. It is a settled doctrine with some Vedic 14 philosophers that life comes in this way from the moon.

15 Coming to the principles, we find these Vedic thinkers very 16 courageous and wonderfully bold in propounding large and 17 generalised theories. Their solution of the mystery of the universe, 18 from the external world, was as satisfactory as it could be. The 19 detailed workings of modern science do not bring the question one 20 step nearer to solution, because the principles have failed. If the 21 theory of ether failed in ancient times to give a solution of the 22 mystery of the universe, working out the details of that ether theory 23 would not bring us much nearer to the truth. If the theory of all-24 pervading life failed as a theory of this universe, it would not mean 25 anything more if worked out in detail, for the details do not change 26 the principle of the universe. What I mean is that in their inquiry 27 into the principle, the Hindu thinkers were as bold, and in some 28 cases, much bolder than the moderns. They made some of the 29 grandest generalisations that have yet been reached, and some still 30 remain as theories, which modern science has yet to get even as 31 theories. For instance, they not only arrived at the ether theory, but 32 went beyond and classified mind also as a still more rarefied ether.
33 Beyond that again, they found a still more rarefied ether. Yet that 34 was no solution, it did not solve the problem. No amount of 35 knowledge of the external world could solve the problem. "But", 36 says the scientists, "we are just beginning to know a little: wait a 37 few thousand years and we shall get the solution." "No," says the 38 Vedantist, for he has proved beyond all doubt that the mind is 39 limited, that it cannot go beyond certain limits--beyond time, space, 40 and causation. As no man can jump out of his own self, so no man 41 can go beyond the limits that have been put upon him by the laws of 42 time and space. Every attempt to solve the laws of causation, time, 43 and space would be futile, because the very attempt would have to 44 be made by taking for granted the existence of these three. What 45 does the statement of the existence of the world mean, then? "This 46 world has no existence." What is meant by that? It means that it has 47 no absolute existence. It exists only in relation to my mind, to your 48 mind, and to the mind of everyone else. We see this world with the 49 five senses but if we had another sense, we would see in it 50 something more. If we had yet another sense, it would appear as 51 something still different. It has, therefore, no real existence; it has 52 no unchangeable, immovable, infinite existence. Nor can it be 53 called non-existence, seeing that it exists, and we have to work in

1 and through it. It is a mixture of existence and non-existence.

2 Coming from abstractions to the common, everyday details of 3 our lives, we find that our life is a contradiction, a mixture of 4 existence and non-existence. There is this contradiction in 5 knowledge. It seems that man can know everything, if he only 6 wants to know; but before he has gone a few steps, he finds an 7 adamant wall which he cannot pass. All his work is in a circle, 8 and he cannot go beyond that circle. The problems which are 9 nearest and dearest to him are impelling him on and calling, day 10 and night, for a solution, but he cannot solve them, because he 11 cannot go beyond his intellect. And yet that desire is implanted 12 strongly in him. Still we know that the only good is to be obtained 13 by controlling and checking it. With every breath, every impulse of 14 our heart asks us to be selfish. At the same time, there is some 15 power beyond us which says that it is unselfishness alone which is 16 good. Every child is a born optimist; he dreams golden dreams. In 17 youth he becomes still more optimistic. It is hard for a young man 18 to believe that there is such a thing as death, such a thing as defeat 19 or degradation. Old age comes, and life is a mass of ruins. Dreams 20 have vanished into the air, and the man becomes a pessimist. Thus 21 we go from one extreme to another, buffeted by nature, without 22 knowing where we are going. It reminds me of a celebrated song in 23 the Lalita Vistara, the biography of Buddha. Buddha was born, says 24 the book, as the saviour of mankind, but he forgot himself in the 25 luxuries of his palace. Some angels came and sang a song to rouse 26 him. And the burden of the whole song is that we are floating down 27 the river of life which is continually changing with no stop and no 28 rest. So are our lives, going on and on without knowing any rest.
29 What are we to do? The man who has enough to eat and drink is an 30 optimist, and he avoids all mention of misery, for it frightens him.
31 Tell not to him of the sorrows and the sufferings of the world; go to 32 him and tell that it is all good. "Yes, I am safe," says he. "Look at 33 me! I have a nice house to live in. I do not fear cold and hunger; 34 therefore do not bring these horrible pictures before me." But, on 35 the other hand, there are others dying of cold and hunger. If you go 36 and teach them that it is all good, they will not hear you. How can 37 they wish others to be happy when they are miserable? Thus we are 38 oscillating between optimism and pessimism.

39 Then, there is the tremendous fact of death. The whole world 40 is going towards death; everything dies. All our progress, our 41 vanities, our reforms, our luxuries, our wealth, our knowledge, have 42 that one end--death. That is all that is certain. Cities come and go, 43 empires rise and fall, planets break into pieces and crumble into 44 dust, to be blown about by the atmospheres of other planets. Thus it 45 has been going on from time without beginning. Death is the end of 46 everything. Death is the end of life, of beauty, of wealth, of power, 47 of virtue too. Saints die and sinners die, kings die and beggars die.
48 They are all going to death, and yet this tremendous clinging on to 49 life exists. Somehow, we do not know why, we cling to life; we 50 cannot give it up. And this is Maya.

51 The mother is nursing a child with great care; all her soul, 52 her life, is in that child. The child grows, becomes a man, and

1 perchance becomes a blackguard and a brute, kicks her and beats 2 her every day; and yet the mother clings to the child; and when her 3 reason awakes, she covers it up with the idea of love. She little 4 thinks that it is not love, that it is something which has got hold of 5 her nerves, which she cannot shake off; however she may try, she 6 cannot shake off the bondage she is in. And this is Maya.

7 We are all after the Golden Fleece. Every one of us thinks 8 that this will be his. Every reasonable man sees that his chance is, 9 perhaps, one in twenty millions, yet everyone struggles for it. And 10 this is Maya.

11 Death is stalking day and night over this earth of ours, but at 12 the same time we think we shall live eternally. A question was once 13 asked of King Yudhishthira, "What is the most wonderful thing on 14 this earth?" And the king replied, "Every day people are dying 15 around us, and yet men think they will never die." And this is Maya.

16 These tremendous contradictions in our intellect, in our 17 knowledge, yea, in all the facts of our life face us on all sides. A 18 reformer arises and wants to remedy the evils that are existing in a 19 certain nation; and before they have been remedied, a thousand 20 other evils arise in another place. It is like an old house that is 21 falling; you patch it up in one place and the ruin extends to another.
22 In India, our reformers cry and preach against the evils of enforced 23 widowhood. In the West, non-marriage is the great evil. Help the 24 unmarried on one side; they are suffering. Help the widows on the 25 other; they are suffering. It is like chronic rheumatism: you drive it 26 from the head, and it goes to the body; you drive it from there, and 27 it goes to the feet. Reformers arise and preach that learning, 28 wealth, and culture should not be in the hands of a select few; and 29 they do their best to make them accessible to all. These may bring 30 more happiness to some, but, perhaps as culture comes, physical 31 happiness lessens. The knowledge of happiness brings the 32 knowledge of unhappiness. Which way then shall we go? The least 33 amount of material prosperity that we enjoy is causing the same 34 amount of misery elsewhere. This is the law. The young, perhaps, 35 do not see it clearly, but those who have lived long enough and 36 those who have struggled enough will understand it. And this is 37 Maya. These things are going on, day and night, and to find a 38 solution of this problem is impossible. Why should it be so? It is 39 impossible to answer this, because the question cannot be logically 40 formulated. There is neither how nor why in fact; we only know 41 that it is and that we cannot help it. Even to grasp it, to draw an 42 exact image of it in our own mind, is beyond our power. How can 43 we solve it then?

44 Maya is a statement of the fact of this universe, of how it is 45 going on. People generally get frightened when these things are 46 told to them. But bold we must be. Hiding facts is not the way to 47 find a remedy. As you all know, a hare hunted by dogs puts its head 48 down and thinks itself safe; so, when we run into optimism, we do 49 just like the hare, but that is no remedy. There are objections 50 against this, but you may remark that they are generally from 51 people who possess many of the good things of life. In this country 52 (England) it is very difficult to be a pessimist. Everyone tells me

1 how wonderfully the world is going on, how progressive; but what 2 he himself is, in his own world. Old questions arise: Christianity
3 must be the only true religion of the world, because Christian 4 nations are prosperous! But that assertion contradicts itself, 5 because the prosperity of the Christian nation depends on the 6 misfortune of non-Christian nations. There must be some to prey 7 on. Suppose the whole world were to become Christian, then the 8 Christian nations would become poor, because there would be no
9 non-Christian nations for them to prey upon. Thus the argument 10 kills itself. Animals are living upon plants, men upon animals and, 11 worst of all, upon one another, the strong upon the weak. This is 12 going on everywhere. And this is Maya. What solution do you find 13 for this? We hear every day many explanations, and are told that in 14 the long run all will be good. Taking it for granted that this is 15 possible, why should there be this diabolical way of doing good?
16 Why cannot good be done through good, instead of through these 17 diabolical methods? The descendants of the human beings of today 18 will be happy; but why must there be all this suffering now? There 19 is no solution. This is Maya.

20 Again, we often hear that it is one of the features of evolution 21 that it eliminates evil, and this evil being continually eliminated 22 from the world, at last only good will remain. That is very nice to 23 hear, and it panders to the vanity of those who have enough of this 24 world's goods, who have not a hard struggle to face every day and 25 are not being crushed under the wheel of this so-called evolution. It 26 is very good and comforting indeed to such fortunate ones. The 27 common herd may suffer, but they do not care; let them die, they 28 are of no consequence. Very good, yet this argument is fallacious 29 from beginning to end. It takes for granted, in the first place, that 30 manifested good and evil in this world are two absolute realities. In 31 the second place, it makes a still worse assumption that the amount 32 of good is an in-creasing quantity and the amount of evil is a 33 decreasing quantity. So, if evil is being eliminated in this way by 34 what they call evolution, there will come a time when all this evil 35 will be eliminated and what remains will be all good. Very easy to 36 say, but can it be proved that evil is a lessening quality? Take, for 37 instance, the man who lives in a forest, who does not know how to 38 cultivate the mind, cannot read a book, has not heard of such a 39 thing as writing. If he is severely wounded, he is soon all right 40 again; while we die if we get a scratch. Machines are making things 41 cheap, making for progress and evolution, but millions are crushed, 42 that one may become rich; while one becomes rich, thousands at 43 the same time become poorer and poorer, and whole masses of 44 human beings are made slaves. That way it is going on. The animal 45 man lives in the senses. If he does not get enough to eat, he is 46 miserable; or if something happens to his body, he is miserable. In 47 the senses both his misery and his happiness begin and end. As 48 soon as this man progresses, as soon as his horizon of happiness 49 increases, his horizon of unhappiness increases proportionately.
50 The man in the forest does not know what it is to be jealous, to be 51 in the law courts, to pay taxes, to be blamed by society, to be ruled 52 over day and night by the most tremendous tyranny that human 53 diabolism ever invented, which pries into the secrets of every

1 human heart. He does not know how man becomes a thousand 2 times more diabolical than any other animal, with all his vain
3 knowledge and with all his pride. Thus it is that, as we emerge out 4 of the senses, we develop higher powers of enjoyment, and at the 5 same time we have to develop higher powers of suffering too. The 6 nerves become finer and capable of more suffering. In every society, 7 we often find that the ignorant, common man, when abused does 8 not feel much, but he feels a good thrashing. But the gentleman 9 cannot bear a single word of abuse; he has become so finely nerved.
10 Misery has increased with his susceptibility to happiness. This does 11 not go much to prove the evolutionist's case. As we increase our 12 power to be happy, we also increase our power to suffer, and 13 sometimes I am inclined to think that if we increase our power to 14 become happy in arithmetical progression, we shall increase, on the 15 other hand, our power to become miserable in geometrical 16 progression. We who are progressing know that the more we 17 progress, the more avenues are opened to pain as well as to 18 pleasure. And this is Maya.

19 Thus we find that Maya is not a theory for the explanation of 20 the world; it is simply a statement of facts as they exist, that the 21 very basis of our being is contradiction, that wherever there is 22 good, there must also be evil, and wherever there is evil, there 23 must be some good, wherever there is life, death must follow as its 24 shadow, and everyone who smiles will have to weep, and vice versa.
25 Nor can this state of things be remedied. We may verily imagine 26 that there will be a place where there will be only good and no evil, 27 where we shall only smile and never weep. This is impossible in the 28 nature of things; for the conditions will remain the same. Wherever 29 there is the power of producing a smile in us, there lurks the power 30 of producing tears. Wherever there is the power of producing 31 happiness, there lurks somewhere the power of making us
32 miserable.

33 Thus the Vedanta philosophy is neither optimistic nor 34 pessimistic. It voices both these views and takes things as they are.
35 It admits that this world is a mixture of good and evil, happiness 36 and misery, and that to increase the one, one must of necessity 37 increase the other. There will never be a perfectly good or bad 38 world, because the very idea is a contradiction in terms. The great 39 secret revealed by this analysis is that good and bad are not two 40 cut-and-dried, separate existences. There is not one thing in this 41 world of ours which you can label as good and good alone, and 42 there is not one thing in the universe which you can label as bad 43 and bad alone. The very same phenomenon which is appearing to 44 be good now, may appear to be bad tomorrow. The same thing 45 which is producing misery in one, may produce happiness in 46 another. The fire that burns the child, may cook a good meal for a 47 starving man. The same nerves that carry the sensations of misery 48 carry also the sensations of happiness. The only way to stop evil, 49 therefore, is to stop good also; there is no other way. To stop death, 50 we shall have to stop life also. Life without death and happiness 51 without misery are contradictions, and neither can be found alone, 52 because each of them is but a different manifestation of the same

1 thing. What I thought to be good yesterday, I do not think to be 2 good now. When I look back upon my life and see what were my 3 ideals at different times, I find this to be so. At one time my ideal
4 was to drive a strong pair of horses; at another time I thought, if I
5 could make a certain kind of sweetmeat, I should be perfectly 6 happy; later I imagined that I should be entirely satisfied if I had a 7 wife and children and plenty of money. Today I laugh at all these 8 ideals as mere childish nonsense.

9 The Vedanta says, there must come a time when we shall look 10 back and laugh at the ideals which make us afraid of giving up our 11 individuality. Each one of us wants to keep this body for an 12 indefinite time, thinking we shall be very happy, but there will come 13 a time when we shall laugh at this idea. Now, if such be the truth, 14 we are in a state of hopeless contradiction--neither existence nor 15 non-existence, neither misery nor happiness, but a mixture of them.
16 What, then, is the use of Vedanta and all other philosophies and 17 religions? And, above all, what is the use of doing good work? This 18 is a question that comes to the mind. If it is true that you cannot do 19 good without doing evil, and whenever you try to create happiness 20 there will always be misery, people will ask you, "What is the use of 21 doing good?" The answer is in the first place, that we must work for 22 lessening misery, for that is the only way to make ourselves happy.
23 Every one of us finds it out sooner or later in our lives. The bright 24 ones find it out a little earlier, and the dull ones a little later. The 25 dull ones pay very dearly for the discovery and the bright ones less 26 dearly. In the second place, we must do our part, because that is 27 the only way of getting out of this life of contradiction. Both the 28 forces of good and evil will keep this universe alive for us, until we 29 awake from our dreams and give up this building of mud pies. That 30 lesson we shall have to learn, and it will take a long, long time to 31 learn it.

32 Attempts have been made in Germany to build a system of 33 philosophy on the basis that the Infinite has become the finite. Such 34 attempts are also made in England. And the analysis of the position 35 of these philosophers is this, that the Infinite is trying to express 36 itself in this universe, and that there will come a time when the 37 Infinite will succeed in doing so. It is all very well, and we have 38 used the words Infinite and manifestation and expression, and so 39 on, but philosophers naturally ask for a logical fundamental basis 40 for the statement that the finite can fully express the Infinite. The 41 Absolute and the Infinite can become this universe only by 42 limitation. Everything must be limited that comes through the 43 senses, or through the mind, or through the intellect; and for the 44 limited to be the unlimited is simply absurd, and can never be. The 45 Vedanta, on the other hand, says that it is true that the Absolute or 46 the Infinite is trying to express itself in the finite, but there will 47 come a time when it will find that it is impossible, and it will then 48 have to beat a retreat, and this beating a retreat means 49 renunciation which is the real beginning of religion. Nowadays it is 50 very hard even to talk of renunciation. It was said of me in America 51 that I was a man who came out of a land that had been dead and 52 buried for five thousand years, and talked of renunciation. So says, perhaps, the English philosopher. Yet it is true that that is the only path to religion. Renounce and give up. What did Christ say? "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." Again and again did he preach renunciation as the only way to perfection. There comes a time when the mind awakes from this long and dreary dream--the child gives up its play and wants to go back to its mother. It finds the truth of the statement, "Desire is never satisfied by the enjoyment of desires, it only increases the more, as fire, when butter is poured upon it."

This is true of all sense-enjoyments, of all intellectual enjoyments, and of all the enjoyments of which the human mind is capable. They are nothing, they are within Maya, within this network beyond which we cannot go. We may run therein through infinite time and find no end, and whenever we struggle to get a little enjoyment, a mass of misery falls upon us. How awful is this! And when I think of it, I cannot but consider that this theory of Maya, this statement that it is all Maya, is the best and only explanation. What an amount of misery there is in this world; and if you travel among various nations you will find that one nation attempts to cure its evils by one means, and another by another. The very same evil has been taken up by various races, and attempts have been made in various ways to check it, yet no nation has succeeded. If it has been minimised at one point, a mass of evil has been crowded at another point. Thus it goes. The Hindus, to keep up a high standard of chastity in the race, have sanctioned child-marriage, which in the long run has degraded the race. At the same time, I cannot deny that this child-marriage makes the race more chaste. What would you have? If you want the nation to be more chaste, you weaken men and women physically by child-marriage. On the other hand, are you in England any better off? No, because chastity is the life of a nation. Do you not find in history that the first death-sign of a nation has been unchastity? When that has entered, the end of the race is in sight. Where shall we get a solution of these miseries then? If parents select husbands and wives for their children, then this evil is minimised. The daughters of India are more practical than sentimental. But very little of poetry remains in their lives. Again, if people select their own husbands and wives, that does not seem to bring much happiness. The Indian woman is generally very happy; there are not many cases of quarrelling between husband and wife. On the other hand in the United States, where the greatest liberty obtains, the number of unhappy homes and marriages is large. Unhappiness is here, there, and everywhere. What does it show? That, after all, not much happiness has been gained by all these ideals. We all struggle for happiness and as soon as we get a little happiness on one side, on the other side there comes unhappiness.

Shall we not work to do good then? Yes, with more zest than ever, but what this knowledge will do for us is to break down fanaticism. The Englishman will no more be a fanatic and curse the Hindu. He will learn to respect the customs of different nations. There will be less of fanaticism and more of real work. Fanatics cannot work, they waste three-fourths of their energy. It is the level-

1 headed, calm, practical man who works. So, the power to work will 2 increase from this idea. Knowing that this is the state of things, 3 there will be more patience. The sight of misery or of evil will not 4 be able to throw us off our balance and make us run after shadows.
5 Therefore, patience will come to us, knowing that the world will 6 have to go on in its own way. If, for instance, all men have become 7 good, the animals will have in the meantime evolved into men, and 8 will have to pass through the same state, and so with the plants.
9 But only one thing is certain; the mighty river is rushing towards 10 the ocean, and all the drops that constitute the stream will in time 11 be drawn into that boundless ocean. So, in this life, with all its 12 miseries and sorrows, its joys and smiles and tears, one thing is 13 certain, that all things are rushing towards their goal, and it is only 14 a question of time when you and I, and plants and animals, and 15 every particle of life that exists must reach the Infinite Ocean of 16 Perfection, must attain to Freedom, to God.

17 Let me repeat, once more, that the Vedantic position is 18 neither pessimism nor optimism. It does not say that this world is 19 all evil or all good. It says that our evil is of no less value than our 20 good, and our good of no more value than our evil. They are bound 21 together. This is the world, and knowing this, you work with 22 patience. What for? Why should we work? If this is the state of 23 things, what shall we do? Why not become agnostics? The modern 24 agnostics also know there is no solution of this problem, no getting 25 out of this evil of Maya, as we say in our language; therefore they 26 tell us to be satisfied and enjoy life. Here, again, is a mistake, a 27 tremendous mistake, a most illogical mistake. And it is this. What 28 do you mean by life? Do you mean only the life of the senses? In 29 this, every one of us differs only slightly from the brutes. I am sure 30 that no one is present here whose life is only in the senses. Then, 31 this present life means something more than that. Our feelings, 32 thoughts, and aspirations are all part and parcel of our life; and is 33 not the struggle towards the great ideal, towards perfection, one of 34 the most important components of what we call life? According to 35 the agnostics, we must enjoy life as it is. But this life means, above 36 all, this search after the ideal; the essence of life is going towards 37 perfection. We must have that, and, therefore, we cannot be 38 agnostics or take the world as it appears. The agnostic position 39 takes this life, minus the ideal component, to be all that exists. And 40 this, the agnostic claims, cannot be reached, therefore he must give 41 up the search. This is what is called Maya--this nature, this 42 universe.

43 All religions are more or less attempts to get beyond nature-- 44 the crudest or the most developed, expressed through mythology or 45 symbology, stories of gods, angels or demons, or through stories of 46 saints or seers, great men or prophets, or through the abstractions 47 of philosophy--all have that one subject, all are trying to get beyond 48 these limitations. In one word, they are all struggling towards 49 freedom. Man feels, consciously or unconsciously, that he is bound; 50 he is not what he wants to be. It was taught to him at the very 51 moment he began to look around. That very instant he learnt that 52 he was bound, and he also found that there was something in him

1 which wanted to fly beyond, where the body could not follow, but 2 which was as yet chained down by this limitation. Even in the 3 lowest of religious ideas, where departed ancestors and other 4 spirits--mostly violent and cruel, lurking about the houses of their 5 friends, fond of bloodshed and strong drink--are worshipped, even 6 there we find that one common factor, that of freedom. The man 7 who wants to worship the gods sees in them, above all things, 8 greater freedom than in himself. If a door is closed, he thinks the 9 gods can get through it, and that walls have no limitations for them.
10 This idea of freedom increases until it comes to the ideal of a 11 Personal God, of which the central concept is that He is a Being 12 beyond the limitation of nature, of Maya. I see before me, as it 13 were, that in some of those forest retreats this question is being 14 discussed by those ancient sages of India; and in one of them, 15 where even the oldest and the holiest fail to reach the solution, a 16 young man stands up in the midst of them, and declares, "Hear, ye 17 children of immortality, hear, ye who live in the highest places, I 18 have found the way. By knowing Him who is beyond darkness we 19 can go beyond death."

20 This Maya is everywhere. It is terrible. Yet we have to work 21 through it. The man who says that he will work when the world has 22 become all good and then he will enjoy bliss is as likely to succeed 23 as the man who sits beside the Ganga and says, "I will ford the river 24 when all the water has run into the ocean." The way is not with 25 Maya, but against it. This is another fact to learn. We are not born 26 as helpers of nature, but competitors with nature. We are its bond-27 masters, but we bind ourselves down. Why is this house here?
28 Nature did not build it. Nature says, go and live in the forest. Man 29 says, I will build a house and fight with nature, and he does so. The 30 whole history of humanity is a continuous fight against the so-called 31 laws of nature, and man gains in the end. Coming to the internal 32 world, there too the same fight is going on, this fight between the 33 animal man and the spiritual man, between light and darkness; and 34 here too man becomes victorious. He, as it were, cuts his way out of 35 nature to freedom.

36 We see, then, that beyond this Maya the Vedantic 37 philosophers find something which is not bound by Maya; and if we 38 can get there, we shall not be bound by Maya. This idea is in some 39 form or other the common property of all religions. But, with the 40 Vedanta, it is only the beginning of religion and not the end. The 41 idea of a Personal God, the Ruler and Creator of this universe, as 42 He has been styled, the Ruler of Maya, or nature, is not the end of 43 these Vedantic ideas; it is only the beginning. The idea grows and 44 grows until the Vedantist finds that He who, he thought, was 45 standing outside, is he himself and is in reality within. He is the one 46 who is free, but who through limitation thought he was bound.

MAYA AND THE EVOLUTION OF THE CONCEPTION OF GOD

(Delivered in London, 20th October, 1896)

We have seen how the idea of Maya, which forms, as it were, one of the basic doctrines of the Advaita Vedanta, is, in its germs, found even in the Samhitas, and that in reality all the ideas which are developed in the Upanishads are to be found already in the Samhitas in some form or other. Most of you are by this time familiar with the idea of Maya, and know that it is sometimes erroneously explained as illusion, so that when the universe is said to be Maya, that also has to be explained as being illusion. The translation of the word is neither happy nor correct. Maya is not a theory; it is simply a statement of facts about the universe as it exists, and to understand Maya we must go back to the Samhitas and begin with the conception in the germ.

We have seen how the idea of the Devas came. At the same time we know that these Devas were at first only powerful beings, nothing more. Most of you are horrified when reading the old scriptures, whether of the Greeks, the Hebrews, the Persians, or others, to find that the ancient gods sometimes did things which, to us, are very repugnant. But when we read these books, we entirely forget that we are persons of the nineteenth century, and these gods were beings existing thousands of years ago. We also forget that the people who worshipped these gods found nothing incongruous in their characters, found nothing to frighten them, because they were very much like themselves. I may also remark that is the one great lesson we have to learn throughout our lives. In judging others we always judge them by our own ideals. That is not as it should be. Everyone must be judged according to his own ideal, and not by that of anyone else. In our dealings with our fellow-beings we constantly labour under this mistake, and I am of opinion that the vast majority of our quarrels with one another arise simply from this one cause that we are always trying to judge others' gods by our own, others' ideals by our ideals, and others' motives by our motives. Under certain circumstances I might do a certain thing, and when I see another person taking the same course I think he has also the same motive actuating him, little dreaming that although the effect may be the same, yet many other causes may produce the same thing. He may have performed the action with quite a different motive from that which impelled me to do it. So in judging of those ancient religions we must not take the standpoint to which we incline, but must put ourselves into the position of thought and life of those early times.

The idea of the cruel and ruthless Jehovah in the Old Testament has frightened many--but why? What right have they to assume that the Jehovah of the ancient Jews must represent the conventional idea of the God of the present day? At the same time, we must not forget that there will come men after us who will laugh at our ideas of religion and God in the same way that we laugh at those of the ancients. Yet, through all these various conceptions

1 runs the golden thread of unity, and it is the purpose of the Vedanta 2 to discover this thread. "I am the thread that runs through all these 3 various ideas, each one of which is like a pearl," says the Lord 4 Krishna; and it is the duty of Vedanta to establish this connecting 5 thread, however incongruous or disgusting may seem these ideas 6 which judged according to the conceptions of today. These ideas, in 7 the setting of past times, were harmonious and not more hideous 8 than our present ideas. It is only when we try to take them out of 9 their settings and apply to our present circumstances that the 10 hideousness becomes obvious. For the old surroundings are dead 11 and gone. Just as the ancient Jew has developed into the keen, 12 modern, sharp Jew, and the ancient Aryan into the intellectual 13 Hindu, similarly Jehovah has grown, and Devas have grown.

14 The great mistake is in recognising the evolution of the 15 worshippers, while we do not acknowledge the evolution of the 16 Worshipped. He is not credited with the advance that his devotees 17 have made. That is to say, you and I, as representing ideas, have 18 grown; these gods also, as representing ideas, have grown. This 19 may seem somewhat curious to you--that God can grow. He cannot.
20 He is unchangeable. In the same sense the real man never grows.
21 But the man's ideas of God are constantly changing and expanding.
22 We shall see later on how the real man behind each one of these 23 human manifestations is immovable, unchangeable, pure, and 24 always perfect; and in the same way the idea that we form of God is 25 a mere manifestation, our own creation. Behind that is the real God 26 who never changes, the ever pure, the immutable. But the 27 manifestation is always changing, revealing the reality behind more 28 and more. When it reveals more of the fact behind, it is called 29 progression, when it hides more of the fact behind, it is called 30 retrogression. Thus, as we grow, so the gods grow. From the 31 ordinary point of view, just as we reveal ourselves as we evolve, so 32 the gods reveal themselves.

33 We shall now be in a position to understand the theory of 34 Maya. In all the regions of the world the one question they propose 35 to discuss is this: Why is there disharmony in the universe? Why is 36 there this evil in the universe? We do not find this question in the 37 very inception of primitive religious ideas, because the world did 38 not appear incongruous to the primitive man. Circumstances were 39 not inharmonious for him; there was no clash of opinions; to him 40 there was no antagonism of good and evil. There was merely a 41 feeling in his own heart of something which said yea, and 42 something which said nay. The primitive man was a man of impulse.
43 He did what occurred to him, and tried to bring out through his 44 muscles whatever thought came into his mind, and he never 45 stopped to judge, and seldom tried to check his impulses. Indra 46 comes and shatters the forces of the demons. Jehovah is pleased 47 with one person and displeased with another, for what reason no 48 one knows or asks. The habit of inquiry had not then arisen, and 49 whatever he did was regarded as right. There was no idea of good 50 or evil. The Devas did many wicked things in our sense of the word; 51 again and again Indra and other gods committed very wicked 52 deeds, but to the worshippers of Indra the ideas of wickedness and 1 evil did not occur, so they did not question them.

2 With the advance of ethical ideas came the fight. There arose 3 a certain sense in man, called in different languages and nations by 4 different names. Call it the voice of God, or the result of past 5 education, or whatever else you like, but the effect was this that it 6 had a checking power upon the natural impulses of man. There is 7 one impulse in our minds which says, do. Behind it rises another 8 voice which says, do not. There is one set of ideas in our mind 9 which is always struggling to get outside through the channels of 10 the senses, and behind that, although it may be thin and weak, 11 there is an infinitely small voice which says, do not go outside. The 12 two beautiful Sanskrit words for these phenomena are Pravritti and 13 Nivritti, "circling forward" and "circling inward". It is the circling 14 forward which usually governs our actions. Religion begins with the 15 circling inward. Religion begins with this "do not". Spiritual begins 16 with this "do not". When the "do not" is not there, religion has not 17 begun. And this "do not" came, causing men's ideas to grow, despite 18 the fighting gods which they had worshipped.

19 A little love awoke in the hearts of mankind. It was very small 20 indeed, and even now it is not much greater. It was at first confined 21 to a tribe embracing perhaps members of the same tribe; these 22 gods loved their tribes and each god was a tribal god, and the 23 protector of that tribe. And sometimes the members of a tribe 24 would think of themselves as the descendants of their god, just as 25 the clans in different nations think that they are the common 26 descendants of the man who was the founder of the clan. There 27 were in ancient times, and are even now, some people who claim to 28 be descendants not only of these tribal gods, but also of the Sun 29 and the Moon. You read in the ancient Sanskrit books of the great 30 heroic emperors of the solar and the lunar dynasties. They were 31 first worshippers of the Sun and the Moon, and gradually came to 32 think of themselves as descendants of the god of the Sun, of the 33 Moon, and so forth. So when these tribal ideas began to grow there 34 came a little love, some slight idea of duty towards each other, a 35 little social organisation. Then, naturally, the idea came: How can 36 we live together without bearing and forbearing? How can one man 37 live with another without having some time or other to check his 38 impulses, to restrain himself, to forbear from doing things which his 39 mind would prompt him to do? It is impossible. Thus comes the idea 40 of restraint. The whole social fabric is based upon the idea of 41 restraint, and we all know that the man or woman who has not 42 learnt the great lesson of bearing and forbearing leads a most 43 miserable life.

44 Now, when the ideas of religion came, a glimpse or something 45 higher, more ethical, dawned upon the intellect of mankind. The old 46 gods were found to be incongruous--these boisterous, fighting, 47 drinking, beef-eating gods of the ancients--whose delight was in the 48 smell of burning flesh and libations of strong liquor. Sometimes 49 Indra drank so much that he fell upon the ground and talked 50 unintelligibly. These gods could no longer be tolerated. The notion 51 had arisen of inquiring into motives, and the gods had to come in 52 for their share of inquiry. Reason for such-and-such actions was

1 demanded and the reason was wanting. Therefore man gave up 2 these gods, or rather they developed higher ideas concerning them.
3 They took a survey, as it were, of all the actions and qualities of the 4 gods and discarded those which they could not harmonise, and kept 5 those which they could understand, and combined them, labelling 6 them with one name, Deva-deva, the God of gods. The god to be 7 worshipped was no more a simple symbol of power; something 8 more was required than that. He was an ethical god; he loved 9 mankind, and did good to mankind. But the idea of god still 10 remained. They increased his ethical significance, and increased 11 also his power. He became the most ethical being in the universe, 12 as well as the most almighty.

13 But all this patchwork would not do. As the explanation 14 assumed greater proportions, the difficulty which is sought to solve 15 did the same. If the qualities of the god increased in arithmetical 16 progression, the difficulty and doubt increased in geometrical 17 progression. The difficulty of Jehovah was very little beside the 18 difficulty of the God of the universe, and this question remains to 19 the present day. Why under the reign of the almighty and all-loving 20 God of the universe should diabolical things be allowed to remain?
21 Why so much more misery than happiness, and so much more 22 wickedness than good? We may shut our eyes to all these things, 23 but the fact still remains that this world is a hideous world. At best, 24 it is the hell of Tantalus. Here we are with strong impulses and 25 stronger cravings for sense-enjoyments, but cannot satisfy them.
26 There rises a wave which impels us forward in spite of our own will, 27 and as soon as we move one step, comes a blow. We are all doomed 28 to live here like Tantalus. Ideals come into our head far beyond the 29 limit of our sense-ideals, but when we seek to express them, we 30 cannot do so. On the other hand, we are crushed by the surging 31 mass around us. Yet if I give up all ideality and merely struggle 32 through this world, my existence is that of a brute, and I
33 degenerate and degrade myself. Neither way is happiness.
34 Unhappiness is the fate of those who are content to live in this 35 world, born as they are. A thousand times greater misery is the fate 36 of those who dare to stand forth for truth and for higher things and 37 who dare to ask for something higher than mere brute existence 38 here. These are facts; but there is no explanation--there cannot be 39 any explanation. But the Vedanta shows the way out. You must bear 40 in mind that I have to tell you facts that will frighten you 41 sometimes, but if you remember what I say, think of it, and digest it, 42 it will be yours, it will raise you higher, and make you capable of 43 understanding and living in truth.

44 Now, it is statement of fact that this world is a Tantalus's hell, 45 that we do not know anything about this universe, yet at the same 46 time we cannot say that we do not know. I cannot say that this chain 47 exists, when I think that I do not know it. It may be an entire 48 delusion of my brain. I may be dreaming all the time. I am dreaming 49 that I am talking to you, and that you are listening to me. No one 50 can prove that it is not a dream. My brain itself may be a dream, 51 and as to that no one has ever seen his own brain. We all take it for 52 granted. So it is with everything. My own body I take for granted.

1 At the same time I cannot say, I do not know. This standing between 2 knowledge and ignorance, this mystic twilight, the mingling of truth
3 and falsehood--and where they meet--no one knows. We are walking 4 in the midst of a dream, half sleeping, half waking, passing all our 5 lives in a haze; this is the fate of everyone of us. This is the fate of 6 all sense-knowledge. This is the fate of all philosophy, of all boasted 7 science, of all boasted human knowledge. This is the universe.

8 What you call matter, or spirit, or mind, or anything else you 9 may like to call them, the fact remains the same: we cannot say that 10 they are, we cannot say that they are not. We cannot say they are 11 one, we cannot say they are many. This eternal play of light and 12 darkness--indiscriminate, indistinguishable, inseparable--is always 13 there. A fact, yet at the same time not a fact; awake and at the 14 same time asleep. This is a statement of facts, and this is what is 15 called Maya. We are born in this Maya, we live in it, we think in it, 16 we dream in it. We are philosophers in it, we are spiritual men in it, 17 nay, we are devils in this Maya, and we are gods in this Maya.
18 Stretch your ideas as far as you can, make them higher and higher, 19 call them infinite or by any other name you please, even these ideas 20 are within this Maya. It cannot be otherwise, and the whole of 21 human knowledge is a generalisation of this Maya trying to know it 22 as it appears to be. This is the work of Nama-Rupa--name and form.
23 Everything that has form, everything that calls up an idea in your 24 mind, is within Maya; for everything that is bound by the laws of 25 time, space and causation is within Maya.

26 Let us go back a little to those early ideas of God and see 27 what became of them. We perceive at once that the idea of some 28 Being who is eternally loving us--eternally unselfish and almighty, 29 ruling this universe--could not satisfy. "Where is the just, merciful 30 God?" asked the philosopher. Does He not see millions and millions 31 of His children perish, in the form of men and animals; for who can 32 live one moment here without killing others? Can you draw a breath 33 without destroying thousands of lives? You live, because, millions 34 die. Every moment of your life, every breath that you breathe, is 35 death to thousands; every movement that you make is death to 36 millions. Every morsel that you eat is death to millions. Why should 37 they die? There is an old sophism that they are very low existences.
38 Supposing they are--which is questionable, for who knows whether 39 the ant is greater than the man, or the man than the ant--who can 40 prove one way or the other? Apart from that question, even taking it 41 for granted that they are very low beings, still why should they die?
42 If they are low, they have more reason to live. Why not? Because 43 they live more in the senses, they feel pleasure and pain a 44 thousandfold more than you or I can do. Which of us eats a dinner 45 with the same gusto as a dog or wolf? None, because our energies 46 are not in the senses; they are in the intellect, in the spirit. But in 47 animals, their whole soul is in the senses, and they become mad 48 and enjoy things which we human beings never dream of, and the 49 pain is commensurate with the pleasure. Pleasure and pain are 50 meted out in equal measure. If the pleasure felt by animals is so 51 much keener than that felt by man, it follows that the animals' 52 sense of pain is as keen, if not keener than man's. So the fact is, the 1 pain and misery men feel in dying is intensified a thousandfold in 2 animals, and yet we kill them without troubling ourselves about 3 their misery. This is Maya. And if we suppose there is a Personal 4 God like a human being, who made everything, these so-called 5 explanations and theories which try to prove that out of evil comes 6 good are not sufficient. Let twenty thousand good things come, but 7 why should they come from evil? On that principle, I might cut the 8 throats of others because I want the full pleasure of my senses.

9 That is no reason. Why should good come through evil? The 10 question remains to be answered, and it cannot be answered. The 11 philosophy of India was compelled to admit this.

12 The Vedanta was (and is) the boldest system of religion. It 13 stopped nowhere, and it had one advantage. There was no body of 14 priests who sought to suppress every man who tried to tell the 15 truth. There was always absolute religious freedom. In India the 16 bondage of superstition is a social one; here in the West society is 17 very free. Social matters in India are very strict, but religious 18 opinion is free. In England a man may dress any way he likes, or eat 19 what he likes--no one objects; but if he misses attending church, 20 then Mrs. Grundy is down on him. He has to conform first to what 21 society says on religion, and then he may think of the truth. In 22 India, on the other hand, if a man dines with one who does not 23 belong to his own caste, down comes society with all its terrible 24 powers and crushes him then and there. If he wants to dress a little 25 differently from the way in which his ancestor dressed ages ago, he 26 is done for. I have heard of a man who was cast out by society 27 because he went several miles to see the first railway train. Well, 28 we shall presume that was not true! But in religion, we find 29 atheists, materialists, and Buddhists, creeds, opinions, and 30 speculations of every phase and variety, some of a most startling 31 character, living side by side. Preachers of all sects go about 32 teaching and getting adherents, and at the very gates of the 33 temples of gods, the Brahmins--to their credit be it said--allow even 34 the materialists to give forth their opinions.

35 Buddha died at a ripe old age. I remember a friend of mine, a 36 great American scientist, who was fond of reading his life. He did 37 not like the death of Buddha, because he was not crucified. What a 38 false idea! For a man to be great he must be murdered! Such ideas 39 never prevailed in India. This great Buddha travelled all over India, 40 denouncing her gods and even the God of the universe, and yet he 41 lived to a good old age. For eighty years he lived, and had 42 converted half the country.

43 Then, there were the Charvakas, who preached horrible 44 things, the most rank, undisguised materialism, such as in the 45 nineteenth century they dare not openly preach. These Charvakas 46 were allowed to preach from temple to temple, and city to city, that 47 religion was all nonsense, that it was priestcraft, that the Vedas 48 were the words and writings of fools, rogues, and demons, and that 49 there was neither God nor an eternal soul. If there was a soul, why 50 did it not come back after death drawn by the love of wife and 51 child? Their idea was that if there was a soul it must still love after 52 death, and want good things to eat and nice dress. Yet no one hurt

1 these Charvakas.

2 Thus India has always had this magnificent idea of religious 3 freedom, and you must remember that freedom is the first condition
4 of growth. What you do not make free, will never grow. The idea 5 that you can make others grow and help their growth, that you can 6 direct and guide them, always retaining for yourself the freedom of 7 the teacher, is nonsense, a dangerous lie which has retarded the 8 growth of millions and millions of human beings in this world. Let 9 men have the light of liberty. That is the only condition of growth.

10 We, in India, allowed liberty in spiritual matters, and we have 11 a tremendous spiritual power in religious thought even today. You 12 grant the same liberty in social matters, and so have a splendid 13 social organisation. We have not given any freedom to the 14 expansion of social matters, and ours is a cramped society. You have 15 never given any freedom in religious matters but with fire and 16 sword have enforced your beliefs, and the result is that religion is a 17 stunted, degenerated growth in the European mind. In India, we 18 have to take the shackles from society; in Europe, the chains must 19 be taken from the feet of spiritual progress. Then will come a 20 wonderful growth and development of man. If we discover that 21 there is one unity running through all these developments, spiritual, 22 moral, and social, we shall find that religion, in the fullest sense of 23 the word, must come into society, and into our everyday life. In the 24 light of Vedanta you will understand that all sciences are but 25 manifestations of religion, and so is everything that exists in this 26 world.

27 We see, then, that through freedom the sciences were built;
28 and in them we have two sets of opinions, the one the materialistic 29 and denouncing, and the other the positive and constructive. It is a 30 most curious fact that in every society you find them. Supposing 31 there is an evil in society, you will find immediately one group rise 32 up and denounce it in vindictive fashion, which sometimes 33 degenerates into fanaticism. There are fanatics in every society, and 34 women frequently join in these outcries, because of their impulsive 35 nature. Every fanatic who gets up and denounces something can 36 secure a following. It is very easy to break down; a maniac can 37 break anything he likes, but it would be hard for him to build up 38 anything. These fanatics may do some good, according to their 39 light, but much more harm. Because social institutions are not 40 made in a day, and to change them means removing the cause.
41 Suppose there is an evil; denouncing it will not remove it, but you 42 must go to work at the root. First find out the cause, then remove it, 43 and the effect will be removed also. Mere outcry will not produce 44 any effect, unless indeed it produces misfortune.

45 There were others who had sympathy in their hearts and who 46 understood the idea that we must go deep into the cause; these 47 were the great saints. One fact you must remember, that all the 48 great teachers of the world have declared that they came not to 49 destroy but to fulfil. Many times this has not been understood, and 50 their forbearance has been thought to be an unworthy compromise 51 with existing popular opinions. Even now, you occasionally hear that 52 these prophets and great teachers were rather cowardly and dared

1 not say and do what they thought was right; but that was not so.
2 Fanatics little understand the infinite power of love in the hearts of 3 these great sages who looked upon the inhabitants of this world as 4 their children. They were the real fathers, the real gods, filled with 5 infinite sympathy and patience for everyone; they were ready to 6 bear and forbear. They knew how human society should grow, and 7 patiently, slowly, surely, went on applying their remedies, not by 8 denouncing and frightening people, but by gently and kindly 9 leading them upwards step by step. Such were the writers of the 10 Upanishads. They knew full well how the old ideas of God were not 11 reconcilable with the advanced ethical ideas of the time; they knew 12 full well that what the atheists were preaching contained a good 13 deal of truth, nay, great nuggets of truth; but at the same time, they 14 understood that those who wished to sever the thread that bound 15 the beads, who wanted to build a new society in the air, would 16 entirely fail.

17 We never build anew, we simply change places; we cannot 18 have anything new, we only change the position of things. The seed 19 grows into the tree, patiently and gently; we must direct our 20 energies towards the truth, and fulfil the truth that exists, not try to 21 make new truths. Thus, instead of denouncing these old ideas of 22 God as unfit for modern times, the ancient sages began to seek out 23 the reality that was in them. The result was the Vedanta philosophy, 24 and out of the old deities, out of the monotheistic God, the Ruler of 25 the universe, they found yet higher and higher ideas in what is 26 called the Impersonal Absolute; they found oneness throughout the 27 universe.

28 He who sees in this world of manifoldness that One running 29 through all, in this world of death he who finds that One Infinite 30 Life, and in this world of insentience and ignorance he who finds 31 that One Light and Knowledge, unto him belongs eternal peace.
32 Unto none else, unto none else.

MAYA AND FREEDOM

(Delivered in London, 22nd October 1896)

"Trailing clouds of glory we come," says the poet. Not all of us come as trailing clouds of glory however; some of us come as trailing black fogs; there can be no question about that. But every one of us comes into this world to fight, as on a battlefield. We come here weeping to fight our way, as well as we can, and to make a path for ourselves through this infinite ocean of life; forward we go, having long ages behind us and an immense expanse beyond. So on we go, till death comes and takes us off the field-victorious or defeated, we do not know. And this is Maya.

Hope is dominant in the heart of childhood. The whole world is a golden vision to the opening eyes of the child; he thinks his will is supreme. As he moves onward, at every step nature stands as an adamant wall, barring his future progress. He may hurl himself against it again and again, striving to break through. The further he goes, the further recedes the ideal, till death comes, and there is release, perhaps. And this is Maya.

A man of science rises, he is thirsting after knowledge. No sacrifice is too great, no struggle too hopeless for him. He moves onward discovering secret after secret of nature, searching out the secrets from her innermost heart, and what for? What is it all for? Why should we give him glory? Why should he acquire fame? Does not nature do infinitely more than any human being can do--and nature is dull, insentient. Why should it be glory to imitate the dull, the insentient? Nature can hurl a thunderbolt of any magnitude to any distance. If a man can do one small part as much, we praise him and laud him to the skies. Why? Why should we praise him for imitating nature, imitating death, imitating dullness, imitating insentience? The force of gravitation can pull to pieces the biggest mass that ever existed; yet it is insentient. What glory is there in imitating the insentient? Yet we are all struggling after that. And this is Maya.

The senses drag the human soul out. Man is seeking for pleasure and for happiness where it can never be found. For countless ages we are all taught that this is futile and vain, there is no happiness here. But we cannot learn; it is impossible for us to do so, except through our own experiences. We try them, and a blow comes. Do we learn then? Not even then. Like moths hurling themselves against the flame, we are hurling ourselves again and again into sense-pleasures, hoping to find satisfaction there. We return again and again with freshened energy; thus we go on, till crippled and cheated we die. And this is Maya.

So with our intellect. In our desire to solve the mysteries of the universe, we cannot stop our questioning, we feel we must know and cannot believe that no knowledge is to be gained. A few steps, and there arises the wall of beginningless and endless time which we cannot surmount. A few steps, and there appears of wall of boundless space which cannot be surmounted, and the whole is

1 irrevocably bound in by the walls of cause and effect. We cannot go 2 beyond them. Yet we struggle, and still have to struggle. And this is 3 Maya.

4 With every breath, with every pulsation of the heart, with 5 every one of our movements, we think we are free, and with very 6 same moment we are shown that we are not. Bound slaves, nature's 7 bond-slaves, in body, in mind, in all our thoughts, in all our feelings.
8 And this is Maya.

9 There was never a mother who did not think her child was a 10 born genius, the most extraordinary child that was ever born; she 11 dotes upon her child. The child grows up, perhaps becomes a 12 drunkard, a brute, ill-treats the mother, and the more he ill-treats 13 her, the more her love increases. The world lauds it as the unselfish 14 love of the mother, little dreaming that the mother is a born slave, 15 she cannot help it. She would a thousand times rather throw off the 16 burden, but she cannot. So she covers it with a mass of flowers, 17 which she calls wonderful love. And this is Maya.

18 We are all like this in the world. A legend tells how once 19 Narada said to Krishna, "Lord, show me Maya." A few days passed 20 away, and Krishna asked Narada to make a trip with him towards a 21 desert, and after walking for several miles, Krishna said, "Narada, I 22 am thirsty; can you fetch some water for me?" "I will go at once, sir, 23 and get you water." So Narada went. At a little distance there was a 24 village; he entered the village in search of water and knocked at a 25 door, which was opened by a most beautiful young girl. At the sight 26 of her he immediately forgot that his Master was waiting for water, 27 perhaps dying for the want of it. He forgot everything and began to 28 talk with the girl. All that day, he was again at the house, talking to 29 the girl. That talk ripened into love; he asked the father for the 30 daughter, and they were married and lived there and had children.
31 Thus twelve years passed. His father-in-law died, he inherited his 32 property. He lived, as he seemed to think, a very happy life with his 33 wife and children, his fields and his cattle, and so forth. Then came 34 a flood. One night the river rose until it overflowed its banks and 35 flooded the whole village. Houses fell, men and animals were swept 36 away and drowned, and everything was floating in the rush of the 37 stream. Narada had to escape. With one hand he held his wife, and 38 with other two of his children; another child was on his shoulders, 39 and he was trying to ford this tremendous flood. After a few steps 40 he found the current was too strong, and the child on his shoulders 41 fell and was borne away. A cry of despair came from Narada. In 42 trying to save that child, he lost his grasp upon one of the others, 43 and it also was lost. At last his wife, whom he clasped with all his 44 might, was torn away by the current, and he was thrown on the 45 bank, weeping and wailing in bitter lamentation. Behind him there 46 came a gentle voice, "My child, where is the water? You went to 47 fetch a pitcher of water, and I am waiting for you; you have been 48 gone for quite half an hour." "Half an hour!" Narada exclaimed.
49 Twelve whole years had passed through his mind, and all these 50 scenes had happened in half an hour! And this is Maya.

51 In one form or another, we are all in it. It is a most difficult 52 and intricate state of things to understand. It has been preached in 1 every country, taught everywhere, but only believed by a few,

2 because until we get the experiences ourselves we cannot believe 3 in it. What does it show? Something very terrible. For it is all futile.
4 Time, the avenger of everything, comes, and nothing is left. He 5 swallows up the saint and the sinner, the king and the peasant, the 6 beautiful and the ugly; he leaves nothing. Everything is rushing 7 towards that one goal, destruction. Our knowledge, our arts, our 8 sciences, everything is rushing towards it. None can stem the tide, 9 none can hold it back for a minute. We may try to forget it, in the 10 same way that persons in a plague-stricken city try to create 11 oblivion by drinking, dancing, and other vain attempts, and so 12 becoming paralysed. So we are trying to forget, trying to create 13 oblivion by all sort of sense-pleasures. And this is Maya.

14 Two ways have been proposed. One method, which everyone 15 knows, is very common, and that is: "It may be very true, but do not 16 think of it. 'Make hay while the sun shines,' as the proverb says. It 17 is all true, it is a fact, but do not mind it. Seize the few pleasures 18 you can, do not look at the dark side of the picture, but always 19 towards the hopeful, the positive side." There is some truth in this, 20 but there is also a danger. The truth is that it is a good motive 21 power. Hope and a positive ideal are very good motive powers for 22 our lives, but there is a certain danger in them. The danger lies in 23 our giving up the struggle in despair. Such is the case with those 24 who preach, "Take the world as it is; sit down as calmly and 25 comfortably as you can and be contented with all those miseries.
26 When you receive blows, say they are not blows but flowers; and 27 when you are driven about like slaves, say that you are free. Day 28 and night tell lies to others and to your own souls, because that is 29 the only way to live happily." This is what is called practical wisdom, 30 and never was it more prevalent in the world than in this 31 nineteenth century; because never were harder blows hit than at 32 the present time, never was competition keener, never were men so 33 cruel to their fellow-men as now; and, therefore, must this 34 consolation be offered. It is put forward in the strongest way at the 35 present time; but it fails, as it always must fail. We cannot hide a 36 carrion with roses; it is impossible. It would not avail long; for soon 37 the roses would fade, and the carrion would be worse than ever 38 before. So with our lives. We may try to cover our old and festering 39 sores with cloths of gold, but there comes a day when the cloth of 40 gold is removed, and the sore in all its ugliness is revealed.

41 Is there no hope then? True it is that we are all slaves of 42 Maya, born in Maya, and live in Maya. Is there then no way out, no 43 hope? That we are all miserable, that this world is really a prison, 44 that even our so-called trailing beauty is but a prison-house, and 45 that even our intellects and minds are prison-houses, have been 46 known for ages upon ages. There has never been a man, there has 47 never been a human soul, who has not felt this sometime or other, 48 however he may talk. And the old people feel it most, because in 49 them is the accumulated experience of a whole life, because they 50 cannot be easily cheated by the lies of nature. Is there no way out?
51 We find that with all this, with this terrible fact before us, in the 52 midst of sorrow and suffering, even in this world where life and

1 death are synonymous, even here, there is a still small voice that is 2 ringing through all ages, through every country, and in every heart:
3 "This My Maya is divine, made up of qualities, and very difficult to 4 cross. Yet those that come unto Me, cross the river of life." "Come 5 unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you 6 rest." This is the voice that is leading us forward. Man has heard it, 7 and is hearing it all through the ages. This voice comes to men 8 when everything seems to be lost and hope has fled, when man's 9 dependence on his own strength has been crushed down, and 10 everything seems to melt away between his fingers, and life is a 11 hopeless ruin. Then he hears it. This is called religion.

12 On the one side, therefore, is the bold assertion that this is all 13 nonsense, that this is Maya, but along with it, there is the most 14 hopeful assertion that beyond Maya, there is a way out. On the 15 other hand, practical men tell us, "Don't bother your heads about 16 such nonsense as religion and metaphysics. Live here; this is a very 17 bad world indeed, but make the best of it." Which put in plain 18 language means, live a hypocritical, lying life, a life of continuous 19 fraud, covering all the sores in the best way you can. Go on putting 20 patch after patch, until everything is lost, and you are a mass of 21 patchwork. This is what is called practical life. Those that are 22 satisfied with this patchwork will never come to religion. Religion 23 begins with a tremendous dissatisfaction with the present state of 24 things, with our lives, and a hatred, an intense hatred, for this 25 patching up of life, an unbounded disgust for fraud and lies. He 26 alone can be religious who dares say, as the mighty Buddha once 27 said under the Bo-tree, when this idea of practicality appeared 28 before him and he saw that it was nonsense, and yet could not find 29 a way out. When the temptation came to him to give up his search 30 after truth, to go back to the world and live the old life of fraud, 31 calling things by wrong names, telling lies to oneself and to 32 everybody, he, the giant, conquered it and said, "Death is better 33 than a vegetating ignorant life; it is better to die on the battle-field 34 than to live a life of defeat." This is the basis of religion. When a 35 man takes this stand, he is on the way to find the truth, he is on the 36 way to God. That determination must be the first impulse towards 37 becoming religious. I will hew out a way for myself. I will know the 38 truth or give up my life in the attempt. For on this side it is nothing, 39 it is gone, it is vanishing every day. The beautiful, hopeful, young 40 person of today is the veteran of tomorrow. Hopes and joys and 41 pleasures will die like blossoms with tomorrow's frost. That is one 42 side; on the other, there are the great charms of conquest, victories 43 over all the ills of life, victory over life itself, the conquest of the 44 universe. On that side men can stand. Those who dare, therefore, to 45 struggle for victory, for truth, for religion, are in the right way; and 46 that is what the Vedas preach: Be not in despair; the way is very 47 difficult, like walking on the edge of a razor; yet despair not, arise, 48 awake, and find the ideal, the goal.

49 Now all these various manifestations of religion, in whatever 50 shape and form they have come to mankind, have this one common 51 central basis. It is the preaching of freedom, the way out of the 52 world. They never came to reconcile the world and religion, but to 1 cut the Gordian knot, to establish religion in its own ideal, and not 2 to compromise with the world. That is what every religion preaches, 3 and the duty of the Vedanta is to harmonise all these aspirations, to 4 make manifest the common ground between all the religions of the 5 world, the highest as well as the lowest. What we call the most 6 arrant superstition and the highest philosophy really have a 7 common aim in that they both try to show the way out of the same 8 difficulty, and in most cases this way is through the help of someone 9 who is not himself bound by the laws of nature, in one word, 10 someone who is free. In spite of all the difficulties and differences 11 of opinion about the nature of the one free agent, whether he is a 12 Personal God, or a sentient being like man, whether masculine, 13 feminine, or neuter--and the discussions have been endless--the 14 fundamental idea is the same. In spite of the almost hopeless 15 contradictions of the different systems, we find the golden thread of 16 unity running through them all, and in this philosophy, this golden 17 thread has been traced, revealed little by little to our view, and the 18 first step to this revelation is the common ground that all are 19 advancing towards freedom.

20 One curious fact present in the midst of all our joys and 21 sorrows, difficulties and struggles, is that we are surely journeying 22 towards freedom. The question was practically this: "What is this 23 universe? From what does it arise? Into what does it go?" And the 24 answer was: "In freedom it rises, in freedom it rests, and into 25 freedom it melts away." This idea of freedom you cannot relinquish.
26 Your actions, your very lives will be lost without it. Every moment 27 nature is proving us to be slaves and not free. Yet, simultaneously 28 rises the other idea, that still we are free. At every step we are 29 knocked down, as it were, by Maya, and shown that we are bound; 30 and yet at the same moment, together with this blow, together with 31 this feeling that we are bound, comes the other feeling that we are 32 free. Some inner voice tells us that we are free. But if we attempt to 33 realise that freedom, to make it manifest, we find the difficulties 34 almost insuperable. Yet, in spite of that it insists on asserting itself 35 inwardly, "I am free, I am free." And if you study all the various 36 religions of the world you will find this idea expressed. Not only 37 religion--you must not take this word in its narrow sense--but the 38 whole life of society is the assertion of that one principle of 39 freedom. All movements are the assertion of that one freedom. That 40 voice has been heard by everyone, whether he knows it or not, that 41 voice which declares, "Come unto Me all ye that labour and are 42 heavy laden." It may not be in the same language or the same form 43 of speech, but in some form or other, that voice calling for freedom 44 has been with us. Yes, we are born here on account of that voice; 45 every one of our movements is for that. We are all rushing towards 46 freedom, we are all following that voice, whether we know it or not; 47 as the children of the village were attracted by the music of the 48 flute-player, so we are all following the music of the voice without 49 knowing it.

50 We are ethical when we follow that voice. Not only the human 51 soul, but all creatures from the lowest to the highest have heard the 52 voice and are rushing towards it; and in the struggle are either

1 combining with each other or pushing each other out of the way.
2 Thus come competition, joys, struggles, life, pleasure, and death, 3 and the whole universe is nothing but the result of this mad
4 struggle to reach the voice. This is the manifestation of nature.

5 What happens then? The scene begins to shift. As soon as you 6 know the voice and understand what it is, the whole scene changes.
7 The same world which was the ghastly battle-field of Maya is now
8 changed into something good and beautiful. We no longer curse 9 nature nor say that the world is horrible and that it is all vain; we 10 need no longer weep and wail. As soon as we understand the voice, 11 we see the reason why this struggle should be here, this fight, this 12 competition, this difficulty, this cruelty, these little pleasures and 13 joys; we see that they are in the nature of things, because without 14 them there would be no going towards the voice, to attain which we 15 are destined, whether we know it or not. All human life, all nature, 16 therefore, is struggling to attain to freedom. The sun is moving 17 towards the goal, so is the earth in circling round the sun, so is the 18 moon encircling round the earth. To that goal the planet is moving, 19 and the air is blowing. Everything is struggling towards that. The 20 saint is going towards that voice--he cannot help it, it is no glory to 21 him. So is the sinner. The charitable man is going straight towards 22 that voice, and cannot be hindered; the miser is also going towards 23 the same destination; the greatest worker of good hears the same 24 voice within, and he cannot resist it, he must go towards the voice; 25 so with the most arrant idler. One stumbles more than another, and 26 him who stumbles more we call bad, him who stumbles less we call 27 good. Good and bad are never two different things, they are one 28 and the same; the different is not one of kind, but of degree.

29 Now, if the manifestation of this power of freedom is really 30 governing the whole universe--applying that to religion, our special 31 study--we find this idea has been the one assertion throughout.
32 Take the lowest form of religion where there is worship of departed 33 ancestors or certain powerful and cruel gods; what is the prominent 34 idea about the gods or departed ancestors? That they are superior 35 to nature, not bound by its restrictions. The worshipper has, no 36 doubt, very limited ideas of nature. He himself cannot pass through 37 a wall, nor fly up into the skies, but the gods whom he worships can 38 do these things. What is meant by that, philosophically? That the 39 assertion of freedom is there, that the gods whom he worships are 40 superior to nature as he knows it. So with those who worship still 41 higher beings. As the idea of nature expands, the idea of the soul 42 which is superior to nature also expands, until we come to what we 43 call monotheism, which holds that there is Maya (nature), and that 44 there is some Being who is the Ruler of this Maya.

45 Here Vedanta begins, where these monotheistic ideas first 46 appear. But the Vedanta philosophy wants further explanation. This 47 explanation--that there is a Being beyond all these manifestations of 48 Maya, who is superior to and independent of Maya, and who is 49 attracting us towards Himself, and that we are all going towards 50 Him--is very good, says the Vedanta, but yet the perception is not 51 clear, the vision is dim and hazy, although it does not directly 52 contradict reason. Just as in your hymn it is said, "Nearer my God to 1 Thee," the same hymn would be very good to the Vedantin, only he 2 would change a word, and make it, "Nearer my God to me." The 3 idea that the goal is far off, far beyond nature, attracting us all 4 towards it, has to be brought nearer and nearer, without degrading 5 or degenerating it. The God of heaven becomes the God in nature, 6 and the God in nature becomes the God who is nature, and the God 7 who is nature becomes the God within this temple of the body, and 8 the God dwelling in the temple of the body at last becomes the 9 temple itself, becomes the soul and man--and there it reaches the 10 last words it can teach. He whom the sages have been seeking in all 11 these places is in our own hearts; the voice that you heard was 12 right, says the Vedanta, but the direction you gave to the voice was 13 wrong. That ideal of freedom that you perceived was correct, but 14 you projected it outside yourself, and that was your mistake. Bring 15 it nearer and nearer, until you find that it was all the time within 16 you, it was the Self of your own self. That freedom was your own 17 nature, and this Maya never bound you. Nature never has power 18 over you. Like a frightened child you were dreaming that it was 19 throttling you, and the release from this fear is the goal: not only to 20 see it intellectually, but to perceive it, actualise it, much more 21 definitely than we perceive this world. Then we shall know that we 22 are free. Then, and then alone, will all difficulties vanish, then will 23 all the perplexities of heart be smoothed away, all crookedness 24 made straight, then will vanish the delusion of manifoldness and 25 nature; and Maya, instead of being a horrible, hopeless dream, as it 26 is now, will become beautiful, and this earth, instead of being a 27 prison-house, will become our playground; and even dangers and 28 difficulties, even all sufferings, will become deified and show us 29 their real nature, will show us that behind everything, as the 30 substance of everything, He is standing, and that He is the one real 31 Self.

THE ABSOLUTE AND MANIFESTATION

(Delivered in London, 1896)

The one question that is most difficult to grasp in understanding the Advaita philosophy, and the one question that will be asked again and again and that will always remain is: How has the Infinite, the Absolute, become the finite? I will now take up this question, and, in order to illustrate it, I will use a figure. {chart} Here is the Absolute (a), and this is the universe (b). The Absolute has become the universe. By this is not only meant the material world, but the mental world, the spiritual world--heavens and earths, and in fact, everything that exists. Mind is the name of a change, and body the name of another change, and so on, and all these changes compose our universe. This Absolute (a) has become the universe (b) by coming through time, space, and causation (c). This is the central idea of Advaita. Time, space, and causation are like the glass through which the Absolute is seen, and when It is seen on the lower side, It appears as the universe. Now we at once gather from this that in the Absolute there is neither time, space, nor causation. The idea of time cannot be there, seeing that there is no mind, no thought. The idea of space cannot be there, seeing that there is no external change. What you call motion and causation cannot exist where there is only One. We have to understand this, and impress it on our minds, that what we call causation begins after, if we may be permitted to say so, the degeneration of the Absolute into the phenomenal, and not before; that our will, our desire, and all these things always come after that. I think Schopenhauer's philosophy makes a mistake in its interpretation of Vedanta, for it seeks to make the will everything. Schopenhauer makes the will stand in the place of the Absolute. But the absolute cannot be presented as will, for will is something changeable and phenomenal, and over the line, drawn above time, space, and causation, there is no change, no motion; it is only below the line that external motion and internal motion, called thought, begin. There can be no will on the other side, and will therefore, cannot be the cause of this universe. Coming nearer, we see in our own bodies that will is not the cause of every movement. I move this chair; my will is the cause of this movement, and this will becomes manifested as muscular motion at the other end. But the same power that moves the chair is moving the heart, the lungs, and so on, but not through will. Given that the power is the same, it only becomes will when it rises to the plane of consciousness, and to call it will before it has risen to this plane is a misnomer. This makes a good deal of confusion in Schopenhauer's philosophy.

A stone falls and we ask, why? This question is possible only on the supposition that nothing happens without a cause. I request you to make this very clear in your minds, for whenever we ask why anything happens, we are taking for granted that everything that happens must have a why, that is to say, it must have been preceded by something else which acted as the cause. This precedence and succession are what we call the law of causation. It means that

1 everything in the universe is by turn a cause and an effect. It is the 2 cause of certain things which come after it, and is itself the effect of 3 something else which has preceded it. This is called the law of 4 causation and is a necessary condition of all our thinking. We 5 believe that every particle in the universe, whatever it be, is in 6 relation to every other particle. There has been much discussion as 7 to how this idea arose. In Europe, there have been intuitive 8 philosophers who believed that it was constitutional in humanity, 9 others have believed it came from experience, but the question has 10 never been settled. We shall see later on what the Vedanta has to 11 say about it. But first we have to understand this that the very 12 asking of the question "why" presupposes that everything round us 13 has been preceded by certain things and will be succeeded by 14 certain other things. The other belief involved in this question is 15 that nothing in the universe is independent, that everything is acted 16 upon by something outside itself. Interdependence is the law of the 17 whole universe. In asking what caused the Absolute, what an error 18 we are making! To ask this question we have to suppose that the 19 Absolute also is bound by something, that It is dependent on 20 something; and in making this supposition, we drag the Absolute 21 down to the level of the universe. For in the Absolute there is 22 neither time, space, nor causation; It is all one. That which exists by 23 itself alone cannot have any cause. That which is free cannot have 24 any cause; else it would not be free, but bound. That which has 25 relativity cannot be free. Thus we see the very question, why the 26 Infinite became the finite, is an impossible one, for it is self-27 contradictory. Coming from subtleties to the logic of our common 28 plane, to common sense, we can see this from another side, when 29 we seek to know how the Absolute has become the relative.
30 Supposing we knew the answer, would the Absolute remain the 31 Absolute? It would have become relative. What is meant by the 32 knowledge in our common-sense idea? It is only something that has 33 become limited by our mind, that we know, and when it is beyond 34 our mind, it is not knowledge. Now if the Absolute becomes limited 35 by the mind, It is no more Absolute; It has become finite. Everything 36 limited by the mind becomes finite. Therefore, to know the Absolute 37 is again a contradiction in terms. That is why this question has 38 never been answered, because if it were answered, there would no 39 more be an Absolute. A God known is no more God; He has become 40 finite like one of us. He cannot be known, He is always the 41 Unknowable One.

42 But what Advaita says is that God is more than knowable.
43 This is a great fact to learn. You must not go home with the idea 44 that God is unknowable in the sense in which agnostics put it. For 45 instance, here is a chair, it is known to us. But what is beyond ether 46 or whether people exist there or not is possibly unknowable. But 47 God is neither known nor unknowable in this sense. He is 48 something still higher than known; that is what is meant by God 49 being unknown and unknowable. The expression is not used in the 50 sense in which it may be said that some questions are unknown and 51 unknowable. God is more than known. This chair is known, but God 52 is intensely more than that, because in and through Him we have to 53 know this chair itself. He is the Witness, the eternal Witness of all

1 knowledge. Whatever we know we have to know in and through 2 Him. He is the Essence of our own Self. He is the Essence of this 3 ego, this I and we cannot know anything excepting in and through 4 that I. Therefore you have to know everything in and through the 5 Brahman. To know the chair you have to know it in and through 6 God. Thus God is infinitely nearer to us than the chair, but yet He is 7 infinitely higher. Neither known, nor unknown, but something 8 infinitely higher than either. He is your Self. "Who would live a 9 second, who would breathe a second in this universe, if that 10 Blessed One were not filling it?" Because in and through Him we 11 breathe, in and through Him we exist. Not that He is standing 12 somewhere and making my blood circulate. What is meant is that 13 He is the Essence of all this, the Soul of my soul. You cannot by any 14 possibility say you know Him; it would be degrading Him. You 15 cannot get out of yourself, so you cannot know Him. Knowledge is 16 objectification. For instance, in memory you are objectifying many 17 things, projecting them out of yourself. All memory, all the things 18 which I have seen and which I know are in my mind. The pictures, 19 the impressions of all these things, are in my mind, and when I 20 would try to think of them, to know them, the first act of knowledge 21 would be to project them outside. This cannot be done with God, 22 because He is the Essence of our souls; we cannot project Him 23 outside ourselves. Here is one of the profoundest passages in 24 Vedanta: "He that is the Essence of your soul, He is the Truth, He is 25 the Self, thou art That, O Shvetaketu." This is what is meant by 26 "Thou art God." You cannot describe Him by any other language. All 27 attempts of language, calling Him father, or brother, or our dearest 28 friend, are attempts to objectify God, which cannot be done. He is 29 the Eternal Subject of everything. I am the subject of this chair; I 30 see the chair; so God is the Eternal Subject of my soul. How can you 31 objectify Him, the Essence of your souls, the Reality of everything?
32 Thus, I would repeat to you once more, God is neither knowable nor 33 unknowable, but something infinitely higher than either. He is one 34 with us; and that which is one with us is neither knowable nor 35 unknowable, as our own self. You cannot know your own self; you 36 cannot move it out and make it an object to look at, because you are 37 that and cannot separate yourself from it. Neither is it unknowable, 38 for what is better known than yourself? It is really the centre of our 39 knowledge. In exactly the same sense, God is neither unknowable 40 nor known, but infinitely higher than both; for He is our real Self.

41 First, we see then that the question, "What caused the 42 Absolute?" is a contradiction in terms; and secondly, we find that 43 the idea of God in the Advaita is this Oneness; and, therefore, we 44 cannot objectify Him, for we are always living and moving in Him, 45 whether we know it or not. Whatever we do is always through Him.
46 Now the question is: What are time, space, and causation? Advaita 47 means non-duality; there are not two, but one. Yet we see that here 48 is a proposition that the Absolute is manifesting Itself as many, 49 through the veil of time, space, and causation. Therefore it seems 50 that here are two, the Absolute and Maya (the sum total of time, 51 space, and causation). It seems apparently very convincing that 52 there are two. To this the Advaitist replies that it cannot be called 53 two. To have two, we must have two absolute independent

1 existences which cannot be caused. In the first place, time, space, 2 and causation cannot be said to be independent existences. Time is 3 entirely a dependent existence; it changes with every change of our 4 mind. Sometimes in dream one imagines that one has lived several 5 years; at other times several months were passed as one second.
6 So, time is entirely dependent on our state of mind. Secondly, the 7 idea of time vanishes altogether, sometimes. So with space. We 8 cannot know what space is. Yet it is there, indefinable, and cannot 9 exist separate from anything else. So with causation.

10 The one peculiar attribute we find in time, space, and 11 causation is that they cannot exist separate from other things. Try 12 to think of space without colour, or limits, or any connection with 13 the things around-just abstract space. You cannot; you have to 14 think of it as the space between two limits or between three 15 objects. It has to be connected with some object to have any 16 existence. So with time; you cannot have any idea of abstract time, 17 but you have to take two events, one preceding and the other 18 succeeding, and join the two events by the idea of succession. Time 19 depends on two events, just as space has to be related to outside 20 objects. And the idea of causation is inseparable from time and 21 space. This is the peculiar thing about them having no independent 22 existence. They have not even the existence which the chair or the 23 wall has. They are as shadows around everything which you cannot 24 catch. They have no real existence; yet they are not non-existent, 25 seeing that through them all things are manifesting as this 26 universe. Thus we see, first, that the combination of time, space, 27 and causation has neither existence nor non-existence. Secondly, it 28 sometimes vanishes. To give an illustration, there is a wave on the 29 ocean. The wave is the same as the ocean certainly, and yet we 30 know it is a wave, and as such different from the ocean. What 31 makes this difference? The name and the form; that is, the idea in 32 the mind and the form. Now, can we think of a wave-form as 33 something separate from the ocean? Certainly not. It is always 34 associated with the ocean idea. If the wave subsides, the form 35 vanishes in a moment, and yet the form was not a delusion. So long 36 as the wave existed the form was there, and you were bound to see 37 the form. This is Maya.

38 The whole of the universe, therefore, is, as it were, a peculiar 39 form; the Absolute is that ocean while you and I, the suns and the 40 stars, and everything else are various waves of that ocean. And 41 what makes the waves different? Only the form, and that form is 42 time, space, and causation, all entirely dependent on the wave. As 43 soon as the individual gives up this Maya, it vanishes for him and he 44 becomes free. The whole struggle is to get rid of this clinging on to 45 time, space, and causation, which are always obstacles in our way.
46 What is the theory of evolution? What are the two factors? A 47 tremendous potential power which is trying to express itself, and 48 circumstances which are holding it down, the environments not 49 allowing it to express itself. So, in order to fight with these 50 environments, the power is taking new bodies again and again. An 51 amoeba, in the struggle, gets another body and conquers some 52 obstacles, then gets another body and so on, until it becomes man.

1 Now, if you carry this idea to its logical conclusion, there must come 2 a time when that power that was in the amoeba and which evolved 3 as man will have conquered all the obstructions that nature can 4 bring before it and will thus escape from all its environments. This 5 idea expressed in metaphysics will take this form; there are two 6 components in every action, the one the subject, the other the 7 object, and the one aim of life is to make the subject master of the 8 object. For instance, I feel unhappy because a man scolds me. My 9 struggle will be to make myself strong enough to conquer the 10 environment, so that he may scold and I shall not feel. That is how 11 we are all trying to conquer. What is meant by morality? Making the 12 subject strong by attuning it to the Absolute, so that finite nature 13 ceases to have control over us. It is a logical conclusion of our 14 philosophy that there must come a time when we shall have 15 conquered all the environments, because nature is finite.

16 Here is another thing to learn. How do you know that nature 17 is finite? You can only know this through metaphysics. Nature is 18 that Infinite under limitations. Therefore it is finite. So, there must 19 come a time when we shall have conquered all environments. And 20 how are we to conquer them? We cannot possible conquer all the 21 objective environments. We cannot. The little fish wants to fly from 22 its enemies in the water. How does it do so? By evolving wings and 23 becoming a bird. The fish did not change the water or the air; the 24 change was in itself. Change is always subjective. All through 25 evolution you find that the conquest of nature comes by change in 26 the subject. Apply this to religion and morality, and you will find 27 that the conquest of evil comes by the change in the subjective 28 alone. That is how the Advaita system gets its whole force, on the 29 subjective side of man. To talk of evil and misery is nonsense, 30 because they do not exist outside. If I am immune against all anger, 31 I never feel angry. If I am proof against all hatred, I never feel 32 hatred.

33 This is, therefore, the process by which to achieve that 34 conquest--through the subjective, by perfecting the subjective. I 35 may make bold to say that the only religion which agrees with, and 36 even goes a little further than modern researches, both on physical 37 and moral lines is the Advaita, and that is why it appeals to modern 38 scientists so much. They find that the old dualistic theories are not 39 enough for them, do not satisfy their necessities. A man must have 40 not only faith, but intellectual faith too. Now, in this later part of the 41 nineteenth century, such an idea as that religion coming from any 42 other source than one's own hereditary religion must be false 43 shows that there is still weakness left, and such ideas must be given 44 up. I do not mean that such is the case in this country alone, it is in 45 every country, and nowhere more than in my own. This Advaita was 46 never allowed to come to the people. At first some monks got hold 47 of it and took it to the forests, and so it came to be called the 48 "Forest Philosophy". By the mercy of the Lord, the Buddha came 49 and preached it to the masses, and the whole nation became 50 Buddhists. Long after that, when atheists and agnostics had 51 destroyed the nation again, it was found out that Advaita was the 52 only way to save India from materialism.

1 Thus has Advaita twice saved India from materialism. Before
2 the Buddha came, materialism had spread to a fearful extent, and it
3 was of a most hideous kind, not like that of the present day, but of a 4 far worse nature. I am a materialist in a certain sense, because I 5 believe that there is only One. That is what the materialist wants 6 you to believe; only he calls it matter and I call it God. The 7 materialists admit that out of this matter all hope, and religion, and 8 everything have come. I say, all these have come out of Brahman.
9 But the materialism that prevailed before Buddha was that crude 10 sort of materialism which taught, "Eat, drink, and be merry; there is 11 no God, soul, or heaven; religion is a concoction of wicked priests."
12 It taught the morality that so long as you live, you must try to live 13 happily; eat, though you have to borrow money for the food, and 14 never mind about repaying it. That was the old materialism, and 15 that kind of philosophy spread so much that even today it has got 16 the name of "popular philosophy". Buddha brought the Vedanta to 17 light, gave it to the people, and saved India. A thousand years after 18 his death a similar state of things again prevailed. The mobs, the 19 masses, and various races, had been converted to Buddhism;
20 naturally the teachings of the Buddha became in time degenerated, 21 because most of the people were very ignorant. Buddhist taught no 22 God, no Ruler of the universe, so gradually the masses brought 23 their gods, and devils, and hobgoblins out again, and a tremendous 24 hotchpotch was made of Buddhism in India. Again materialism 25 came to the fore, taking the form of licence with the higher classes 26 and superstition with the lower. Then Shankaracharya arose and 27 once more revived the Vedanta philosophy. He made it a 28 rationalistic philosophy. In the Upanishads the arguments are often 29 very obscure. By Buddha the moral side of the philosophy was laid 30 stress upon, and by Shankaracharya, the intellectual side. He 31 worked out, rationalised, and placed before men the wonderful 32 coherent system of Advaita.

33 Materialism prevails in Europe today. You may pray for the 34 salvation of the modern skeptics, but they do not yield, they want 35 reason. The salvation of Europe depends on a rationalistic religion, 36 and Advaita--the non-duality, the Oneness, the idea of the 37 Impersonal God--is the only religion that can have any hold on any 38 intellectual people. It comes whenever religion seems to disappear 39 and irreligion seems to prevail, and that is why it has taken ground 40 in Europe and America.

41 I would say one thing more in connection with this philosophy.
42 In the old Upanishads we find sublime poetry; their authors were 43 poets. Plato says, inspiration comes to people through poetry, and it 44 seems as if these ancient Rishis, seers of Truth, were raised above 45 humanity to show these truths through poetry. They never 46 preached, nor philosophised, nor wrote. Music came out of their 47 hearts. In Buddha we had the great, universal heart and universal 48 patience, making religion practical and bringing it to everyone's 49 door. In Shankaracharya we saw tremendous intellectual power, 50 throwing the scorching light of reason upon everything. We want 51 today that bright sun of intellectuality joined with the heart of 52 Buddha, the wonderful infinite heart of love and mercy. This union

1 will give us the highest philosophy. Science and religion will meet
2 and shake hands. Poetry and philosophy will become friends. This 3 will be the religion of the future, and if we can work it out, we may 4 be sure that it will be for all times and peoples. This is the one way 5 that will prove acceptable to modern science, for it has almost come 6 to it. When the scientific teacher asserts that all things are the 7 manifestation of one force, does it not remind you of the God of 8 whom you hear in the Upanishads: "As the one fire entering into the 9 universe expresses Itself in various forms, even so that One Soul is 10 expressing Itself in every soul and yet is infinitely more besides?"
11 Do you not see whither science is tending? The Hindu nation 12 proceeded through the study of the mind, through metaphysics and 13 logic. The European nations start from external nature, and now 14 they too are coming to the same results. We find that searching 15 through the mind we at last come to that Oneness, that Universal 16 One, the Internal Soul of everything, the Essence and Reality of 17 everything, the Ever-Free, the Ever-blissful, the Ever-Existing.
18 Through material science we come to the same Oneness. Science 19 today is telling us that all things are but the manifestation of one 20 energy which is the sum total of everything which exists, and the 21 trend of humanity is towards freedom and not towards bondage.
22 Why should men be moral? Because through morality is the path 23 towards freedom, and immorality leads to bondage.

24 Another peculiarity of the Advaita system is that from its very 25 start it is non-destructive. This is another glory, the boldness to 26 preach, "Do not disturb the faith of any, even of those who through 27 ignorance have attached themselves to lower forms of worship."
28 That is what it says, do not disturb, but help everyone to get higher 29 and higher; include all humanity. This philosophy preaches a God 30 who is a sum total. If you seek a universal religion which can apply 31 to everyone, that religion must not be composed of only the parts, 32 but it must always be their sum total and include all degrees of 33 religious development.

34 This idea is not clearly found in any other religious system.
35 They are all parts equally struggling to attain to the whole. The 36 existence of the part is only for this. So, from the very first, Advaita 37 had no antagonism with the various sects existing in India. There 38 are dualists existing today, and their number is by far the largest in 39 India, because dualism naturally appeals to less educated minds. It 40 is a very convenient, natural, common-sense explanation of the 41 universe. But with these dualists, Advaita has no quarrel. The one 42 thinks that God is outside the universe, somewhere in heaven, and 43 the other, that He is his own Soul, and that it will be a blasphemy to 44 call Him anything more distant. Any idea of separation would be 45 terrible. He is the nearest of the near. There is no word in any 46 language to express the nearness except the word Oneness. With 47 any other idea the Advaitist is not satisfied just as the dualist is 48 shocked with the concept of the Advaita, and thinks it blasphemous.
49 At the same time the Advaitist knows that these other ideas must 50 be, and so has no quarrel with the dualist who is on the right road.
51 From his standpoint, the dualist will have to see many.

52 It is a constitutional necessity of his standpoint. Let him have

1 it. The Advaitist knows that whatever may be his theories, he is 2 going to the same goal as he himself. There he differs entirely from 3 the dualist who is forced by his point of view to believe that all 4 differing views are wrong. The dualists all the world over naturally 5 believe in a Personal God who is purely anthropomorphic, who like 6 a great potentate in this world is pleased with some and displeased 7 with others. He is arbitrarily pleased with some peoples or races 8 and showers blessing upon them. Naturally the dualist comes to the 9 conclusion that God has favourites, and he hopes to be one of them.
10 You will find that in almost every religion is the idea: "We are the 11 favourites of our God, and only by believing as we do, can you be 12 taken into favour with Him." Some dualists are so narrow as to 13 insist that only the few that have been predestined to the favour of 14 God can be saved; the rest may try ever so hard, but they cannot be 15 accepted. I challenge you to show me one dualistic religion which 16 has not more or less of this exclusiveness. And, therefore, in the 17 nature of things, dualistic religions are bound to fight and quarrel 18 with each other, and this they have ever been doing. Again, these 19 dualists win the popular favour by appealing to the vanity of the 20 uneducated. They like to feel that they enjoy exclusive privileges.
21 The dualist thinks you cannot be moral until you have a God with a 22 rod in His hand, ready to punish you. The unthinking masses are 23 generally dualists, and they, poor fellows, have been persecuted for 24 thousands of years in every country; and their idea of salvation is, 25 therefore, freedom from the fear of punishment. I was asked by a 26 clergyman in America, "What! you have no Devil in your religion?
27 How can that be?" But we find that the best and the greatest men 28 that have been born in the world have worked with that high 29 impersonal idea. It is the Man who said, "I and my Father are One", 30 whose power has descended unto millions. For thousands of years it 31 has worked for good. And we know that the same Man, because he 32 was a non-dualist, was merciful to others. To the masses who could 33 not conceive of anything higher than a Personal God, he said, "Pray 34 to your Father in heaven." To others who could grasp a higher idea, 35 he said, "I am the vine, ye are the branches," but to his disciples to 36 whom he revealed himself more fully, he proclaimed the highest 37 truth, "I and my Father are One."

38 It was the great Buddha, who never cared for the dualist 39 gods, and who has been called an atheist and materialist, who yet 40 was ready to give up his body for a poor goat. That Man set in 41 motion the highest moral ideas any nation can have. Whenever 42 there is a moral code, it is a ray of light from that Man. We cannot 43 force the great hearts of the world into narrow limits, and keep 44 them there, especially at this time in the history of humanity when 45 there is a degree of intellectual development such as was never 46 dreamed of even a hundred years ago, when a wave of scientific 47 knowledge has arisen which nobody, even fifty years ago, would 48 have dreamed of. By trying to force people into narrow limits you 49 degrade them into animals and unthinking masses. You kill their 50 moral life. What is now wanted is a combination of the greatest 51 heart with the highest intellectuality, of infinite love with infinite 52 knowledge. The Vedantist gives no other attributes to God except 53 these three--that He is Infinite Existence, Infinite Knowledge, and 1 Infinite Bliss, and he regards these three as One. Existence without 2 knowledge and love cannot be; knowledge without love and love 3 without knowledge cannot be. What we want is the harmony of 4 Existence, Knowledge, and Bliss Infinite. For that is our goal. We 5 want harmony, not one-sided development. And it is possible to 6 have the intellect of a Shankara with the heart of a Buddha. I hope 7 we shall all struggle to attain to that blessed combination.

GOD IN EVERYTHING

(Delivered in London, 27th October 1896)

We have seen how the greater portion of our life must of necessity be filled with evils, however we may resist, and that this mass of evil is practically almost infinite for us. We have been struggling to remedy this since the beginning of time, yet everything remains very much the same. The more we discover remedies, the more we find ourselves beset by subtler evils. We have also seen that all religions propose a God, as the one way of escaping these difficulties. All religions tell us that if you take the world as it is, as the most practical people would advise us to do in this age, then nothing would be left to us but evil. They further assert that there is something beyond this world. This life in the five senses, life in the material world, is not all; it is only a small portion, and merely superficial. Behind and beyond is the Infinite in which there is no more evil. Some people call it God, some Allah, some Jehovah, Jove, and so on. The Vedantin calls It Brahman.

The first impression we get of the advice given by religions is that we had better terminate our existence. To the question how to cure the evils of life, the answer apparently is, to give up life. It reminds one of the old story: A mosquito settled on the head of a man, and a friend, wishing to kill the mosquito, gave it such a blow that he killed both man and mosquito. The remedy of evil seems to suggest a similar course of action. Life is full of ills, the world is full of evils; that is a fact no one who is old enough to know the world can deny.

But what is remedy proposed by all the religions? That this world is nothing. Beyond this world is something which is very real. Here comes the difficulty. The remedy seems to destroy everything. How can that be a remedy? Is there no way out then? The Vedanta says that what all the religions advance is perfectly true, but it should be properly understood. Often it is misunderstood, because the religions are not very clear in their meaning. What we really want is head and heart combined. The heart is great indeed; it is through the heart that come the great inspirations of life. I would a hundred times rather have a little heart and no brain, than be all brains and no heart. Life is possible, progress is possible for him who has heart, but he who has no heart and only brains dies of dryness.

At the same time we know that he who is carried along by his heart alone has to undergo many ills, for now and then he is liable to tumble into pitfalls. The combination of heart and head is what we want. I do not mean that a man should compromise his heart for his brain or vice versa, but let everyone have an infinite amount of heart and feeling, and at the same time an infinite amount of reason. Is there any limit to what we want in this world? Is not the world infinite? There is room for an infinite amount of feeling, and so also for an infinite amount of culture and reason. Let them come together without limit, let them be running together, as it were, in parallel lines each with the other.

1 Most of the religions understand the fact, but the error into 2 which they all seem to fall is the same; they are carried away by the 3 heart, the feelings. There is evil in the world, give up the world;
4 that is the great teaching, and the only teaching, no doubt. Give up 5 the world. There cannot be two opinions that to understand the 6 truth everyone of us has to give up error. There cannot be two 7 opinions that everyone of us in order to have good must give up 8 evil; there cannot be two opinions that everyone of us to have life 9 must give up what is death.

10 And yet, what remains to us, if this theory involves giving up 11 the life of the senses, the life as we know it? And what else do we 12 mean by life? If we give this up, what remains?

13 We shall understand this better, when, later on, we come to 14 the more philosophical portions of the Vedanta. But for the present 15 I beg to state that in Vedanta alone we find a rational solution of the 16 problem. Here I can only lay before you what the Vedanta seeks to 17 teach, and that is the deification of the world. The Vedanta does not 18 in reality denounce the world. The ideal of renunciation nowhere 19 attains such a height as in the teachings of the Vedanta. But, at the 20 same time, dry suicidal advice is not intended; it really means 21 deification of the world--giving up the world as we think of it, as we 22 know it, as it appears to us--and to know what it really is. Deify it; it 23 is God alone. We read at the commencement of one of the oldest of 24 the Upanishads, "Whatever exists in this universe is to be covered 25 with the Lord."

26 We have to cover everything with the Lord Himself, not by a 27 false sort of optimism, not by blinding our eyes to the evil, but by 28 really seeing God in everything. Thus we have to give up the world, 29 and when the world is given up, what remains? God. What is 30 meant? You can have your wife; it does not mean that you are to 31 abandon her, but that you are to see God in the wife. Give up your 32 children; what does that mean? To turn them out of doors, as some 33 human brutes do in every country? Certainly not. That is diabolism; 34 it is not religion. But see God in your children. So, in everything. In 35 life and in death, in happiness and in misery, the Lord is equally 36 present. The whole world is full of the Lord. Open your eyes and 37 see Him. This is what Vedanta teaches. Give up the world which you 38 have conjectured, because your conjecture was based upon a very 39 partial experience, upon very poor reasoning, and upon your own 40 weakness. Give it up; the world we have been thinking of so long, 41 the world to which we have been clinging so long, is a false world of 42 our own creation. Give that up; open your eyes and see that as such 43 it never existed; it was a dream, Maya. What existed was the Lord 44 Himself. It is He who is in the child, in the wife, and in the husband; 45 it is He who is in the good and in the bad; He is in the sin and in the 46 sinner; He is in life and in death.

47 A tremendous assertion indeed! Yet that is the theme which 48 the Vedanta wants to demonstrate, to teach, and to preach. This is 49 just the opening theme.

50 Thus we avoid the dangers of life and its evils. Do not desire 51 anything. What makes us miserable? The cause of all miseries from 1 which we suffer is desire. You desire something and the desire is 2 not fulfilled; the result is distress. If there is no desire, there is no 3 suffering. But here, too, there is the danger of my being 4 misunderstood. So it is necessary to explain what I mean by giving 5 up desire and becoming free from all misery. The walls have no

6 desire and they never suffer. True, but they never evolve. This chair
7 has no desires, it never suffers; but it is always a chair. There is a 8 glory in happiness, there is a glory in suffering. If I may dare to say 9 so, there is a utility in evil too. The great lesson in misery we all 10 know. There are hundreds of things we have done in our lives which 11 we wish we had never done, but which, at the same time, have been 12 great teachers. As for me, I am glad I have done something good 13 and many things bad; glad I have done something right, and glad I 14 have committed many errors, because every one of them has been a 15 great lesson. I, as I am now, am the resultant of all I have done, all I 16 have thought. Every action and thought have had their effect, and 17 these effects are the sum total of my progress.

18 We all understand that desires are wrong, but what is meant 19 by giving up desires? How could life go on? It would be suicidal 20 advice, killing the desire and the man too. The solution is this. Not 21 that you should not have property, not that you should not have 22 things which are necessary and things which are even luxuries.
23 Have all that you want, and more, only know the truth and realise 24 it. Wealth does not belong to anybody. Have no idea of 25 proprietorship, possession. You are nobody, nor am I, nor anyone 26 else. All belongs to the Lord, because the opening verse told us to 27 put the Lord in everything. God is in the wealth that you enjoy. He 28 is in the desire that rises in your mind. He is in the things you buy 29 to satisfy your desire; He is in your beautiful attire, in your 30 beautiful ornaments. This is the line of thought. All will be 31 metamorphosed as soon as you begin to see things in that light. If 32 you put God in your every movement, in your conversation, in your 33 form, in everything, the whole scene changes, and the world, 34 instead of appearing as one of woe and misery, will become a 35 heaven.

36 "The kingdom of heaven is within you," says Jesus; so says the 37 Vedanta, and every great teacher. "He that hath eyes to see, let him 38 see, and he that hath ears to hear, let him hear." The Vedanta 39 proves that the truth for which we have been searching all this time 40 is present, and was all the time with us. In our ignorance, we 41 thought we had lost it, and went about the world crying and 42 weeping, struggling to find the truth, while all along it was dwelling 43 in our own hearts. There alone can we find it.

44 If we understand the giving up of the world in its old, crude 45 sense, then it would come to this: that we must not work, that we 46 must be idle, sitting like lumps of earth, neither thinking nor doing 47 anything, but must become fatalists, driven about by every 48 circumstance, ordered about by the laws of nature, drifting from 49 place to place. That would be the result. But that is not what is 50 meant. We must work. Ordinary mankind, driven everywhere by 51 false desire, what do they know of work? The man propelled by his 52 own feelings and his own senses, what does he know about work?

1 He works, who is not propelled by his own desires, by any 2 selfishness whatsoever. He works, who has no ulterior motive in 3 view. He works, who has nothing to gain from work.

4 Who enjoys the picture, the seller or the seer? The seller is 5 busy with his accounts, computing what his gain will be, how much 6 profit he will realise on the picture. His brain is full of that. He is 7 looking at the hammer, and watching the bids. He is intent on 8 hearing how fast the bids are rising. That man is enjoying the 9 picture who has gone there without any intention of buying or 10 selling. He looks at the picture and enjoys it. So this whole universe 11 is a picture, and when these desires have vanished, men will enjoy 12 the world, and then this buying and selling and these foolish ideas 13 of possession will be ended. The money-lender gone, the buyer 14 gone, the seller gone, this world remains the picture, a beautiful 15 painting. I never read of any more beautiful conception of God than 16 the following: "He is the Great Poet, the Ancient Poet; the whole 17 universe is His poem, coming in verses and rhymes and rhythms, 18 written in infinite bliss." When we have given up desires, then alone 19 shall we be able to read and enjoy this universe of God. Then 20 everything will become deified. Nooks and corners, by-ways and 21 shady places, which we thought dark and unholy, will be all deified.
22 They will all reveal their true nature, and we shall smile at 23 ourselves and think that all this weeping and crying has been but 24 child's play, and we were only standing by, watching.

25 So do your work, says the Vedanta. It first advises us how to 26 work-by giving up the apparent, illusive world. What is meant by 27 that? Seeing God everywhere. Thus do you work. Desire to live a 28 hundred years, have all earthly desires, if you wish, only deify them, 29 convert them into heaven. Have the desire to live a long life of 30 helpfulness, of blissfulness and activity on this earth. Thus working, 31 you will find the way out. There is no other way. If a man plunges 32 headlong into foolish luxuries of the world without knowing the 33 truth, he has missed his footing, he cannot reach the goal. And if a 34 man curses the world, goes into a forest, mortifies his flesh, and 35 kills himself little by little by starvation, makes his heart a barren 36 waste, kills out all feelings, and becomes harsh, stern, and dried-up, 37 that man also has missed the way. These are the two extremes, the 38 two mistakes at either end. Both have lost the way, both have 39 missed the goal.

40 So work, says the Vedanta, putting God in everything, and 41 knowing Him to be in everything. Work incessantly, holding life as 42 something deified, as God Himself, and knowing that this is all we 43 have to do, this is all we should ask for. God is in everything, where 44 else shall we go to find Him? He is already in every work, in every 45 thought, in every feeling. Thus knowing, we must work-this is the 46 only way, there is no other. Thus the effects of work will not bind us.
47 We have seen how false desires are the cause of all the misery and 48 evil we suffer, but when they are thus deified, purified, through 49 God, they bring no evil, they bring no misery. Those who have not 50 learnt this secret will have to live in a demoniacal world until they 51 discover it. Many do not know what an infinite mine of bliss is in 52 them, around them, everywhere; they have not yet discovered it.

1 What is a demoniacal world? The Vedanta says, ignorance.

2 We are dying of thirst sitting on the banks of the mightiest 3 river. We are dying of hunger sitting near heaps of food. Here is the 4 blissful universe, yet we do not find it. We are in it all the time, and 5 we are always mistaking it. Religion proposes to find this out for us.

6 The longing for this blissful universe is in all hearts. It has 7 been the search of all nations, it is the one goal of religion, and this 8 ideal is expressed in various languages in different religions. It is 9 only the difference of language that makes all these apparent 10 divergences. One expresses a thought in one way, another a little 11 differently, yet perhaps each is meaning exactly what the other is 12 expressing in a different language.

13 More questions arise in connection with this. It is very easy to 14 talk. From my childhood I have heard of seeing God everywhere
15 and in everything, and then I can really enjoy the world, but as soon 16 as I mix with the world, and get a few blows from it, the idea 17 vanishes. I am walking in a street thinking that God is in every man, 18 and a strong man comes along and gives me a push and I fall flat on 19 the footpath. Then I rise up quickly with a clenched fist, and the 20 blood has rushed to my head, and the reflection goes. Immediately I 21 have become mad. Everything is forgotten; instead of encountering 22 God I see the devil. Ever since we were born we have been told to 23 see God in all. Every religion reaches that--see God in everything 24 and everywhere. Do you not remember in the New Testament how 25 Christ says so? We have all been taught that; but it is when we 26 come to the practical side, that the difficulty begins. You all 27 remember how in Aesop's Fables a fine stag is looking at his form 28 reflected in a lake and is saying to his young one, "How powerful I 29 am, look at my splendid head, look at my limbs, how strong and 30 muscular they are; and how swiftly I can run." In the meantime he 31 hears the barking of dogs in the distance, and immediately takes to 32 his heels, and after he has run several miles, he comes back 33 panting. The young one says, "You just told me how strong you 34 were, how was it that when the dog barked, you ran away?" "Yes, 35 my son; but when the dogs bark all my confidence vanishes." Such 36 is the case with us. We think highly of humanity, we feel ourselves 37 strong and valiant, we make grand resolves; but when the "dogs" of 38 trial and temptation bark, we are like the stag in the fable. Then, if 39 such is the case, what is the use of teaching all these things? There 40 is the greatest use. The use is this, that perseverance will finally 41 conquer. Nothing can be done in a day.

42 "This Self is first to be heard, then to be thought upon, and 43 then meditated upon." Everyone can see the sky, even the very 44 worm crawling upon the earth sees the blue sky, but how very far 45 away it is! So it is with our ideal. It is far away, no doubt, but at the 46 same time, we know that we must have it. We must even have the 47 highest ideal. Unfortunately in this life, the vast majority of persons 48 are groping through this dark life without any ideal at all. If a man 49 with an ideal makes a thousand mistakes, I am sure that the man 50 without an ideal makes fifty thousand. Therefore, it is better to have 51 an ideal. And this ideal we must hear about as much as we can, till 52 it enters into our hearts, into our brains, into our very veins, until it

1 tingles in every drop of our blood and permeates every pore in our 2 body. We must meditate upon it. "Out of the fullness of the heart the 3 mouth speaketh," and out of the fullness of the heart the hand 4 works too.

5 It is thought which is the propelling force in us. Fill the 6 mind with the highest thoughts, hear them day after day, think them 7 month after month. Never mind failures; they are quite natural, 8 they are the beauty of life, these failures. What would life be 9 without them? It would not be worth having if it were not for 10 struggles. Where would be the poetry of life? Never mind the 11 struggles, the mistakes. I never heard a cow tell a lie, but it is only 12 a cow--never a man. So never mind these failures, these little 13 backslidings; hold the ideal a thousand times, and if you fail a 14 thousand times, make the attempt once more. The ideal of man is to 15 see God in everything. But if you cannot see Him in everything, see 16 Him in one thing, in that thing which you like best, and then see 17 Him in another. So on you can go. There is infinite life before the 18 soul. Take your time and you will achieve your end.

19 "He, the One, who vibrates more quickly than mind, who 20 attains to more speed than mind can ever do, whom even the gods 21 reach not, nor thought grasps, He moving, everything moves. In 22 Him all exists. He is moving. He is also immovable. He is near and 23 He is far. He is inside everything. He is outside everything, 24 interpenetrating everything. Whoever sees in every being that same 25 Atman, and whoever sees everything in that Atman, he never goes 26 far from that Atman. When all life and the whole universe are seen 27 in this Atman, then alone man has attained the secret. There is no 28 more delusion for him. Where is any more misery for him who sees 29 this Oneness in the universe?"

30 This is another great theme of the Vedanta, this 31 Oneness of life, this Oneness of everything. We shall see how it 32 demonstrates that all our misery comes through ignorance, and this 33 ignorance is the idea of manifoldness, this separation between man 34 and man, between nation and nation, between earth and moon, 35 between moon and sun. Out of this idea of separation between atom 36 and atom comes all misery. But the Vedanta says this separation 37 does not exist, it is not real. It is merely apparent, on the surface. In 38 the heart of things there is Unity still. If you go below the surface, 39 you find that Unity between man and man, between races and 40 races, high and low, rich and poor, gods and men, and men and 41 animals. If you go deep enough, all will be seen as only variations of 42 the One, and he who has attained to this conception of Oneness has 43 no more delusion. What can delude him? He knows the reality of 44 everything, the secret of everything. Where is there any more 45 misery for him? What does he desire? He has traced the reality of 46 everything to the Lord, the Centre, the Unity of everything, and that 47 is Eternal Existence, Eternal Knowledge, Eternal Bliss. Neither 48 death nor disease, nor sorrow, nor misery, nor discontent is there.
49 All is Perfect Union and Perfect Bliss. For whom should he mourn 50 then? In the Reality, there is no death, there is no misery; in the 51 Reality, there is no one to mourn for, no one to be sorry for. He has 52 penetrated everything, the Pure One, the Formless, the Bodiless,

1 the Stainless. He is the Knower, He the Great Poet, the Self-2 Existent, He who is giving to everyone what he deserves. They 3 grope in darkness who worship this ignorant world, the world that 4 is produced out of ignorance, thinking of it as Existence, and those 5 who live their whole lives in this world, and never find anything 6 better or higher, are groping in still greater darkness. But he who 7 knows the secret of nature, seeing That which is beyond nature 8 through the help of nature, he crosses death, and through the help 9 of That which is beyond nature, he enjoys Eternal Bliss. "Thou sun, 10 who hast covered the Truth with thy golden disc, do thou remove 11 the veil, so that I may see the Truth that is within thee. I have 12 known the Truth that is within thee, I have known what is the real 13 meaning of thy rays and thy glory and have seen That which shines 14 in thee; the Truth in thee I see, and That which is within thee is 15 within me, and I am That."

REALISATION

(Delivered in London, 29th October 1896)

I will read to you from one of the Upanishads. It is called the Katha Upanishad. Some of you, perhaps, have read the translation of Sir Edwin Arnold, called the Secret of Death. In our last [i.e. a previous] lecture we saw how the inquiry which started with the origin of the world, and the creation of the universe, failed to obtain a satisfactory answer from without, and how it then turned inwards. This book psychologically takes up that suggestion, questioning into the internal nature of man. It was first asked who created the external world, and how it came into being. Now the question is: What is that in man which makes him live and move, and what becomes of that when he dies? The first philosophers studied the material substance, and tried to reach the ultimate through that. At the best, they found a personal governor of the universe, a human being immensely magnified, but yet to all intents and purposes a human being. But that could not be the whole of truth; at best, it could be only partial truth. We see this universe as human beings, and our God is our human explanation of the universe.

Suppose a cow were philosophical and had religion, it would have a cow universe, and a cow solution of the problem, and it would not be possible that it should see our God. Suppose cats became philosophers, they would see a cat universe and have a cat solution of the problem of the universe, and a cat ruling it. So we see from this that our explanation of the universe is not the whole of the solution. Neither does our conception cover the whole of the universe. It would be a great mistake to accept that tremendously selfish position which man is apt to take. Such a solution of the universal problem as we can get from the outside labours under this difficulty that in the first place the universe we see is our own particular universe, our own view of the Reality. That Reality we cannot see through the senses; we cannot comprehend It. We only know the universe from the point of view of beings with five senses. Suppose we obtain another sense, the whole universe must change for us. Suppose we had a magnetic sense, it is quite possible that we might then find millions and millions of forces in existence which we do not now know, and for which we have no present sense or feeling. Our senses are limited, very limited indeed; and within these limitations exists what we call our universe; and our God is the solution of that universe, but that cannot be the solution of the whole problem. But man cannot stop there. He is a thinking being and wants to find a solution which will comprehensively explain all the universes. He wants to see a world which is at once the world of men, and of gods, and of all possible beings, and to find a solution which will explain all phenomena.

We see, we must first find the universe which includes all universes; we must find something which, by itself, must be the material running through all these various planes of existence, whether we apprehend it through the senses or not. If we could possibly find something which we could know as the common

1 property of the lower as well as of the higher worlds, then our 2 problem would be solved. Even if by the sheer force of logic alone 3 we could understand that there must be one basis of all existence, 4 then our problem might approach to some sort of solution; but this 5 solution certainly cannot be obtained only through the world we see 6 and know, because it is only a partial view of the whole.

7 Our only hope then lies in penetrating deeper. The early 8 thinkers discovered that the farther they were from the centre, the 9 more marked were the variations and differentiations; and that the 10 nearer they approached the centre, the nearer they were to unity.
11 The nearer we are to the centre of a circle, the nearer we are to the 12 common ground in which all the radii meet; and the farther we are 13 from the centre, the more divergent is our radial line from the 14 others. The external world is far away from the centre, and so there 15 is no common ground in it where all the phenomena of existence 16 can meet. At best, the external world is but one part of the whole of 17 phenomena. There are other parts, the mental, the moral, and the 18 intellectual--the various planes of existence--and to take up only 19 one, and find a solution of the whole out of that one, is simply 20 impossible. We first, therefore, want to find somewhere a centre 21 from which, as it were, all the other planes of existence start, and 22 standing there we should try to find a solution. That is the 23 proposition. And where is that centre? It is within us. The ancient 24 sages penetrated deeper and deeper until they found that in the 25 innermost core of the human soul is the centre of the whole 26 universe. All the planes gravitate towards that one point. That is the 27 common ground, and standing there alone can we find a common 28 solution. So the question who made this world is not very 29 philosophical, nor does its solution amount to anything.

30 This the Katha Upanishad speaks in very figurative language.
31 There was, in ancient times, a very rich man, who made a certain 32 sacrifice which required that he should give away everything that 33 he had. Now, this man was not sincere. He wanted to get the fame 34 and glory of having made the sacrifice, but he was only giving 35 things which were of no further use to him--old cows, barren, blind, 36 and lame. He had a boy called Nachiketas. This boy saw that his 37 father was not doing what was right, that he was breaking his vow;
38 but he did not know what to say to him. In India, father and mother 39 are living gods to their children. And so the boy approached the 40 father with the greatest respect and humbly inquired of him, 41 "Father, to whom are you going to give me? For your sacrifice 42 requires that everything shall be given away." The father was very 43 much vexed at this question and replied, "What do you mean, boy?
44 A father giving away his own son?" The boy asked the question a 45 second and a third time, and then the angry father answered, "Thee 46 I give unto Death (Yama)." And the story goes on to say that the boy 47 went to Yama, the god of death. Yama was the first man who died.
48 He went to heaven and became the governor of all the Pitris; all the 49 good people who die, go, and live with him for a long time. He is 50 very pure and holy person, chaste and good, as his name (Yama) 51 implies.

52 So the boy went to Yama's world. But even gods are 1 sometimes not at home, and three days this boy had to wait there.

2 After the third day Yama returned. "O learned one," said Yama, "you 3 have been waiting here for three days without food, and you are a 4 guest worthy of respect. Salutation to thee, O Brahmin, and welfare 5 to me! I am very sorry I was not at home. But for that I will make 6 amends. Ask three boons, one for each day." And the boy asked, 7 "My first boon is that my father's anger against me may pass away; 8 that he will be kind to me and recognise me when you allow me to 9 depart." Yama granted this fully. The next boon was that he wanted 10 to know about a certain sacrifice which took people to heaven. Now 11 we have seen that the oldest idea which we got in the Samhita
12 portion of the Vedas was only about heaven where they had bright 13 bodies and lived with the fathers. Gradually other ideas came, but 14 they were not satisfying; there was still need for something higher.
15 Living in heaven would not be very different from life in this world.
16 At best, it would only be a very healthy rich man's life, with plenty 17 of sense-enjoyments and a sound body which knows no disease. It 18 would be this material world, only a little more refined; and we 19 have seen the difficulty that the external material world can never 20 solve the problem. So no heaven can solve the problem. If this 21 world cannot solve the problem, no multiplication of this world can 22 do so, because we must always remember that matter is only an 23 infinitesimal part of the phenomena of nature. The vast part of 24 phenomena which we actually see is not matter. For instance, in 25 every moment of our life what a great part is played by thought and 26 feeling, compared with the material phenomena outside! How vast 27 is this internal world with its tremendous activity! The sense-28 phenomena are very small compared with it. The heaven solution 29 commits this mistake; it insists that the whole of phenomena is only 30 in touch, taste, sight, etc. So this idea of heaven did not give full 31 satisfaction to all. Yet Nachiketas asks, as the second boon, about 32 some sacrifice through which people might attain to this heaven.
33 There was an idea in the Vedas that these sacrifices pleased the 34 gods and took human beings to heaven.

35 In studying all religions you will notice the fact that whatever 36 is old becomes holy. For instance, our forefathers in India used to 37 write on birch bark, but in time they learnt how to make paper. Yet 38 the birch bark is still looked upon as very holy. When the utensils is 39 which they used to cook in ancient times were improved upon, the 40 old ones became holy; and nowhere is this idea more kept up than 41 in India. Old methods, which must be nine or ten thousand years 42 old, as of rubbing two sticks together to make fire, are still 43 followed. At the time of sacrifice no other method will do. So with 44 the other branch of the Asiatic Aryans. Their modern descendants 45 still like to obtain fire from lightning, showing that they used to get 46 fire in this way. Even when they learnt other customs, they kept up 47 the old ones, which then became holy. So with the Hebrews. They 48 used to write on parchment. They now write on paper, but 49 parchment is very holy. So with all nations. Every rite which you 50 now consider holy was simply an old custom, and the Vedic sacrifice 51 were of this nature. In course of time, as they found better methods 52 of life, their ideas were much improved; still these old forms 53 remained, and from time to time they were practised and received a

1 holy significance.

2 Then, a body of men made it their business to carry on these 3 sacrifices. These were the priests, who speculated on the sacrifices, 4 and the sacrifices became everything to them. The gods came to 5 enjoy the fragrance of the sacrifices, and it was considered that 6 everything in this world could be got by the power of sacrifices. If 7 certain oblations were made, certain hymns chanted, certain 8 peculiar forms of altars made, the gods would grant everything. So 9 Nachiketas asks by what form of sacrifice a man can go to heaven.
10 The second boon was also readily granted by Yama who promised 11 that this sacrifice should henceforth be named after Nachiketas.

12 Then the third boon comes, and with that the Upanishad 13 proper begins. The boy said, "There is this difficulty: when a man 14 dies some say he is, others that he is not. Instructed by you I desire 15 to understand this." But Yama was frightened. He had been very 16 glad to grant the other two boons. Now he said, "The gods in 17 ancient times were puzzled on this point. This subtle law is not easy 18 to understand. Choose some other boon, O Nachiketas, do not press 19 me on this point, release me."

20 The boy was determined, and said, "What you have said is 21 true, O Death, that even the gods had doubts on this point, and it is 22 no easy matter to understand. But I cannot obtain another exponent 23 like you and there is no other boon equal to this."

24 Death said, "Ask for sons and grandsons who will live one 25 hundred years, many cattle, elephants, gold, and horses. Ask for 26 empire on this earth and live as many years as you like. Or choose 27 any other boon which you think equal to these--wealth and long life.
28 Or be thou a king, O Nachiketas, on the wide earth. I will make thee 29 the enjoyer of all desires. Ask for all those desires which are 30 difficult to obtain in the world. These heavenly maidens with 31 chariots and music, which are not to be obtained by man, are yours.
32 Let them serve you, O Nachiketas, but do not question me as to 33 what comes after death."

34 Nachiketas said, "These are merely things of a day, O Death, 35 they wear away the energy of all the sense-organs. Even the longest 36 life is very short. These horses and chariots, dances and songs, may 37 remain with Thee. Man cannot be satisfied by wealth. Can we retain 38 wealth when we behold Thee? We shall live only so long as Thou 39 desirest. Only the boon which I have asked is chosen by me."

40 Yama was pleased with this answer and said, "Perfection is 41 one thing and enjoyment another; these two having different ends, 42 engage men differently. He who chooses perfection becomes pure.
43 He who chooses enjoyment misses his true end. Both perfection 44 and enjoyment present themselves to man; the wise man having 45 examined both distinguishes one from the other. He chooses 46 perfection as being superior to enjoyment, but the foolish man 47 chooses enjoyment for the pleasure of his body. O Nachiketas, 48 having thought upon the things which are only apparently 49 desirable, thou hast wisely abandoned them." Death then 50 proceeded to teach Nachiketas.

1 We now get a very developed idea of renunciation and Vedic 2 morality, that until one has conquered the desires for enjoyment the 3 truth will not shine in him. So long as these vain desires of our 4 senses are clamouring and as it were dragging us outwards every 5 moment, making us slaves to everything outside--to a little colour, a 6 little taste, a little touch--notwithstanding all our pretensions, how 7 can the truth express itself in our hearts?

8 Yama said, "That which is beyond never rises before the mind 9 of a thoughtless child deluded by the folly of riches. 'This world 10 exists, the other does not,' thinking thus they come again and again 11 under my power. To understand this truth is very difficult. Many, 12 even hearin it continually, do not understand it, for the speaker 13 must be wonderful, so must the hearer. The teacher must be 14 wonderful, so must be the taught. Neither is the mind to be 15 disturbed by vain arguments, for it is no more a question of 16 argument, it is a question of fact." We have always heard that every 17 religion insists on our having faith. We have been taught to believe 18 blindly. Well, this idea of blind faith is objectionable, no doubt, but 19 analysing it, we find that behind it is a very great truth. What it 20 really means is what we read now. The mind is not to be ruffled by 21 vain arguments, because argument will not help us to know God. It 22 is a question of fact, and not of argument. All argument and 23 reasoning must be based upon certain perceptions. Without these, 24 there cannot be any argument. Reasoning is the method of 25 comparison between certain facts which we have already 26 perceived. If these perceived facts are not there already, there 27 cannot be any reasoning. If this is true of external phenomena, why 28 should it not be so of the internal? The chemist takes certain 29 chemicals and certain results are produced. This is a fact; you see 30 it, sense it, and make that the basis on which to build all your 31 chemical arguments. So with the physicists, so with all other 32 sciences. All knowledge must stand on perception of certain facts, 33 and upon that we have to build our reasoning. But, curiously 34 enough the vast majority of mankind think, especially at the present 35 time, that no such perception is possible in religion, that religion 36 can only be apprehended by vain arguments. Therefore we are told 37 not to disturb the mind by vain arguments. Religion is a question of 38 fact, not of talk. We have to analyse our own souls and to find what 39 is there. We have to understand it and to realise what is 40 understood. That is religion. No amount of talk will make religion.
41 So the question whether there is a God or not can never be proved 42 by argument, for the arguments are as much on one side as on the 43 other. But if there is a God, He is in our own hearts. Have you even 44 seen Him? The question as to whether this world exists or not has 45 not yet been decided, and the debate between the idealists and the 46 realists is endless. Yet we know that the world exists, that it goes 47 on. We only change the meaning of words. So, with all the questions 48 of life, we must come to facts. There are certain religious facts 49 which, as in external science, have to be perceived, and upon them 50 religion will be built. Of course, the extreme claim that you must 51 believe every dogma of a religion is degrading to the human mind.
52 The man who asks you to believe everything, degrades himself, and, 53 if you believe, degrades you too. The sages of the world have only

1 the right to tell us that they have analysed their minds and have 2 found these facts, and if we do the same we shall also believe, and 3 not before. That is all that there is in religion. But you must always 4 remember this, that as a matter of fact 99.9 per cent of those who 5 attack religion have never analysed their minds, have never 6 struggled to get at the facts. So their arguments do not have any 7 weight against religion, any more than the words of a blind man 8 who cries out, "You are all fools who believe in the sun," would 9 affect us.

10 This is one great idea to learn and to hold onto, this idea of 11 realisation. This turmoil and fight and difference in religions will 12 cease only when we understand that religion is not in books and 13 temples. It is an actual perception. Only the man who has actually 14 perceived God and soul has religion. There is no real difference 15 between the highest ecclesiastical giant who can talk by the 16 volume, and the lowest, most ignorant materialist. We are all 17 atheists; let us confess it. Mere intellectual assent does not make us 18 religious. Take a Christian, or a Mohammedan, or a follower of any 19 other religion in the world. Any man who truly realised the truth of 20 the Sermon on the Mount would be perfect, and become a god
21 immediately. Yet it is said that there are many millions of Christians 22 in the world. What is meant is that mankind may at some time try to 23 realise that Sermon. No one in twenty millions is a real Christian.

24 So, in India, there are said to be three hundred millions of 25 Vedantins. But if there were one in a thousand who had actually 26 realised religion, this world would soon be greatly changed. We are 27 all atheists, and yet we try to fight the man who admits it. We are all 28 in the dark; religion is to us a mere intellectual assent, a mere talk, 29 a mere nothing. We often consider a man religious who can talk 30 well. But this is not religion. "Wonderful methods of joining words, 31 rhetorical powers, and explaining texts of the books in various 32 ways--these are only for the enjoyment of the learned, and not 33 religion." Religion comes when that actual realisation in our own 34 soul begins. That will be the dawn of religion; and then alone we 35 shall be moral. Now we are not much more moral than the animals.
36 We are only held down by the whips of society. If society said today, 37 "I will not punish you if you steal", we should just make a rush for 38 each other's property. It is the policeman that makes us moral. It is 39 social opinion that makes us moral, and really we are little better 40 than animals. We understand how much this is so in the secret of 41 our own hearts. So let us not be hypocrites. Let us confess that we 42 are not religious and have no right to look down on others. We are 43 all brothers, and we shall be truly moral when we have realised
44 religion.

45 If you have seen a certain country, and a man forces you to 46 say that you have not seen it, still in your heart of hearts you know 47 you have. So, when you see religion and God in a more intense 48 sense than you see this external world, nothing will be able to 49 shake your belief. Then you have real faith. That is what is meant by 50 the words in your Gospel, "He who has faith even as a grain of 51 mustard seed." Then you will know the Truth because you have 52 become the Truth.

1 This is the watchword of Vedanta--realise religion, no talking
2 will do. But it is done with great difficulty. He has hidden Himself
3 inside the atom, this Ancient One who resides in the inmost recess 4 of every human heart. The sages realised Him through the power of 5 introspection, and got beyond both joy and misery, beyond what we 6 call virtue and vice, beyond good and bad deeds, beyond being and 7 non-being; he who has seen Him has seen the Reality. But what 8 then about heaven? It was the idea of happiness minus 9 unhappiness. That is to say, what we want is the joys of this life 10 minus its sorrows. That is a very good idea, no doubt; it comes 11 naturally; but it is a mistake throughout, because there is no such 12 thing as absolute good, nor any such thing as absolute evil.

13 You have all heard of that rich man in Rome who learnt one 14 day that he had only about a million pounds of his property left; he 15 said, "What shall I do tomorrow?" and forthwith committed suicide.
16 A million pounds was poverty to him. What is joy, and what is 17 sorrow? It is a vanishing quantity, continually vanishing. When I 18 was a child I thought if I could be a cabman, it would be the very 19 acme of happiness for me to drive about. I do not think so now. To 20 what joy will you cling? This is the one point we must all try to 21 understand, and it is one of the last superstitions to leave us.
22 Everyone's idea of pleasure is different. I have seen a man who is 23 not happy unless he swallows a lump of opium every day. He may 24 dream of a heaven where the land is made of opium. That would be 25 a very bad heaven for me. Again and again in Arabian poetry we 26 read of heaven with beautiful gardens, through which rivers run. I 27 lived much of my life in a country where there is too much water; 28 many villages are flooded and thousands of lives are sacrificed 29 every year. So, my heaven would not have gardens through which 30 rivers flow; I would have a land where very little rain falls. Our 31 pleasures are always changing. If a young man dreams of heaven, 32 he dreams of a heaven where he will have a beautiful wife. When 33 that same man becomes old he does not want a wife. It is our 34 necessities which make our heaven, and the heaven changes with 35 the change of our necessities. If we had a heaven like that desired 36 by those to whom sense-enjoyment is the very end of existence, 37 then we would not progress. That would be the most terrible curse 38 we could pronounce on the soul. Is this all we can come to? A little 39 weeping and dancing, and then to die like a dog! What a curse you 40 pronounce on the head of humanity when you long for these things!
41 That is what you do when you cry after the joys of this world, for 42 you do not know what true joy is. What philosophy insists on is not 43 to give up joys, but to know what joy really is. The Norwegian 44 heaven is a tremendous fighting place where they all sit before 45 Odin; they have a wild boar hunt, and then they go to war and slash 46 each other to pieces. But in some way or other, after a few hours of 47 such fighting, the wounds are all healed up, and they go into a hall 48 where the boar has been roasted and have a carousal. And then the 49 wild boar takes form again, ready to be hunted the next day. This is 50 much the same thing as our heaven, not a whit worse, only our 51 ideas may be a little more refined. We want to hunt wild boars, and 52 get to a place where all enjoyments will continue, just as the 53 Norwegian imagines that the wild boar is hunted and eaten every 1 day, and recovers the next day.

2 Now, philosophy insists that there is a joy which is absolute, 3 which never changes. That joy cannot be the joys and pleasures we 4 have in this life, and yet Vedanta shows that everything that is 5 joyful in this life is but a particle of that real joy, because that is the 6 only joy there is. Every moment really we are enjoying the absolute 7 bliss, though covered up, misunderstood, and caricatured.
8 Wherever there is any blessing, blissfulness, or joy, even the joy of 9 the thief in stealing, it is that absolute bliss coming out, only it has 10 become obscured, muddled up, as it were, with all sorts of 11 extraneous conditions, and misunderstood. But to understand that, 12 we have to go through the negation, and then the positive side will 13 begin. We have to give up ignorance and all that is false, and then 14 truth will begin to reveal itself to us. When we have grasped the 15 truth, things which we gave up at first will take new shape and 16 form, will appear to us in a new light, and become deified. They will 17 have become sublimated, and then we shall understand them in 18 their true light. But to understand them, we have first to get a 19 glimpse of truth; we must give them up at first, and then we get 20 them back again, deified. We have to give up all miseries and 21 sorrows, all our little joys.

22 "That which all the Vedas declare, which is proclaimed by all 23 penances, seeking which men lead lives of continence, I will tell you 24 in one word--it is 'Om'." You will find this word "Om" praised very 25 much in the Vedas, and it is held to be very sacred.

26 Now Yama answers the question: "What becomes of a man 27 when the body dies?" "This Wise One never dies, is never born, It 28 arises from nothing, and nothing arises from It. Unborn, Eternal, 29 Everlasting, this Ancient One can never be destroyed with the 30 destruction of the body. If the slayer thinks he can slay, or if the 31 slain thinks he is slain, they both do not know the truth, for the Self 32 neither slays nor is slain." A most tremendous position. I should like 33 to draw your attention to the adjective in the first line, which is 34 "wise". As we proceed we shall find that the ideal of the Vedanta is 35 that all wisdom and all purity are in the soul already, dimly 36 expressed or better expressed--that is all the difference. The 37 difference between man and man, and all things in the whole 38 creation, is not in kind but only in degree. The background, the 39 reality, of everyone is that same Eternal, Ever Blessed, Ever Pure, 40 and Ever Perfect One. It is the Atman, the Soul, in the saint and the 41 sinner, in the happy and the miserable, in the beautiful and the ugly, 42 in men and in animals; it is the same throughout. It is the shining 43 One. The difference is caused by the power of expression. In some 44 It is expressed more, in others less, but this difference of 45 expression has no effect upon the Atman. If in their dress one man 46 shows more of his body than another, it does not make any 47 difference in their bodies; the difference is in their dress. We had 48 better remember here that throughout the Vedanta philosophy, 49 there is no such thing as good and bad, they are not two different 50 things; the same thing is good or bad, and the difference is only in 51 degree. The very thing I call pleasurable today, tomorrow under 52 better circumstances I may call pain. The fire that warms us can

1 also consume us; it is not the fault of the fire. Thus, the Soul being 2 pure and perfect, the man who does evil is giving the lie unto 3 himself, he does not know the nature of himself. Even in the 4 murderer the pure Soul is there; It dies not. It was his mistake; he 5 could not manifest It; he had covered It up. Nor in the man who 6 thinks that he is killed is the Soul killed; It is eternal. It can never 7 be killed, never destroyed. "Infinitely smaller than the smallest, 8 infinitely larger than the largest, this Lord of all is present in the 9 depths of every human heart. The sinless, bereft of all misery, see 10 Him through the mercy of the Lord; the Bodiless, yet dwelling in 11 the body; the Spaceless, yet seeming to occupy space;

12 Infinite, Omnipresent: knowing such to be the Soul, the sages 13 never are miserable."

14 "This Atman is not to be realised by the power of speech, nor 15 by a vast intellect, nor by the study of the Vedas." This is a very bold 16 utterance. As I told you before, the sages were very bold thinkers, 17 and never stopped at anything. You will remember that in India 18 these Vedas are regarded in a much higher light than even the 19 Christians regard their Bible. Your idea of revelation is that a man 20 was inspired by God; but in India the idea is that things exist
21 because they are in the Vedas. In and through the Vedas the whole 22 creation has come. All that is called knowledge is in the Vedas.
23 Every word is sacred and eternal, eternal as the soul, without 24 beginning and without end. The whole of the Creator's mind is in 25 this book, as it were. That is the light in which the Vedas are held.
26 Why is this thing moral? Because the Vedas say so. Why is that 27 thing immoral? Because the Vedas say so. In spite of that, look at 28 the boldness of these sages who proclaimed that the truth is not to 29 be found by much study of the Vedas. "With whom the Lord is 30 pleased, to that man He expresses Himself." But then, the objection 31 may be advanced that this is something like partisanship. But Yama 32 explains, "Those who are evil-doers, whose minds are not peaceful, 33 can never see the Light. It is to those who are true in heart, pure in 34 deed, whose senses are controlled, that this Self manifests Itself."

35 Here is a beautiful figure. Picture the Self to be the rider and 36 this body the chariot, the intellect to be the charioteer, mind the 37 reins, and the senses the horses. He whose horses are well broken, 38 and whose reins are strong and kept well in the hands of the 39 charioteer (the intellect) reaches the goal which is the state of Him, 40 the Omnipresent. But the man whose horses (the senses) are not 41 controlled, nor the reins (the mind) well managed, goes to 42 destruction. This Atman in all beings does not manifest Himself to 43 the eyes or the senses, but those whose minds have become 44 purified and refined realise Him. Beyond all sound, all sight, beyond 45 form, absolute, beyond all taste and touch, infinite, without 46 beginning and without end, even beyond nature, the Unchangeable; 47 he who realises Him, frees himself from the jaws of death. But it is 48 very difficult. It is, as it were, walking on the edge of a razor; the 49 way is long and perilous, but struggle on, do not despair. Awake, 50 arise, and stop not till the goal is reached.

51 The one central idea throughout all the Upanishads is that of 52 realisation. A great many questions will arise from time to time, and

1 especially to the modern man. There will be the question of utility, 2 there will be various other questions, but in all we shall find that we 3 are prompted by our past associations. It is association of ideas that 4 has such a tremendous power over our minds. To those who from 5 childhood have always heard of a Personal God and the personality 6 of the mind, these ideas will of course appear very stern and harsh, 7 but if they listen to them and think over them, they will become part 8 of their lives and will no longer frighten them. The great question 9 that generally arises is the utility of philosophy. To that there can be 10 only one answer: if on the utilitarian ground it is good for men to 11 seek for pleasure, why should not those whose pleasure is in 12 religious speculation seek for that? Because sense-enjoyments 13 please many, they seek for them, but there may be others whom 14 they do not please, who want higher enjoyment. The dog's pleasure 15 is only in eating and drinking. The dog cannot understand the 16 pleasure of the scientist who gives up everything, and, perhaps, 17 dwells on the top of a mountain to observe the position of certain 18 stars. The dogs may smile at him and think he is a madman.
19 Perhaps this poor scientist never had money enough to marry even, 20 and lives very simply. May be, the dog laughs at him. But the 21 scientist says, "My dear dog, your pleasure is only in the senses 22 which you enjoy, and you know nothing beyond; but for me this is 23 the most enjoyable life, and if you have the right to seek your 24 pleasure in your own way, so have I in mine." The mistake is that we 25 want to tie the whole world down to our own plane of thought and 26 to make our mind the measure of the whole universe. To you, the 27 old sense-things are, perhaps, the greatest pleasure, but it is not 28 necessary that my pleasure should be the same, and when you 29 insist upon that, I differ from you. That is the difference between 30 the worldly utilitarian man and the religious man. The first man 31 says, "See how happy I am. I get money, but do not bother my head 32 about religion. It is too unsearchable, and I am happy without it." 33 So far, so good; good for all utilitarians. But this world is terrible. If 34 a man gets happiness in any way excepting by injuring his fellow-35 beings, godspeed him; but when this man comes to me and says, 36 "You too must do these things, you will be a fool if you do not," I say, 37 "You are wrong, because the very things, which are pleasurable to 38 you, have not the slightest attraction to me. If I had to go after a 39 few handfuls of gold, my life would not be worth living! I should 40 die." That is the answer the religious man would make. The fact is 41 that religion is possible only for those who have finished with these 42 lower things. We must have our own experiences, must have our 43 full run. It is only when we have finished this run that the other 44 world opens.

45 The enjoyments of the senses sometimes assume another 46 phase which is dangerous and tempting. You will always hear the 47 idea--in very old times, in every religion--that a time will come when 48 all the miseries of life will cease, and only its joys and pleasures will 49 remain, and this earth will become a heaven. That I do not believe.
50 This earth will always remain this same world. It is a most terrible 51 thing to say, yet I do not see my way out of it. The misery in the 52 world is like chronic rheumatism in the body; drive it from one part 53 and it goes to another, drive it from there and you will feel it

1 somewhere else. Whatever you do, it is still there. In olden times 2 people lived in forests, and ate each other; in modern times they do 3 not eat each other's flesh, but they cheat one another. Whole
4 countries and cities are ruined by cheating. That does not show 5 much progress. I do not see that what you call progress in the 6 world is other than the multiplication of desires. If one thing is 7 obvious to me it is this that desires bring all misery; it is the state of 8 the beggar, who is always begging for something, and unable to see 9 anything without the wish to possess it, is always longing, longing 10 for more. If the power to satisfy our desire is increasing in 11 arithmetical progression, the power of desire is increased in 12 geometrical progression. The sum total of happiness and misery in 13 this world is at least the same throughout. If a wave rises in the 14 ocean it makes a hollow somewhere. If happiness comes to one 15 man, unhappiness comes to another or, perhaps, to some animal.
16 Men are increasing in numbers and some animals are decreasing; 17 we are killing them off, and taking their land; we are taking all 18 means of sustenance from them. How can we say, then, that 19 happiness is increasing? The strong race eats up the weaker, but do 20 you think that the strong race will be very happy? No; they will 21 begin to kill each other. I do not see on practical grounds how this 22 world can become a heaven. Facts are against it. On theoretical 23 grounds also, I see it cannot be.

24 Perfection is always infinite. We are this infinite already, and 25 we are trying to manifest that infinity. You and I, and all beings, are 26 trying to manifest it. So far it is all right. But from this fact some 27 German philosophers have started a peculiar theory--that this 28 manifestation will become higher and higher until we attain perfect 29 manifestation, until we have become perfect beings. What is meant 30 by perfect manifestation? Perfection means infinity, and 31 manifestation means limit, and so it means that we shall become 32 unlimited limiteds, which is self-contradictory. Such a theory may 33 please children; but it is poisoning their minds with lies, and is very 34 bad for religion. But we know that this world is a degradation, that 35 man is a degradation of God, and that Adam fell. There is no 36 religion today that does not teach that man is a degradation. We 37 have been degraded down to the animal, and are now going up, to 38 emerge out of this bondage. But we shall never be able entirely to 39 manifest the Infinite here. We shall struggle hard, but there will 40 come a time when we shall find that it is impossible to be perfect 41 here, while we are bound by the senses. And then the march back 42 to our original state of Infinity will be sounded.

43 This is renunciation. We shall have to get out of the difficulty 44 by reversing the process by which we got in, and then morality and 45 charity will begin. What is the watchword of all ethical codes? "Not 46 I, but thou", and this "I" is the outcome of the Infinite behind, trying 47 to manifest Itself on the outside world. This little "I" is the result, 48 and it will have to go back and join the Infinite, its own nature.
49 Every time you say, "Not I, my brother, but thou", you are trying to 50 go back, and every time you say "I, and not thou", you take the false 51 step of trying to manifest the Infinite through the sense-world. That 52 brings struggles and evils into the world, but after a time

1 renunciation must come, eternal renunciation. That little "I" is dead
2 and gone. Why care so much for this little life? All these vain 3 desires of living and enjoying this life, here or in some other place, 4 bring death.

5 If we are developed from animals, the animals also may be 6 degraded men. How do you know it is not so? You have seen that 7 the proof of evolution is simply this: you find a series of bodies from 8 the lowest to the highest rising in a gradually ascending scale. But 9 from that how can you insist that it is always from the lower 10 upwards, and never from the higher downwards? The argument 11 applies both ways, and if anything is true, I believe it is that the 12 series is repeating itself in going up and down. How can you have 13 evolution without involution? Our struggle for the higher life shows 14 that we have been degraded from a high state. It must be so, only it 15 may vary as to details. I always cling to the idea set forth with one 16 voice by Christ, Buddha, and the Vedanta, that we must all come to 17 perfection in time, but only by giving up this imperfection. This 18 world is nothing. It is at best only a hideous caricature, a shadow of 19 the Reality. We must go to the Reality. Renunciation will take us to 20 It. Renunciation is the very basis of our true life; every moment of 21 goodness and real life that we enjoy is when we do not think of 22 ourselves. This little separate self must die. Then we shall find that 23 we are in the Real, and that Reality is God, and He is our own true 24 nature, and He is always in us and with us. Let us live in Him and 25 stand in Him. It is the only joyful state of existence. Life on the 26 plane of the Spirit is the only life, and let us all try to attain to this 27 realisation.

UNITY IN DIVERSITY

(Delivered in London, 3rd November 1896)

"The Self-existent One projected the senses outwards and, therefore, a man looks outward, not within himself. A certain wise one, desiring immortality, with inverted senses, perceived the Self within." As I have already said, the first inquiry that we find in the Vedas was concerning outward things, and then a new idea came that the reality of things is not to be found in the external world; not by looking outwards, but by turning the eyes, as it is literally expressed, inwards. And the word used for the Soul is very significant: it is He who has gone inward, the innermost reality of our being, the heart centre, the core, from which, as it were, everything comes out; the central sun of which the mind, the body, the sense-organs, and everything else we have are but rays going outwards. "Men of childish intellect, ignorant persons, run after desires which are external, and enter the trap of far-reaching death, but the wise, understanding immortality, never seek for the Eternal in this life of finite things." The same idea is here made clear that in this external world, which is full of finite things, it is impossible to see and find the Infinite. The Infinite must be sought in that alone which is infinite, and the only thing infinite about us is that which is within us, our own soul. Neither the body, nor the mind, nor even our thoughts, nor the world we see around us, are infinite. The Seer, He to whom they all belong, the Soul of man, He who is awake in the internal man, alone is infinite, and to seek for the Infinite Cause of this whole universe we must go there. In the Infinite Soul alone we can find it. What is here is there too, and what is there is here also. He who sees the manifold goes from death to death." We have seen how at first there was the desire to go to heaven. When these ancient Aryans became dissatisfied with the world around them, they naturally thought that after death they would go to some place where there would be all happiness without any misery; these places they multiplied and called Svargas--the word may be translated as heavens--where there would be joy for ever, the body would become perfect, and also the mind, and there they would live with their forefathers. But as soon as philosophy came, men found that this was impossible and absurd. The very idea of an infinite in place would be a contradiction in terms, as a place must begin and continue in time. Therefore they had to give up this idea. They found out that the gods who lived in these heavens had once been human beings on earth, who through their good works had become gods, and the godhoods, as they call them, were different states, different positions; none of the gods spoken of in the Vedas are permanent individuals.

For instance, Indra and Varuna are not the names of certain persons, but the names of positions as governors and so on. The Indra who had lived before is not the same person as the Indra of the present day; he has passed away, and another man from earth has filled his place. So with all the other gods. These are certain positions, which are filled successively by human souls who have raised themselves to the condition of gods, and yet even they die. In the old Rig-Veda we find the word "immortality" used with regard to

1 these gods, but later on it is dropped entirely, for they found that 2 immortality which is beyond time and space cannot be spoken of 3 with regard to any physical form, however subtle it may be.
4 However fine it may be, it must have a beginning in time and space, 5 for the necessary factors that enter into the make-up of form are in 6 space. Try to think of a form without space; it is impossible. Space 7 is one of the materials, as it were, which make up the form, and this 8 is continually changing. Space and time are in Maya, and this idea 9 is expressed in the line--"What is here, that is there too." If there 10 are these gods, they must be bound by the same laws that apply 11 here, and all laws involved destruction and renewal again and 12 again. These laws are moulding matter into different forms, and 13 crushing them out again. Everything born must die; and so, if there 14 are heavens, the same laws must hold good there.

15 In this world we find that all happiness is followed by misery 16 as its shadow. Life has its shadow, death. They must go together, 17 because they are not contradictory, not two separate existences, 18 but different manifestations of the same unit, life and death, sorrow 19 and happiness, good and evil. The dualistic conception that good 20 and evil are two separate entities, and that they are both going on 21 eternally, is absurd on the face of it. They are the diverse 22 manifestations of one and the same fact, one time appearing as 23 bad, and at another time as good. The difference does not exist in 24 kind, but only in degree. They differ from each other in degree of 25 intensity. We find as a fact that the same nerve systems carry good 26 and bad sensations alike, and when the nerves are injured, neither 27 sensation comes to us. If a certain nerve is paralysed, we do not get 28 the pleasurable feelings that used to come along the wire; and at 29 the same time we do not get the painful feelings either. They are 30 never two, but the same. Again, the same thing produces pleasure 31 and pain at different times of life. The same phenomenon will 32 produce pleasure in one, and pain in another. The eating of meat 33 produces pleasure to a man, but pain to the animal which is eaten.
34 There has never been anything which gives pleasure to all alike.
35 Some are pleased, other displeased. So on it will go. Therefore, this 36 duality of existence is denied. And what follows? I told you in my 37 last lecture that we can never have ultimately everything good on 38 this earth and nothing bad. It may have disappointed and 39 frightened some of you, but I cannot help it, and I am open to 40 conviction when I am shown to the contrary; but until that can be 41 proved to me, and I can find that it is true, I cannot say so.

42 The general argument against my statement, and apparently 43 a very convincing one, is this that in the course of evolution, all that 44 is evil in what we see around us is gradually being eliminated, and 45 the result is that if this elimination continues for millions of years, a 46 time will come when all the evil will have been extirpated, and the 47 good alone will remain. This is apparently a very sound argument.
48 Would to God it were true! But there is a fallacy in it. and it is this 49 that it takes for granted that both good and evil are things that are 50 eternally fixed. It takes for granted that there is a definite mass of 51 evil, which may be represented by a hundred, and likewise of good, 52 and that this mass of evil is being diminished every day, leaving only

1 the good. But is this so? The history of the world shows that evil is a 2 continuously increasing quantity, as well as good. Take the lowest 3 man; he lives in a forest. His sense of enjoyment is very small, and 4 so also is his power to suffer. His misery is entirely on the sense-5 plane. If he does not get plenty of food, he is miserable; but give 6 him plenty of food and freedom to rove and to hunt, and he is 7 perfectly happy. His happiness consists only in the senses, and so 8 does his misery also. But if that man increases in knowledge, his 9 happiness will increase, the intellect will open to him, and his 10 sense-enjoyment will evolve into intellectual enjoyment. He will feel 11 pleasure in reading a beautiful poem, and a mathematical problem 12 will be of absorbing interest to him. But, with these, the finer 13 nerves will become more and more susceptible to miseries of 14 mental pain, of which the savage does not think. Take a very simple 15 illustration. In Tibet there is no marriage, and there is no jealousy, 16 yet we know that marriage is a much higher state. The Tibetans 17 have not known the wonderful enjoyment, the blessing of chastity, 18 the happiness of having a chaste, virtuous wife, or a chaste, 19 virtuous husband. These people cannot feel that. And similarly they 20 do not feel the intense jealousy of the chaste wife or husband, or 21 the misery caused by unfaithfulness on either side, with all the 22 heart-burnings and sorrows which believers in chastity experience.
23 On one side, the latter gain happiness, but on the other, they suffer 24 misery too.

25 Take your country which is the richest in the world, and 26 which is more luxurious than any other, and see how intense in the 27 misery, how many more lunatics you have, compared with other 28 races, only because the desires are so keen. A man must keep up a 29 high standard of living, and the amount of money he spends in one 30 year would be a fortune to a man in India. You cannot preach to him 31 of simple living because society demands so much of him. The 32 wheel of society is rolling on; it stops not for the widow's tears or 33 orphans' wails. This is the state of things everywhere. Your sense of 34 enjoyment is developed, your society is very much more beautiful 35 than some others. You have so many more things to enjoy. But those 36 who have fewer have much less misery. You can argue thus 37 throughout, the higher the ideal you have in the brain, the greater 38 is your enjoyment, and the more profound your misery. One is like 39 the shadow of the other. That the evils are being eliminated may be 40 true, but if so, the good also must be dying out. But are not evils 41 multiplying fast, and good diminishing, if I may so put it? If good 42 increases in arithmetical progression, evil increases in geometrical 43 progression. And this is Maya. This is neither optimism nor 44 pessimism. Vedanta does not take the position that this world is 45 only a miserable one. That would be untrue. At the same time, it is a 46 mistake to say that this world is full of happiness and blessings.

47 So it is useless to tell children that this world is all good, all 48 flowers, all milk and honey. That is what we have all dreamt. At the 49 same time it is erroneous to think, because one man has suffered 50 more than another, that all is evil. It is this duality, this play of good 51 and evil that makes our world of experiences. At the same time the 52 Vedanta says, "Do not think that good and evil are two, are two

1 separate essences, for they are one and the same thing, appearing 2 in different degrees and in different guises and producing 3 differences of feeling in the same mind." So, the first thought of the 4 Vedanta is the finding of unity in the external; the One Existence 5 manifesting Itself, however different It may appear in 6 manifestation. Think of the old crude theory of the Persians--two 7 gods creating this world, the good god doing everything that is 8 good, and the bad one, everything bad. On the very face of it, you 9 see the absurdity, for if it be carried out, every law of nature must 10 have two parts, one of which is manipulated by one god, and then 11 he goes away and the other god manipulates the other part. There 12 the difficulty comes that both are working in the same world, and 13 these two gods keep themselves in harmony by injuring one portion 14 and doing good to another. This is a crude case, of course, the 15 crudest way of expressing the duality of existence. But, take the 16 more advanced, the more abstract theory that this world is partly 17 good and partly bad. This also is absurd, arguing from the same 18 standpoint. It is the law of unity that gives us our food, and it is the 19 same law that kills many through accidents or misadventure.

20 We find, then, that this world is neither optimistic nor 21 pessimistic; it is a mixture of both, and as we go on we shall find 22 that the whole blame is taken away from nature and put upon our 23 shoulders. At the same time the Vedanta shows the way out, but not 24 by denial of evil, because it analyses boldly the fact as it is and does 25 not seek to conceal anything. It is not hopeless; it is not agnostic. It 26 finds out a remedy, but it wants to place that remedy on adamant 27 foundations; not by shutting the child's mouth and blinding its eyes 28 with something which is untrue, and which the child will find out in 29 a few days. I remember when I was young, a young man's father 30 died and left him poorly off, with a large family to support, and he 31 found that his father's friends were unwilling to help him. He had a 32 conversation with a clergyman who offered this consolation, "Oh, it 33 is all good, all is sent for our good." That is the old method of trying 34 to put a piece of gold leaf on an old sore. It is a confession of 35 weakness, or absurdity. The young man went away, and six months 36 afterwards a son was born to the clergyman, and he gave a 37 thanksgiving party to which the young man was invited. The 38 clergyman prayed, "Thank God for His mercies." And the young 39 man stood up and said, "Stop, this is all misery." The clergyman 40 asked, "What?" "Because when my father died you said it was good, 41 though apparently evil; so now, this is apparently good, but really 42 evil." Is this the way to cure the misery of the world? Be good and 43 have mercy on those who suffer. Do not try to patch it up, nothing 44 will cure this world; go beyond it.

45 This is a world of good and evil. Wherever there is good, evil 46 follows, but beyond and behind all these manifestations, all these 47 contradictions, the Vedanta finds out that Unity. It says, "Give up 48 what is evil and give up what is good." What remains then? Behind 49 good and evil stands something which is yours, the real you, beyond 50 every evil, and beyond every good too, and it is that which is 51 manifesting itself as good and bad. Know that first, and then and 52 then alone you will be a true optimist, and not before; for then you

1 will be able to control everything. Control these manifestations and 2 you will be at liberty to manifest the real "you". First be master of 3 yourself, stand up and be free, go beyond the pale of these laws, for 4 these laws do not absolutely govern you, they are only part of your 5 being. First find out that you are not the slave of nature, never were 6 and never will be; that this nature, infinite as you may think it, is 7 only finite, a drop in the ocean, and your Soul is the ocean; you are 8 beyond the stars, the sun, and the moon. They are like mere 9 bubbles compared with your infinite being. Know that, and you will 10 control both good and evil. Then alone the whole vision will change 11 and you will stand up and say, "How beautiful is good and how 12 wonderful is evil!"

13 That is what the Vedanta teaches. It does not propose any 14 slipshod remedy by covering wounds with gold leaf and the more 15 the wound festers, putting on more gold leaf. This life is a hard fact; 16 work your way through it boldly, though it may be adamant; no
17 matter, the soul is stronger. It lays no responsibility on little gods; 18 for you are the makers of your own fortunes. You make yourselves 19 suffer, you make good and evil, and it is you who put your hands 20 before your eyes and say it is dark. Take your hands away and see 21 the light; you are effulgent, you are perfect already, from the very 22 beginning. We now understand the verse: "He goes from death to 23 death who sees the many here." See that One and be free.

24 How are we to see it? This mind, so deluded, so weak, so 25 easily led, even this mind can be strong and may catch a glimpse of 26 that knowledge, that Oneness, which saves us from dying again and 27 again. As rain falling upon a mountain flows in various streams 28 down the sides of the mountain, so all the energies which you see 29 here are from that one Unit. It has become manifold falling upon 30 Maya. Do not run after the manifold; go towards the One. "He is in 31 all that moves; He is in all that is pure; He fills the universe; He is 32 in the sacrifice; He is the guest in the house; He is in man, in water, 33 in animals, in truth; He is the Great One. As fire coming into this 34 world is manifesting itself in various forms, even so, that one Soul 35 of the universe is manifesting Himself in all these various forms. As 36 air coming into this universe manifests itself in various forms, even 37 so, the One Soul of all souls, of all beings, is manifesting Himself in 38 all forms." This is true for you when you have understood this Unity, 39 and not before. Then is all optimism, because He is seen 40 everywhere. The question is that if all this be true that that Pure 41 One--the Self, the Infinite--has entered all this, how is it that He 42 suffers, how is it that He becomes miserable, impure? He does not, 43 says the Upanishad. "As the sun is the cause of the eyesight of 44 every being, yet is not made defective by the defect in any eye, 45 even so the Self of all is not affected by the miseries of the body, or 46 by any misery that is around you." I may have some disease and see 47 everything yellow, but the sun is not affected by it. "He is the One, 48 the Creator of all, the Ruler of all, the Internal Soul of every being-- 49 He who makes His Oneness manifold. Thus sages who realise Him 50 as the Soul of their souls, unto them belongs eternal peace; unto 51 none else, unto none else. He who in this world of evanescence 52 finds Him who never changes, he who in this universe of death finds

1 that One Life, he who in this manifold finds that Oneness, and all
2 those who realise Him as the Soul of their souls, to them belongs 3 eternal peace; unto none else, unto none else. Where to find Him in 4 the external world, where to find Him in the suns, and moons, and 5 stars? There the sun cannot illumine, nor the moon, nor the stars, 6 the flash of lightning cannot illumine the place; what to speak of 7 this mortal fire? He shining, everything else shines. It is His light 8 that they have borrowed, and He is shining through them." Here is 9 another beautiful simile. Those of you who have been in India and 10 have seen how the banyan tree comes from one root and spreads 11 itself far around, will understand this. He is that banyan tree; He is 12 the root of all and has branched out until He has become this 13 universe, and however far He extends, every one of these trunks 14 and branches is connected.

15 Various heavens are spoken of in the Brahmana portion of the 16 Vedas, but the philosophical teaching of the Upanishads gives up 17 the idea of going to heaven. Happiness is not in this heaven or in 18 that heaven, it is in the soul; places do not signify anything. Here is 19 another passage which shows the different states of realisation. "In 20 the heaven of the forefathers, as a man sees things in a dream, so 21 the Real Truth is seen." As in dreams we see things hazy and not so 22 distinct, so we see the Reality there. There is another heaven called 23 the Gandharva, in which it is still less clear; as a man sees his own 24 reflection in the water, so is the Reality seen there. The highest 25 heaven, of which the Hindus conceive is called the Brahmaloaka; and 26 in this, the Truth is seen much more clearly, like light and shade, 27 but not yet quite distinctly. But as a man sees his own face in a 28 mirror, perfect, distinct, and clear, so is the Truth shining in the soul 29 of man. The highest heaven, therefore, is in our own souls; the 30 greatest temple of worship is the human soul, greater than all 31 heavens, says the Vedanta; for in no heaven anywhere, can we 32 understand the reality as distinctly and clearly as in this life, in our 33 own soul. Changing places does not help one much. I thought while 34 I was in India that the cave would give me clearer vision. I found it 35 was not so. Then I thought the forest would do so, then, Varanasi.
36 But the same difficulty existed everywhere, because we make our 37 own worlds. If I am evil, the whole world is evil to me. That is what 38 the Upanishad says. And the same thing applies to all worlds. If I 39 die and go to heaven, I should find the same, for until I am pure it is 40 no use going to caves, or forests, or to Varanasi, or to heaven, and if 41 I have polished my mirror, it does not matter where I live, I get the 42 Reality just as It is.

43 So it is useless, running hither and thither, and spending 44 energy in vain, which should be spent only in polishing the mirror.
45 The same idea is expressed again: "None sees Him, none sees His 46 form with the eyes. It is in the mind, in the pure mind, that He is 47 seen, and thus immortality is gained."

48 Those who were at the summer lectures on Raja-Yoga will be 49 interested to know that what was taught then was a different kind 50 of Yoga. The Yoga which we are now considering consists chiefly in 51 controlling the senses. When the senses are held as slaves by the 52 human soul, when they can no longer disturb the mind, then the 1 Yogi has reached the goal. "When all vain desires of the heart have 2 been given up, then this very mortal becomes immortal, then he 3 becomes one with God even here. When all the knots of the heart 4 are cut asunder, then the mortal becomes immortal, and he enjoys 5 Brahman here." Here, on earth, nowhere else.

6 A few words ought to be said here. You will generally hear 7 that this Vedanta, this philosophy and other Eastern systems, look 8 only to something beyond, letting go the enjoyments and struggle of 9 this life. This idea is entirely wrong. It is only ignorant people who 10 do not know anything of Eastern thought, and never had brain 11 enough to understand anything of its real teaching, that tell you so.
12 On the contrary, we read in our scriptures that our philosophers do 13 not want to go to other worlds, but depreciate them as places 14 where people weep and laugh for a little while only, and then die.
15 As long as we are weak we shall have to go through these 16 experiences; but whatever is true, is here, and that is the human 17 soul. And this also is insisted upon, that by committing suicide, we 18 cannot escape the inevitable; we cannot evade it. But the right path 19 is hard to find. The Hindu is just as practical as the Western, only 20 we differ in our views of life. The one says, build a good house, let 21 us have good clothes and food, intellectual culture, and so on, for 22 this is the whole of life; and in that he is immensely practical. But 23 the Hindu says, true knowledge of the world means knowledge of 24 the soul, metaphysics; and he wants to enjoy that life. In America 25 there was a great agnostic, a very noble man, a very good man, and 26 a very fine speaker. He lectured on religion, which he said was of no 27 use; why bother our heads about other worlds? He employed this 28 simile; we have an orange here, and we want to squeeze all the 29 juice out of it. I met him once and said, "I agree with you entirely. I 30 have some fruit, and I too want to squeeze out the juice. Our 31 difference lies in the choice of the fruit. You want an orange, and I 32 prefer a mango. You think it is enough to live here and eat and 33 drink and have a little scientific knowledge; but you have no right to 34 say that that will suit all tastes. Such a conception is nothing to me.
35 If I had only to learn how an apple falls to the ground, or how an 36 electric current shakes my nerves, I would commit suicide. I want 37 to understand the heart of things, the very kernel itself. Your study 38 is the manifestation of life, mine is the life itself. My philosophy says 39 you must know that and drive out from your mind all thoughts of 40 heaven and hell and all other superstitions, even though they exist 41 in the same sense that this world exists. I must know the heart of 42 this life, its very essence, what it is, not only how it works and what 43 are its manifestations. I want the why of everything. I leave the 44 how to children. As one of your countrymen said, 'While I am 45 smoking a cigarette, if I were to write a book, it would be the 46 science of the cigarette.' It is good and great to be scientific, God 47 bless them in their search; but when a man says that is all, he is 48 talking foolishly, not caring to know the raison d'être of life, never 49 studying existence itself. I may argue that all your knowledge is 50 nonsense, without a basis. You are studying the manifestations of 51 life, and when I ask you what life is, you say you do not know. You 52 are welcome to your study, but leave me to mine."

1 I am practical, very practical, in my own way. So your idea 2 that only the West is practical is nonsense. You are practical in your 3 way, and I in another. There are different types of men and minds. If 4 in the East a man is told that he will find the truth by standing on 5 one leg all his life, he will pursue that method. If in the West men 6 hear that there is a gold mine somewhere in an uncivilised country, 7 thousands will face the dangers there, in the hope of getting the 8 gold; and, perhaps, only one succeeds. The same men have heard 9 that they have souls but are content to leave the care of them to the 10 church. The first man will not go near the savages, he says it may 11 be dangerous. But if we tell him that on the top of a high mountain 12 lives a wonderful sage who can give him knowledge of the soul, he 13 tries to climb up to him, even if he be killed in the attempt. Both 14 types of men are practical, but the mistake lies in regarding this 15 world as the whole of life. Yours is the vanishing point of enjoyment 16 of the senses--there is nothing permanent in it, it only brings more 17 and more misery--while mine brings eternal peace.

18 I do not say your view is wrong, you are welcome to it. Great 19 good and blessing come out of it, but do not, therefore, condemn 20 my view. Mine also is practical in its own way. Let us all work out 21 our own plans. Would to God all of us were equally practical on both 22 sides. I have seen some scientists who were equally practical, both 23 as scientists and as spiritual men, and it is my great hope that in 24 course of time the whole of humanity will be efficient in the same 25 manner. When a kettle of water is coming to the boil, if you watch 26 the phenomena, you find first one bubble rising, and then another 27 and so on, until at last they all join, and a tremendous commotion 28 takes place. This world is very similar. Each individual is like a 29 bubble, and the nations, resemble many bubbles. Gradually these 30 nations are joining, and I am sure the day will come when 31 separation will vanish and that Oneness to which we are all going 32 will become manifest. A time must come when every man will be as 33 intensely practical in the scientific world as in the spiritual, and 34 then that Oneness, the harmony of Oneness, will pervade the whole 35 world. The whole of mankind will become Jivanmuktas--free whilst 36 living. We are all struggling towards that one end through our 37 jealousies and hatreds, through our love and co-operation. A 38 tremendous stream is flowing towards the ocean carrying us all 39 along with it; and though like straws and scraps of paper we may at 40 times float aimlessly about, in the long run we are sure to join the 41 Ocean of Life and Bliss.

THE FREEDOM OF THE SOUL

(Delivered in London, 5th November 1896)

The Katha Upanishad, which we have been studying, was written much later than that to which we now turn--the Chhandogya. The language is more modern, and the thought more organised. In the older Upanishads the language is very archaic, like that of the hymn portion of the Vedas, and one has to wade sometimes through quite a mass of unnecessary things to get at the essential doctrines. The ritualistic literature about which I told you, which forms the second division of the Vedas, has left a good deal of its mark upon this old Upanishad, so that more than half of it is still ritualistic. There is, however, one great gain in studying the very old Upanishads. You trace, as it were, the historical growth of spiritual ideas. In the more recent Upanishads, the spiritual ideas have been collected and brought into one place; as in the Bhagavad-Gita, for instance, which we may, perhaps, look upon as the last of the Upanishads, you do not find any inkling of these ritualistic ideas. The Gita is like a bouquet composed of beautiful flowers of spiritual truths collected from the Upanishads. But in the Gita you cannot study the rise of the spiritual ideas, you cannot trace them to their source. To do that, as has been pointed out by many, you must study the Vedas. The great idea of holiness that has been attached to these books has preserved them, more than any other book in the world, from mutilation. In them, thoughts at their highest and at their lowest have all been preserved, the essential and the non-essential, the most ennobling teachings and the simplest matters of detail stand side by side; for nobody has dared to touch them. Commentators came and tried to smooth them down and to bring out wonderful new ideas from the old things; they tried to find spiritual ideas in even the most ordinary statements, but the texts remained, and as such, they are the most wonderful historical study. We all know that in the scriptures of every religion changes were made to suit the growing spirituality of later times; one word was changed here and another put in there, and so on. This, probably, has not been done with the Vedic literature, or if ever done, it is almost imperceptible. So we have this great advantage, we are able to study thoughts in their original significance, to note how they developed, how from materialistic ideas finer and finer spiritual ideas are evolved, until they attained their greatest height in the Vedanta. Descriptions of some of the old manners and customs are also there, but they do not appear much in the Upanishads. The language used is peculiar, terse, mnemonic.

The writers of these books simply jotted down these lines as helps to remember certain facts which they supposed were already well known. In a narrative, perhaps, which they are telling, they take it for granted that it is well known to everyone they are addressing. Thus a great difficulty arises, we scarcely know the real meaning of any one of these stories, because the traditions have nearly died out, and the little that is left of them has been very much exaggerated. Many new interpretations have been put upon

1 them, so that when you find them in the Puranas they have already 2 become lyrical poems. Just as in the West, we find this prominent 3 fact in the political development of Western races that they cannot 4 bear absolute rule, that they are always trying to prevent any one 5 man from ruling over them, and are gradually advancing to higher 6 and higher democratic ideas, higher and higher ideas of physical 7 liberty, so, in Indian metaphysics, exactly the same phenomenon
8 appears in the development of spiritual life. The multiplicity of gods 9 gave place to one God of the universe, and in the Upanishads there 10 is a rebellion even against that one God. Not only was the idea of 11 many governors of the universe ruling their destinies unbearable, 12 but it was also intolerable that there should be one person ruling 13 this universe. This is the first thing that strikes us. The idea grows 14 and grows, until it attains its climax. In almost all of the 15 Upanishads, we find the climax coming at the last, and that is the 16 dethroning of this God of the universe. The personality of God 17 vanishes, the impersonality comes. God is no more a person, no 18 more a human being, however magnified and exaggerated, who 19 rules this universe, but He has become an embodied principle in 20 every being, immanent in the whole universe. It would be illogical 21 to go from the Personal God to the Impersonal, and at the same 22 time to leave man as a person. So the personal man is broken down, 23 and man as principle is built up. The person is only a phenomenon, 24 the principle is behind it. Thus from both sides, simultaneously, we 25 find the breaking down of personalities and the approach towards 26 principles, the Personal God approaching the Impersonal, the 27 personal man approaching the Impersonal Man. Then come the 28 succeeding stages of the gradual convergence of the two advancing 29 lines of the Impersonal God and the Impersonal Man. And the 30 Upanishads embody the stages through which these two lines at 31 last become one, and the last word of each Upanishad is, "Thou art 32 That". There is but One Eternally Blissful Principle, and that One is 33 manifesting Itself as all this variety.

34 Then came the philosophers. The work of the Upanishads 35 seems to have ended at that point; the next was taken up by the 36 philosophers. The framework was given them by the Upanishads, 37 and they had to fill in the details. So, many questions would 38 naturally arise. Taking for granted that there is but One Impersonal 39 Principle which is manifesting Itself in all these manifold forms, 40 how is it that the One becomes many? It is another way of putting 41 the same old question which in its crude form comes into the 42 human heart as the inquiry into the cause of evil and so forth. Why 43 does evil exist in the world, and what is its cause? But the same 44 question has now become refined, abstracted. No more is it asked 45 from the platform of the senses why we are unhappy, but from the 46 platform of philosophy. How is it that this One Principle becomes 47 manifold? And the answer, as we have seen, the best answer that 48 India has produced is the theory of Maya which says that It really 49 has not become manifold, that It really has not lost any of Its real 50 nature. Manifoldness is only apparent. Man is only apparently a 51 person, but in reality he is the Impersonal Being. God is a person 52 only apparently, but really He is the Impersonal Being.

1 Even in this answer there have been succeeding stages, and 2 philosophers have varied in their opinions. All Indian philosophers 3 did not admit this theory of Maya. Possibly most of them did not.
4 There are dualists, with a crude sort of dualism, who would not 5 allow the question to be asked, but stifled it at its very birth. They 6 said, "You have no right to ask such a question, you have no right to 7 ask for an explanation; it is simply the will of God, and we have to 8 submit to it quietly. There is no liberty for the human soul.
9 Everything is predestined--what we shall do, have, enjoy, and suffer; 10 and when suffering comes, it is our duty to endure it patiently; if we 11 do not, we shall be punished all the more. How do we know that?
12 Because the Vedas say so." And thus they have their texts and their 13 meanings and they want to enforce them.

14 There are others who, though not admitting the Maya theory, 15 stand midway. They say that the whole of this creation forms, as it 16 were, the body of God. God is the Soul of all souls and of the whole 17 of nature. In the case of individual souls, contraction comes from 18 evil doing. When a man does anything evil, his soul begins to 19 contract and his power is diminished and goes on decreasing, until 20 he does good works, when it expands again. One idea seems to be 21 common in all the Indian systems, and I think, in every system in 22 the world, whether they know it or not, and that is what I should 23 call the divinity of man. There is no one system in the world, no real 24 religion, which does not hold the idea that the human soul, 25 whatever it be, or whatever its relation to God, is essentially pure 26 and perfect, whether expressed in the language of mythology, 27 allegory, or philosophy. Its real nature is blessedness and power, not 28 weakness and misery. Somehow or other this misery has come. The 29 crude systems may call it a personified evil, a devil, or an Ahriman, 30 to explain how this misery came. Other systems may try to make a 31 God and a devil in one, who makes some people miserable and 32 others happy, without any reason whatever. Others again, more 33 thoughtful, bring in the theory of Maya and so forth. But one fact 34 stands out clearly, and it is with this that we have to deal. After all, 35 these philosophical ideas and systems are but gymnastics of the 36 mind, intellectual exercises. The one great idea that to me seems to 37 be clear, and comes out through masses of superstition in every 38 country and in every religion, is the one luminous idea that man is 39 divine, that divinity is our nature.

40 Whatever else comes is a mere superimposition, as the 41 Vedanta calls it. Something has been superimposed, but that divine 42 nature never dies. In the most degraded as well as in the most 43 saintly it is ever present. It has to be called out, and it will work 44 itself out. We have to ask, and it will manifest itself. The people of 45 old knew that fire lived in the flint and in dry wood, but friction was 46 necessary to call it out. So this fire of freedom and purity is the 47 nature of every soul, and not a quality, because qualities can be 48 acquired and therefore can be lost. The soul is one with Freedom, 49 and the soul is one with Existence, and the soul is one with 50 Knowledge. The Sat-Chit-Ananda--Existence-Knowledge-Bliss 51 Absolute--is the nature, the birthright of the Soul, and all the 52 manifestations that we see are Its expressions, dimly or brightly

1 manifesting Itself. Even death is but a manifestation of that Real 2 Existence. Birth and death, life and decay, degeneration and 3 regeneration--are all manifestations of that Oneness. So, 4 knowledge, however it manifests itself, either as ignorance or as 5 learning, is but the manifestation of that same Chit, the essence of 6 knowledge; the difference is only in degree, and not in kind. The 7 difference in knowledge between the lowest worm that crawls 8 under our feet and the highest genius that the world may produce is 9 only of degree, and not of kind. The Vedantin thinker boldly says 10 that the enjoyments in this life, even the most degraded joys, are 11 but manifestations of that One Divine Bliss, the Essence of the Soul.

12 This idea seems to be the most prominent in Vedanta, and, as 13 I have said, it appears to me that every religion holds it. I have yet 14 to know the religion which does not. It is the one universal idea 15 working through all religions. Take the Bible for instance. You find 16 there the allegorical statement that the first man Adam was pure, 17 and that his purity was obliterated by his evil deeds afterwards. It is 18 clear from this allegory that they thought that the nature of the 19 primitive man was perfect. The impurities that we see, the 20 weaknesses that we feel, are but superimpositions on that nature, 21 and the subsequent history of the Christian religion shows that they 22 also believe in the possibility, nay, the certainty of regaining that old 23 state. This is the whole history of the Bible, Old and New 24 Testaments together. So with the Mohammedans: they also believed 25 in Adam and the purity of Adam and through Mohammed the way 26 was opened to regain that lost state. So with the Buddhists: they 27 believe in the state called Nirvana which is beyond this relative 28 world.

29 It is exactly the same as the Brahman of the Vedantins, and 30 the whole system of the Buddhists is founded upon the idea of 31 regaining that lost state of Nirvana. In every system we find this 32 doctrine present, that you cannot get anything which is not yours 33 already. You are indebted to nobody in this universe. You claim your 34 own birthright, as it has been most poetically expressed by a great 35 Vedantin philosopher, in the title of one of his books--"The 36 attainment of our own empire". That empire is ours; we have lost it 37 and we have to regain it. The Mayavadin, however, says that this 38 losing of the empire was a hallucination; you never lost it. This is 39 the only difference.

40 Although all the systems agree so far that we had the empire, 41 and that we have lost it, they give us varied advice as to how to 42 regain it. One says that you must perform certain ceremonies, pay 43 certain sums of money to certain idols, eat certain sorts of food, live 44 in a peculiar fashion to regain that empire. Another says that if you 45 weep and prostrate yourselves and ask pardon of some Being 46 beyond nature, you will regain that empire. Again, another says if 47 you love such a Being with all your heart, you will regain that 48 empire. All this varied advice is in the Upanishads. As I go on, you 49 will find it so. But the last and greatest counsel is that you need not 50 weep at all. You need not go through all these ceremonies, and 51 need not take any notice of how to regain your empire, because you 52 never lost it. Why should you go to seek for what you never lost?

1 You are pure already, you are free already. If you think you are free, 2 free you are this moment, and if you think you are bound, bound 3 you will be. This is a very bold statement, and as I told you at the 4 beginning of this course, I shall have to speak to you very boldly. It 5 may frighten you now, but when you think over it, and realise it in 6 your own life, then you will come to know that what I say is true.
7 For, supposing that freedom is not your nature, by no manner of 8 means can you become free. Supposing you were free and in some 9 way you lost that freedom, that shows you were not free to begin 10 with. Had you been free, what could have made you lose it? The 11 independent can never be made dependent; if it is really 12 dependent, its independence was a hallucination.

13 Of the two sides, then, which will you take? If you say that the 14 soul was by its own nature pure and free, it naturally follows that 15 there was nothing in this universe which could make it bound or 16 limited. But if there was anything in nature which could bind the 17 soul, it naturally follows that it was not free, and your statement 18 that it was free is a delusion. So if it is possible for us to attain to 19 freedom, the conclusion is inevitable that the soul is by its nature 20 free. It cannot be otherwise. Freedom means independence of 21 anything outside, and that means that nothing outside itself could 22 work upon it as a cause. The soul is causeless, and from this follow 23 all the great ideas that we have. You cannot establish the 24 immortality of the soul, unless you grant that it is by its nature free, 25 or in other words, that it cannot be acted upon by anything outside.
26 For death is an effect produced by some outside cause. I drink 27 poison and I die, thus showing that my body can be acted upon by 28 something outside that is called poison. But if it be true that the 29 soul is free, it naturally follows that nothing can affect it, and it can 30 never die. Freedom, immortality, blessedness, all depend upon the 31 soul being beyond the law of causation, beyond this Maya. Of these 32 two which will you take? Either make the first a delusion, or make 33 the second a delusion. Certainly I will make the second a delusion.
34 It is more consonant with all my feelings and aspirations. I am 35 perfectly aware that I am free by nature, and I will not admit that 36 this bondage is true and my freedom a delusion.

37 This discussion goes on in all philosophies, in some form or 38 other. Even in the most modern philosophies you find the same 39 discussion arising. There are two parties. One says that there is no 40 soul, that the idea of soul is a delusion produced by the repeated 41 transit of particles of matter, bringing about the combination which 42 you call the body or the brain; that the impression of freedom is the 43 result of the vibrations and motions and continuous transit of these 44 particles. There were Buddhistic sects who held the same view and 45 illustrated it by this example: If you take a torch and whirl it round 46 rapidly, there will be a circle of light. That circle does not really 47 exist, because the torch is changing place every moment. We are 48 but bundles of little particles, which in their rapid whirling produce 49 the delusion of a permanent soul. The other party states that in the 50 rapid succession of thought, matter occurs as a delusion, and does 51 not really exist. So we see one side claiming that spirit is a delusion 52 and the other, that matter is a delusion. Which side will you take?

1 Of course, we will take the spirit and deny matter. The arguments 2 are similar for both, only on the spirit side the argument is little 3 stronger. For nobody has ever seen what matter is. We can only feel 4 ourselves. I never knew a man who could feel matter outside of 5 himself. Nobody was ever able to jump outside of himself. Therefore 6 the argument is a little stronger on the side of the spirit. Secondly, 7 the spirit theory explains the universe, while materialism does not.
8 Hence the materialistic explanation is illogical. If you boil down all 9 the philosophies and analyse them, you will find that they are 10 reduced to one or the other of these two positions. So here, too, in a 11 more intricate form, in a more philosophical form, we find the same 12 question about natural purity and freedom. One side says that the 13 first is a delusion, and the other, that the second is a delusion. And, 14 of course, we side with the second, in believing that our bondage is 15 a delusion.

16 The solution of the Vedanta is that we are not bound, we are 17 free already. Not only so, but to say or to think that we are bound is 18 dangerous--it is a mistake, it is self-hypnotism. As soon as you say, "I 19 am bound," "I am weak," "I am helpless," woe unto you; you rivet 20 one more chain upon yourself. Do not say it, do not think it. I have 21 heard of a man who lived in a forest and used to repeat day and 22 night, "Shivoham"--I am the Blessed One--and one day a tiger fell 23 upon him and dragged him away to kill him; people on the other 24 side of the river saw it, and heard the voice so long as the voice 25 remained in him, saying "Shivoham"--even in the very jaws of the 26 tiger. There have been many such men. There have been cases of 27 men who, while being cut to pieces, have blessed their enemies. "I 28 am He, I am He; and so art thou. I am pure and perfect and so are 29 all my enemies. You are He, and so am I." That is the position of 30 strength. Nevertheless, there are great and wonderful things in the 31 religions of the dualists; wonderful is the idea of the Personal God 32 apart from nature, whom we worship and love. Sometimes this idea 33 is very soothing. But, says the Vedanta, the soothing is something 34 like the effect that comes from an opiate, not natural. It brings 35 weakness in the long run, and what this world wants today, more 36 than it ever did before, is strength. It is weakness, says the 37 Vedanta, which is the cause of all misery in this world. Weakness is 38 the one cause of suffering. We become miserable because we are 39 weak. We lie, steal, kill, and commit other crimes, because we are 40 weak. We suffer because we are weak. We die because we are 41 weak. Where there is nothing to weaken us, there is no death nor 42 sorrow. We are miserable through delusion. Give up the delusion, 43 and the whole thing vanishes. It is plain and simple indeed.
44 Through all these philosophical discussions and tremendous mental 45 gymnastics we come to this one religious idea, the simplest in the 46 whole world.

47 The monistic Vedanta is the simplest form in which you can 48 put truth. To teach dualism was a tremendous mistake made in 49 India and elsewhere, because people did not look at the ultimate 50 principles, but only thought of the process which is very intricate 51 indeed. To many, these tremendous philosophical and logical 52 propositions were alarming. They thought these things could not be 1 made universal, could not be followed in everyday practical life, and 2 that under the guise of such a philosophy much laxity of living 3 would arise.

4 But I do not believe at all that monistic ideas preached to the 5 world would produce immorality and weakness. On the contrary, I 6 have reason to believe that it is the only remedy there is. If this be 7 the truth, why let people drink ditch water when the stream of life 8 is flowing by? If this be the truth, that they are all pure, why not at 9 this moment teach it to the whole world? Why not teach it with the 10 voice of thunder to every man that is born, to saints and sinners, 11 men, women, and children, to the man on the throne and to the man 12 sweeping the streets?

13 It appears now a very big and a very great undertaking; to 14 many it appears very startling, but that is because of superstition, 15 nothing else. By eating all sorts of bad and indigestible food, or by 16 starving ourselves, we are incompetent to eat a good meal. We have 17 listened to words of weakness from our childhood. You hear people 18 say that they do not believe in ghosts, but at the same time, there 19 are very few who do not get a little creepy sensation in the dark. It 20 is simply superstition. So with all religious superstitions. There are 21 people in this country who, if I told them there was no such being 22 as the devil, will think all religion is gone. Many people have said to 23 me, how can there be religion without a devil? How can there be 24 religion without someone to direct us? How can we live without 25 being ruled by somebody? We like to be so treated, because we 26 have become used to it. We are not happy until we feel we have 27 been reprimanded by somebody every day. The same superstition!
28 But however terrible it may seem now, the time will come when we 29 shall look back, each one of us, and smile at every one of those 30 superstitions which covered the pure and eternal soul, and repeat 31 with gladness, with truth, and with strength, I am free, and was 32 free, and always will be free. This monistic idea will come out of 33 Vedanta, and it is the one idea that deserves to live. The scriptures 34 may perish tomorrow. Whether this idea first flashed in the brains 35 of Hebrews or of people living in the Arctic regions, nobody cares.
36 For this is the truth and truth is eternal; and truth itself teaches 37 that it is not the special property of any individual or nation. Men, 38 animals, and gods are all common recipients of this one truth. Let 39 them all receive it. Why make life miserable? Why let people fall 40 into all sorts of superstitions? I will give ten thousand lives, if 41 twenty of them will give up their superstition. Not only in this 42 country, but in the land of its very birth, if you tell people this truth, 43 they are frightened. They say, "This idea is for Sannyasins who give 44 up the world and live in the forests; for them it is all right. But for 45 us poor householders, we must all have some sort of fear, we must 46 have ceremonies," and so on.

47 Dualistic ideas have ruled the world long enough, and this is 48 the result. Why not make a new experiment? It may take ages for 49 all minds to receive monism, but why not begin now? If we have 50 told it to twenty persons in our lives, we have done a great work.

51 There is one idea which often militates against it. It is this. It 52 is all very well to say, "I am the Pure, the Blessed," but I cannot 1 show it always in my life. That is true; the ideal is always very hard.

2 Every child that is born sees the sky overhead very far away, but is 3 that any reason why we should not look towards the sky? Would it
4 mend matters to go towards superstition? If we cannot get nectar, 5 would it mend matters for us to drink poison? Would it be any help 6 for us, because we cannot realise the truth immediately, to go into 7 darkness and yield to weakness and superstition?

8 I have no objection to dualism in many of its forms. I like most 9 of them, but I have objections to every form of teaching which 10 inculcates weakness. This is the one question I put to every man, 11 woman, or child, when they are in physical, mental, or spiritual 12 training. Are you strong? Do you feel strength?--for I know it is 13 truth alone that gives strength. I know that truth alone gives life, 14 and nothing but going towards reality will make us strong, and 15 none will reach truth until he is strong. Every system, therefore, 16 which weakens the mind, makes one superstitious, makes one 17 mope, makes one desire all sorts of wild impossibilities, mysteries, 18 and superstitions, I do not like, because its effect is dangerous.
19 Such systems never bring any good; such things create morbidity in 20 the mind, make it weak, so weak that in course of time it will be 21 almost impossible to receive truth or live up to it. Strength, 22 therefore, is the one thing needful. Strength is the medicine for the 23 world's disease. Strength is the medicine which the poor must have 24 when tyrannised over by the rich. Strength is the medicine that the 25 ignorant must have when oppressed by the learned; and it is the 26 medicine that sinners must have when tyrannised over by other 27 sinners; and nothing gives such strength as this idea of monism.
28 Nothing makes us so moral as this idea of monism. Nothing makes 29 us work so well at our best and highest as when all responsibility is 30 thrown upon ourselves. I challenge everyone of you. How will you 31 behave if I put a little baby in your hands? Your whole life will be 32 changed for the moment; whatever you may be, you must become 33 selfless for the time being. You will give up all your criminal ideas 34 as soon as responsibility is thrown upon you--your whole character 35 will change. So if the whole responsibility is thrown upon our own 36 shoulders, we shall be at our highest and best; when we have 37 nobody to grope towards, no devil to lay our blame upon, no 38 Personal God to carry our burdens, when we are alone responsible, 39 then we shall rise to our highest and best. I am responsible for my 40 fate, I am the bringer of good unto myself, I am the bringer of evil. I 41 am the Pure and Blessed One. We must reject all thoughts that 42 assert the contrary. "I have neither death nor fear, I have neither 43 caste nor creed, I have neither father nor mother nor brother, 44 neither friend nor foe, for I am Existence, Knowledge, and Bliss 45 Absolute; I am the Blissful One, I am the Blissful One. I am not 46 bound either by virtue or vice, by happiness or misery. Pilgrimages 47 and books and ceremonials can never bind me. I have neither 48 hunger nor thirst; the body is not mind, nor am I subject to the 49 superstitions and decay that come to the body, I am Existence, 50 Knowledge, and Bliss Absolute; I am the Blissful One, I am the 51 Blissful One."

52 This, says the Vedanta, is the only prayer that we should

1 have. This is the only way to reach the goal, to tell ourselves, and to 2 tell everybody else, that we are divine. And as we go on repeating 3 this, strength comes. He who falters at first will get stronger and 4 stronger, and the voice will increase in volume until the truth takes 5 possession of our hearts, and courses through our veins, and 6 permeates our bodies. Delusion will vanish as the light becomes 7 more and more effulgent, load after load of ignorance will vanish, 8 and then will come a time when all else has disappeared and the 9 Sun alone shines.

THE COSMOS - The Macrocosm

(Delivered in New York, 19th January 1896)

The flowers that we see all around us are beautiful, beautiful is the rising of the morning sun, beautiful are the variegated hues of nature. The whole universe is beautiful, and man has been enjoying it since his appearance on earth. Sublime and awe-inspiring are the mountains; the gigantic rushing rivers rolling towards the sea, the trackless deserts, the infinite ocean, the starry heavens--all these are awe-inspiring, sublime, and beautiful indeed. The whole mass of existence which we call nature has been acting on the human mind since time immemorial. It has been acting on the thought of man, and as its reaction has come out the question: What are these, whence are they? As far back as the time of the oldest portion of that most ancient human composition, the Vedas, we find the same question asked: "Whence is this? When there was neither aught nor naught, and darkness was hidden in darkness, who projected this universe? How? Who knows the secret?" And the question has come down to us at the present time. Millions of attempts have been made to answer it, yet millions of times it will have to be answered again. It is not that each answer was a failure; every answer to this question contained a part of truth, and this truth gathers strength as time rolls on. I will try to present before you the outline of the answer that I have gathered from the ancient philosophers of India, in harmony with modern knowledge.

We find that in this oldest of questions a few points had been already solved. The first is that there was a time when there was "neither aught nor naught", when this world did not exist; our mother earth with the seas and oceans, the rivers, and mountains, cities and villages, human races, animals, plants, birds, and planets and luminaries, all this infinite variety of creation, had no existence. Are we sure of that? We will try to trace how this conclusion is arrived at. What does man see around him? Take a little plant. He puts a seed in the ground, and later, he finds a plant peep out, lift itself slowly above the ground, and grow and grow, till it becomes a gigantic tree. Then it dies, leaving only the seed. It completes a circle--it comes out of the seed, becomes a tree, and ends in the seed again. Look at a bird, how from the egg it springs, lives its life, and then dies, leaving other eggs, seeds of future birds. So with the animals, so with man. Everything in nature begins, as it were, from certain seeds, certain rudiments, certain fine forms, and becomes grosser and grosser, and develops, going on that way for a certain time, and then again goes back to that fine form, and subsides. The raindrop in which the beautiful sunbeam is playing was drawn in the form of vapour from the ocean, went far away into the air, and reached a region where it changed into water, and dropped down in its present form--to be converted in vapour again. So with everything in nature by which we are surrounded. We know that the huge mountains are being worked upon by glaciers and rivers, which are slowly but surely pounding them and pulverising them into sand, that drifts away into the ocean where it settles down on its bed, layer after layer, becoming hard as rocks, once more to be heaped up into mountains of a future generation. Again they will be

1 pounded and pulverised, and thus the course goes on. From sand 2 rise these mountains; unto sand they go.

3 If it be true that nature is uniform throughout, if it be true,
4 and so far no human experience has contradicted it, that the same 5 method under which a small grain of sand is created, works in 6 creating the gigantic suns and stars and all this universe, if it be 7 true that the whole of this universe is built on exactly the same plan 8 as the atom, if it be true that the same law prevails throughout the 9 universe, then, as it has been said in the Vedas, "Knowing one lump 10 of clay we know the nature of all the clay that is in the universe." 11 Take up a little plant and study its life, and we know the universe as 12 it is. If we know one grain of sand, we understand the secret of the 13 whole universe. Applying this course of reasoning to phenomena, 14 we find, in the first place, that everything is almost similar at the 15 beginning and the end. The mountain comes from the sand, and 16 goes back to the sand; the river comes out of vapour, and goes back 17 to vapour; plant life comes from the seed, and goes back to the 18 seed; human life comes out of human germs, and goes back to 19 human germs. The universe with its stars and planets has come out 20 of a nebulous state and must go back to it. What do we learn from 21 this? That the manifested or the grosser state is the effect, and the 22 finer state the cause. Thousands of years ago, it was demonstrated 23 by Kapila, the great father of all philosophy, that destruction means 24 going back to the cause. If this table here is destroyed, it will go 25 back to its cause, to those fine forms and particles which, 26 combined, made this form which we call a table. If a man dies, he 27 will go back to the elements which gave him his body; if this earth 28 dies, it will go back to the elements which gave it form. This is what 29 is called destruction, going back to the cause. Therefore we learn 30 that the effect is the same as the cause, not different. It is only in 31 another form. This glass is an effect, and it had its cause, and this 32 cause is present in this form. A certain amount of the material 33 called glass plus the force in the hands of the manufacturer, are the 34 causes, the instrumental and the material, which, combined, 35 produced this form called a glass. The force which was in the hands 36 of the manufacturer is present in the glass as the power of 37 adhesion, without which the particles would fall apart; and the 38 glass material is also present. The glass is only a manifestation of 39 these fine causes in a new shape, and if it be broken into pieces, the 40 force which was present in the form of adhesion will go back and 41 join its own element, and the particles of glass will remain the same 42 until they take new forms.

43 Thus we find that the effect is never different from the cause.
44 It is only that this effect is a reproduction of the cause in a grosser 45 form. Next, we learn that all these particular forms which we call 46 plants, animals, or men are being repeated ad infinitum, rising and 47 falling. The seed produces the tree. The tree produces the seed, 48 which again comes up as another tree, and so on and on; there is no 49 end to it. Water-drops roll down the mountains into the ocean, and 50 rise again as vapour, go back to the mountains and again come 51 down to the ocean. So, rising and falling, the cycle goes on. So with 52 all lives, so with all existence that we can see, feel, hear, or 1 imagine. Everything that is within the bounds of our knowledge is 2 proceeding in the same way, like breathing in and breathing out in 3 the human body. Everything in creation goes on in this form, one 4 wave rising, another falling, rising again, falling again. Each wave

5 has its hollow, each hollow has its wave. The same law must apply 6 to the universe taken as a whole, because of its uniformity. This 7 universe must be resolved into its causes; the sun, moon, stars, and 8 earth, the body and mind, and everything in this universe must 9 return to their finer causes, disappear, be destroyed as it were. But 10 they will live in the causes as fine forms. Out of these fine forms 11 they will emerge again as new earths, suns, moons, and stars.

12 There is one fact more to learn about this rising and falling.
13 The seed comes out of the tree; it does not immediately become a 14 tree but has a period of inactivity, or rather, a period of very fine 15 unmanifested action. The seed has to work for some time beneath 16 the soil. It breaks into pieces, degenerates as it were, and 17 regeneration comes out of that degeneration. In the beginning, the 18 whole of this universe has to work likewise for a period in that 19 minute form, unseen and unmanifested, which is called chaos, and 20 out of that comes a new projection. The whole period of one 21 manifestation of the universe--its going down into the finer form, 22 remaining there for some time, and coming out again--is, in 23 Sanskrit, called a Kalpa or Cycle. Next comes a very important 24 question especially for modern times. We see that the finer forms 25 develop slowly and slowly, and gradually becomes grosser and 26 grosser. We have seen that the cause is the same as the effect, and 27 the effect is only the cause in another form. Therefore this whole 28 universe cannot be produced out of nothing. Nothing comes without 29 a cause, and the cause is the effect in another form.

30 Out of what has this universe been produced then? From a 31 preceding fine universe. Out of what has man been produced? The 32 preceding fine form. Out of what has the tree been produced? Out 33 of the seed; the whole of the tree was there in the seed. It comes 34 out and becomes manifest. So, the whole of this universe has been 35 created out of this very universe existing in a minute form. It has 36 been made manifest now. It will go back to that minute form, and 37 again will be made manifest. Now we find that the fine forms slowly 38 come out and become grosser and grosser until they reach their 39 limit, and when they reach their limit they go back further and 40 further, becoming finer and finer again. This coming out of the fine 41 and becoming gross, simply changing the arrangements of its parts, 42 as it were, is what in modern times called evolution. This is very 43 true, perfectly true; we see it in our lives. No rational man can 44 possibly quarrel with these evolutionists. But we have to learn one 45 thing more. We have to go one step further, and what is that? That 46 every evolution is preceded by an involution. The seed is the father 47 of the tree, but another tree was itself the father of the seed. The 48 seed is the fine form out of which the big tree comes, and another 49 big tree was the form which is involved in that seed. The whole of 50 this universe was present in the cosmic fine universe. The little cell, 51 which becomes afterwards the man, was simply the involved man 52 and becomes evolved as a man. If this is clear, we have no quarrel

1 with the evolutionists, for we see that if they admit this step, 2 instead of their destroying religion, they will be the greatest 3 supporters of it.

4 We see then, that nothing can be created out of nothing.
5 Everything exists through eternity, and will exist through eternity.
6 Only the movement is in succeeding waves and hollows, going back 7 to fine forms, and coming out into gross manifestations. This 8 involution and evolution is going on throughout the whole of nature.
9 The whole series of evolution beginning with the lowest 10 manifestation of life and reaching up to the highest, the most 11 perfect man, must have been the involution of something else. The 12 next question is: The involution of what? What was involved? God.
13 The evolutionist will tell you that your idea that it was God is wrong.
14 Why? Because you see God is intelligent, but we find that 15 intelligence develops much later on in the course of evolution. It is 16 in man and the higher animals that we find intelligence, but millions 17 of years have passed in this world before this intelligence came.
18 This objection of the evolutionists does not hold water, as we shall 19 see by applying our theory. The tree comes out of the seed, goes 20 back to the seed; the beginning and the end are the same. The 21 earth comes out of its cause and returns to it. We know that if we 22 can find the beginning we can find the end. E converso, if we find 23 the end we can find the beginning. If that is so, take this whole 24 evolutionary series, from the protoplasm at the one end to the 25 perfect man at the other, and this whole series is one life. In the end 26 we will find the perfect man, so in the beginning it must have been 27 the same. Therefore, the protoplasm was the involution of the 28 highest intelligence. You may not see it but that involved 29 intelligence is what is uncoiling itself until it becomes manifested in 30 the most perfect man. That can be mathematically demonstrated. If 31 the law of conservation of energy is true, you cannot get anything 32 out of a machine unless you put it in there first. The amount of work 33 that you get out of an engine is exactly the same as you have put 34 into it in the form of water and coal, neither more nor less. The 35 work I am doing now is just what I put into me, in the shape of air, 36 food, and other things. It is only a question of change and 37 manifestation. There cannot be added in the economy of this 38 universe one particle of matter or one foot-pound of force, nor can 39 one particle of matter or one foot-pound of force be taken out. If 40 that be the case, what is this intelligence? If it was not present in 41 the protoplasm, it must have come all of a sudden, something 42 coming out of nothing, which is absurd. It, therefore, follows 43 absolutely that the perfect man, the free man, the God-man, who 44 has gone beyond the laws of nature, and transcended everything, 45 who has no more to go through this process of evolution, through 46 birth and death, that man called the "Christ-man" by the Christians, 47 and the "Buddha-man" by the Buddhists, and the "Free" by the 48 Yogis--that perfect man who is at one end of the chain of evolution 49 was involved in the cell of the protoplasm, which is at the other end 50 of the same chain.

51 Applying the same reason to the whole of the universe, we 52 see that intelligence must be the Lord of creation, the cause. What 1 is the most evolved notion that man has of this universe? It is 2 intelligence, the adjustment of part to part, the display of 3 intelligence, of which the ancient design theory was an attempt at 4 expression. The beginning was, therefore, intelligence. At the 5 beginning that intelligence becomes involved, and in the end that 6 intelligence gets evolved. The sum total of the intelligence 7 displayed in the universe must, therefore, be the involved universal 8 intelligence unfolding itself. This universal intelligence is what we 9 call God. Call it by any other name, it is absolutely certain that in 10 the beginning there is that Infinite cosmic intelligence. This cosmic 11 intelligence gets involved, and it manifests, evolves itself, until it 12 becomes the perfect man, the "Christ-man," the "Buddha-man."

13 Then it goes back to its own source. That is why all the scriptures 14 say, "In Him we live and move and have our being." That is why all 15 the scriptures preach that we come from God and go back to God.
16 Do not be frightened by theological terms; if terms frighten you, 17 you are not fit to be philosophers. This cosmic intelligence is what 18 the theologians call God.

19 I have been asked many times, "Why do you use that old 20 word, God?" Because it is the best word for our purpose; you 21 cannot find a better word than that, because all the hopes, 22 aspirations, and happiness of humanity have been centred in that 23 word. It is impossible now to change the word. Words like these 24 were first coined by great saints who realised their import and 25 understood their meaning. But as they become current in society, 26 ignorant people take these words, and the result is that they lose 27 their spirit and glory. The word God has been used from time 28 immemorial, and the idea of this cosmic intelligence, and all that is 29 great and holy, is associated with it. Do you mean to say that 30 because some fool says it is not all right, we should throw it away?
31 Another man may come and say, "Take my word," and another 32 again, "Take my word." So there will be no end to foolish words.
33 Use the old word, only use it in the true spirit, cleanse it of 34 superstition, and realise fully what this great ancient word means.
35 If you understand the power of the laws of association, you will 36 know that these words are associated with innumerable majestic 37 and powerful ideas; they have been used and worshipped by 38 millions of human souls and associated by them with all that is 39 highest and best, all that is rational, all that is lovable, and all that 40 is great and grand in human nature. And they come as suggestions 41 of these associations, and cannot be given up. If I tried to express 42 all these by only telling you that God created the universe, it would 43 have conveyed no meaning to you. Yet, after all this struggle, we 44 have come back to Him, the Ancient and Supreme One.

45 We now see that all the various forms of cosmic energy, such 46 as matter, thought, force, intelligence and so forth, are simply the 47 manifestations of that cosmic intelligence, or, as we shall call it 48 henceforth, the Supreme Lord. Everything that you see, feel, or 49 hear, the whole universe, is His creation, or to be a little more 50 accurate, is His projection; or to be still more accurate, is the Lord 51 Himself. It is He who is shining as the sun and the stars, He is the 52 mother earth. He is the ocean Himself. He comes as gentle

1 showers, He is the gentle air that we breathe in, and He it is who is 2 working as force in the body. He is the speech that is uttered, He is 3 the man who is talking. He is the audience that is here. He is the 4 platform on which I stand, He is the light that enables me to see 5 your faces. It is all He. He Himself is both the material and the 6 efficient cause of this universe, and He it is that gets involved in the 7 minute cell, and evolves at the other end and becomes God again.
8 He it is that comes down and becomes the lowest atom, and slowly 9 unfolding His nature, rejoins Himself. This is the mystery of the 10 universe. "Thou art the man, Thou art the woman, Thou art the 11 strong man walking in the pride of youth, Thou art the old man 12 tottering on crutches, Thou art in everything. Thou art everything, 13 O Lord." This is the only solution of the Cosmos that satisfies the 14 human intellect. In one word, we are born of Him, we live in Him, 15 and unto Him we return.

THE COSMOS - The Microcosm

(Delivered in New York, 26th January 1896)

The human mind naturally wants to get outside, to peer out of the body, as it were, through the channels of the organs. The eye must see, the ear must hear, the senses must sense the external world--and naturally the beauties and sublimities of nature captivate the attention of man first. The first questions that arose in the human soul were about the external world. The solution of the mystery was asked of the sky, of the stars, of the heavenly bodies, of the earth, of the rivers, of the mountains, of the ocean; and in all ancient religions we find traces of how the groping human mind at first caught at everything external. There was a river-god, a sky-god, a cloud-god, a rain-god; everything external, all of which we now call the powers of nature, became metamorphosed, transfigured, into wills, into gods, into heavenly messengers. As the question went deeper and deeper, these external manifestations failed to satisfy the human mind, and finally the energy turned inward, and the question was asked of man's own soul. From the macrocosm the question was reflected back to the microcosm; from the external world the question was reflected to the internal. From analysing the external nature, man is led to analyse the internal; this questioning of the internal man comes with a higher state of civilisation, with a deeper insight into nature, with a higher state of growth.

The subject of discussion this afternoon is this internal man. No question is so near and dear to man's heart as that of the internal man. How many millions of times, in how many countries has this question been asked! Sages and kings, rich and poor, saints and sinners, every man, every woman, all have from time to time asked this question. Is there nothing permanent in this evanescent human life? Is there nothing, they have asked, which does not die away when this body dies? Is there not something living when this frame crumbles into dust? Is there not something which survives the fire which burns the body into ashes? And if so, what is its destiny? Where does it go? Whence did it come? These questions have been asked again and again, and so long as this creation lasts, so long as there are human brains to think, this question will have to be asked. Yet, it is not that the answer did not come; each time the answer came, and as time rolls on, the answer will gain strength more and more. The question was answered once for all thousands of years ago, and through all subsequent time it is being restated, reillustrated, made clearer to our intellect. What we have to do, therefore, is to make a restatement of the answer. We do not pretend to throw any new light on those all-absorbing problems, but only to put before you the ancient truth in the language of modern times, to speak the thoughts of the ancients in the language of the moderns, to speak the thoughts of the philosophers in the language of the people, to speak the thoughts of the angels in the language of man, to speak the thoughts of God in the language of poor humanity, so that man will understand them; for the same divine

1 essence from which the ideas emanated is ever present in man, 2 and, therefore, he can always understand them.

3 I am looking at you. How many things are necessary for this 4 vision? First, the eyes. For if I am perfect in every other way, and 5 yet have no eyes, I shall not be able to see you. Secondly, the real 6 organ of vision. For the eyes are not the organs. They are but the 7 instruments of the vision, and behind them is the real organ, the 8 nerve centre in the brain. If that centre be injured, a man may have 9 the clearest pair of eyes, yet he will not be able to see anything. So, 10 it is necessary that this centre, or the real organ, be there. Thus, 11 with all our senses. The external ear is but the instrument for 12 carrying the vibration of sound inward to the centre. Yet, that is not 13 sufficient. Suppose in your library you are intently reading a book, 14 and the clock strikes, yet you do not hear it. The sound is there, the 15 pulsations in the air are there, the ear and the centre are also 16 there, and these vibrations have been carried through the ear to the 17 centre, and yet you do not hear it. What is wanting? The mind is not 18 there. Thus we see that the third thing necessary is, that the mind 19 must be there. First the external instruments, then the organ to 20 which this external instrument will carry the sensation, and lastly 21 the organ itself must be joined to the mind. When the mind is not 22 joined to the organ, the organ and the ear may take the impression, 23 and yet we shall not be conscious of it. The mind, too, is only the 24 carrier; it has to carry the sensation still forward, and present it to 25 the intellect. The intellect is the determining faculty and decides 26 upon what is brought to it. Still this is not sufficient. The intellect 27 must carry it forward and present the whole thing before the ruler 28 in the body, the human soul, the king on the throne. Before him this 29 is presented, and then from him comes the order, what to do or 30 what not to do; and the order goes down in the same sequence to 31 the intellect, to the mind, to the organs, and the organs convey it to 32 the instruments, and the perception is complete.

33 The instruments are in the external body, the gross body of 34 man; but the mind and the intellect are not. They are in what is 35 called in Hindu philosophy the finer body, and what in Christian 36 theology you read of as the spiritual body of man; finer, very much 37 finer than the body, and yet not the soul. This soul is beyond them 38 all. The external body perishes in a few years; any simple cause 39 may disturb and destroy it. The finer body is not so easily 40 perishable; yet it sometimes degenerates, and at other times 41 becomes strong. We see how, in the old man, the mind loses its 42 strength, how, when the body is vigorous, the mind becomes 43 vigorous, how various medicines and drugs affect it, how everything 44 external acts on it, and how it reacts on the external world. Just as 45 the body has its progress and decadence, so also has the mind, and, 46 therefore, the mind is not the soul, because the soul can neither 47 decay nor degenerate. How can we know that? How can we know 48 that there is something behind this mind? Because knowledge 49 which is self-illuminating and the basis of intelligence cannot 50 belong to dull, dead matter. Never was seen any gross matter which 51 had intelligence as its own essence. No dull or dead matter can 52 illumine itself. It is intelligence that illumines all matter. This hall is 1 here only through intelligence because, as a hall, its existence

2 would be unknown unless some intelligence built it. This body is not 3 self-luminous; if it were, it would be so in a dead man also. Neither 4 can the mind nor the spiritual body be self-luminous. They are not 5 of the essence of intelligence. That which is self-luminous cannot 6 decay. The luminosity of that which shines through a borrowed light 7 comes and goes; but that which is light itself, what can make that 8 come and go, flourish and decay? We see that the moon waxes and 9 wanes, because it shines through the borrowed light of the sun. If a 10 lump of iron is put into the fire and made red-hot, it glows and 11 shines, but its light will vanish, because it is borrowed. So, 12 decadence is possible only of that light which is borrowed and is 13 not of its own essence.

14 Now we see that the body, the external shape, has no light as 15 its own essence, is not self-luminous, and cannot know itself; 16 neither can the mind. Why not? Because the mind waxes and 17 wanes, because it is vigorous at one time and weak at another, 18 because it can be acted upon by anything and everything. Therefore 19 the light which shines through the mind is not its own. Whose is it 20 then? It must belong to that which has it as its own essence, and as 21 such, can never decay or die, never become stronger or weaker; it 22 is self-luminous, it is luminosity itself. It cannot be that the soul 23 knows, it is knowledge. It cannot be that the soul has existence, 24 but it is existence. It cannot be that the soul is happy, it is 25 happiness itself. That which is happy has borrowed its happiness; 26 that which has knowledge has received its knowledge; and that 27 which has relative existence has only a reflected existence.
28 Wherever there are qualities these qualities have been reflected 29 upon the substance, but the soul has not knowledge, existence, and 30 blessedness as its qualities, they are the essence of the soul.

31 Again, it may be asked, why shall we take this for granted?
32 Why shall we admit that the soul has knowledge, blessedness, 33 existence, as its essence, and has not borrowed them? It may be 34 argued, why not say that the soul's luminosity, the soul's 35 blessedness, the soul's knowledge, are borrowed in the same way 36 as the luminosity of the body is borrowed from the mind? The 37 fallacy of arguing in this way will be that there will be no limit.
38 From whom were these borrowed? If we say from some other 39 source, the same question will be asked again. So, at last we shall 40 have to come to one who is self-luminous; to make matters short 41 then, the logical way is to stop where we get self-luminosity, and 42 proceed no further.

43 We see, then, that this human being is composed first of this 44 external covering, the body; secondly, the finer body, consisting of 45 mind, intellect, and egoism. Behind them is the real Self of man. We 46 have seen that all the qualities and powers of the gross body are 47 borrowed from the mind, and the mind, the finer body, borrows its 48 powers and luminosity from the soul, standing behind.

49 A great many questions now arise about the nature of this 50 soul. If the existence of the soul is drawn from the argument that it 51 is self-luminous, that knowledge, existence, blessedness are its 52 essence, it naturally follows that this soul cannot have been

1 created. A self-luminous existence, independent of any other 2 existence, could never have been the outcome of anything. It always 3 existed; there was never a time when it did not exist, because if the 4 soul did not exist, where was time? Time is in the soul; it is when 5 the soul reflects its powers on the mind and the mind thinks, that 6 time comes. When there was no soul, certainly there was no
7 thought, and without thought, there was no time. How can the soul, 8 therefore, be said to be existing in time, when time itself exists in 9 the soul? It has neither birth nor death, but it is passing through all 10 these various stages. It is manifesting slowly and gradually from 11 lower to higher, and so on. It is expressing its own grandeur, 12 working through the mind on the body; and through the body it is 13 grasping the external world and understanding it. It takes up a 14 body and uses it; and when that body has failed and is used up, it 15 takes another body; and so on it goes.

16 Here comes a very interesting question, that question which 17 is generally known as the reincarnation of the soul. Sometimes 18 people get frightened at the idea, and superstition is so strong that 19 thinking men even believe that they are the outcome of nothing, 20 and then, with the grandest logic, try to deduce the theory that 21 although they have come out of zero, they will be eternal ever 22 afterwards. Those that come out of zero will certainly have to go 23 back to zero. Neither you, nor I nor anyone present, has come out 24 of zero, nor will go back to zero. We have been existing eternally, 25 and will exist, and there is no power under the sun or above the sun
26 which can undo your or my existence or send us back to zero. Now 27 this idea of reincarnation is not only not a frightening idea, but is 28 most essential for the moral well-being of the human race.

29 It is the only logical conclusion that thoughtful men can arrive 30 at. If you are going to exist in eternity hereafter, it must be that you 31 have existed through eternity in the past: it cannot be otherwise. I 32 will try to answer a few objections that are generally brought 33 against the theory. Although many of you will think they are very 34 silly objections, still we have to answer them, for sometimes we find 35 that the most thoughtful men are ready to advance the silliest
36 ideas. Well has it been said that there never was an idea so absurd 37 that it did not find philosophers to defend it. The first objection is, 38 why do we not remember our past? Do we remember all our past in 39 this life? How many of you remember what you did when you were 40 babies? None of you remember your early childhood, and if upon 41 memory depends your existence, then this argument proves that 42 you did not exist as babies, because you do not remember your 43 babyhood. It is simply unmitigated nonsense to say that our 44 existence depends on our remembering it. Why should we 45 remember the past? That brain is gone, broken to pieces, and a new 46 brain has been manufactured. What has come to this brain is the 47 resultant, the sum total of the impression acquired in our past, with 48 which the mind has come to inhabit the new body.

49 I, as I stand here, am the effect, the result, of all the infinite 50 past which is tacked on to me. And why is it necessary for me to 51 remember all the past? When a great ancient sage, a seer, or a 52 prophet of old, who came face to face with the truth, says

1 something, these modern men stand up and say, "Oh, he was a 2 fool!" But just use another name, "Huxley says it, or Tyndall"; then 3 it must be true, and they take it for granted. In place of ancient 4 superstitions they have erected modern superstitions, in place of 5 the old Popes of religion they have installed modern Popes of 6 science. So we see that this objection as to memory is not valid, and 7 that is about the only serious objection that is raised against this 8 theory. Although we have seen that it is not necessary for the theory 9 that there shall be the memory of past lives, yet at the same time, 10 we are in a position to assert that there are instances which show 11 that this memory does come, and that each one of us will get back 12 this memory in that life in which he will become free. Then alone 13 you will find that this world is but a dream; then alone you will 14 realise in the soul of your soul that you are but actors and the world 15 is a stage; then alone will the idea of non-attachment come to you 16 with the power of thunder; then all this thirst for enjoyment, this 17 clinging on to life and this world will vanish for ever; then the mind 18 will see clearly as daylight how many times all these existed for 19 you, how many millions of times you had fathers and mothers, sons 20 and daughters, husbands and wives, relatives and friends, wealth 21 and power. They came and went. How many times you were on the 22 topmost crest of the wave, and how many times you were down at 23 the bottom of despair! When memory will bring all these to you, 24 then alone will you stand as a hero and smile when the world 25 frowns upon you. Then alone will you stand up and say, "I care not 26 for thee even, O Death; what terrors hast thou for me?" This will 27 come to all.

28 Are there any arguments, any rational proofs for this 29 reincarnation of the soul? So far we have been giving the negative 30 side, showing that the opposite arguments to disprove it are not 31 valid. Are there any positive proofs? There are; and most valid ones, 32 too. No other theory except that of reincarnation accounts for the 33 wide divergence that we find between man and man in their powers 34 to acquire knowledge. First, let us consider the process by means of 35 which knowledge is acquired. Suppose I go into the street and see a 36 dog. How do I know it is a dog? I refer it to my mind, and in my 37 mind are groups of all my past experiences, arranged and pigeon-38 holed, as it were.

39 As soon as a new impression comes, I take it up and refer it to 40 some of the old pigeon-holes, and as soon as I find a group of the 41 same impressions already existing, I place it in that group, and I am 42 satisfied. I know it is a dog, because it coincides with the 43 impressions already there. When I do not find the cognates of this 44 new experience inside, I become dissatisfied. When, not finding the 45 cognates of an impression, we become dissatisfied, this state of 46 mind is called "ignorance"; but, when, finding the cognates of an 47 impression already existing, we become satisfied, this is called 48 "knowledge". When one apple fell, men became dissatisfied. Then 49 gradually they found out the group. What was the group they 50 found? That all apples fell, so they called it "gravitation". Now we 51 see that without a fund of already existing experience, any new 52 experience would be impossible, for there would be nothing to 1 which to refer the new impression. So, if, as some of the European 2 philosophers think, a child came into the world with what they call 3 tabula rasa, such a child would never attain to any degree of 4 intellectual power, because he would have nothing to which to refer 5 his new experiences. We see that the power of acquiring knowledge 6 varies in each individual, and this shows that each one of us has 7 come with his own fund of knowledge. Knowledge can only be got 8 in one way, the way of experience; there is no other way to know. If 9 we have not experienced it in this life, we must have experienced it 10 in other lives. How is it that the fear of death is everywhere? A little 11 chicken is just out of an egg and an eagle comes, and the chicken 12 flies in fear to its mother. There is an old explanation (I should 13 hardly dignify it by such a name). It is called instinct. What makes 14 that little chicken just out of the egg afraid to die? How is it that as 15 soon as a duckling hatched by a hen comes near water, it jumps into 16 it and swims? It never swam before, nor saw anything swim. People 17 call it instinct. It is a big word, but it leaves us where we were 18 before. Let us study this phenomenon of instinct. A child begins to 19 play on the piano. At first she must pay attention to every key she is 20 fingering, and as she goes on and on for months and years, the 21 playing becomes almost involuntary, instinctive. What was first 22 done with conscious will does not require later on an effort of the 23 will. This is not yet a complete proof. One half remains, and that is 24 that almost all the actions which are now instinctive can be brought 25 under the control of the will. Each muscle of the body can be 26 brought under control. This is perfectly well known. So the proof is 27 complete by this double method, that what we now call instinct is 28 degeneration of voluntary actions; therefore, if the analogy applies 29 to the whole of creation, if all nature is uniform, then what is 30 instinct in lower animals, as well as in men, must be the 31 degeneration of will.

32 Applying the law we dwelt upon under macrocosm, that each 33 involution presupposes an evolution, and each evolution and 34 involution, we see that instinct is involved reason. What we call 35 instinct in men or animals must therefore be involved, degenerated, 36 voluntary actions, and voluntary actions are impossible without 37 experience. Experience started that knowledge, and that 38 knowledge is there. The fear of death, the duckling taking to the 39 water, and all involuntary actions in the human being which have 40 become instinctive, are the results of past experiences. So far we 41 have proceeded very clearly, and so far the latest science is with us.
42 But here comes one more difficulty. The latest scientific men are 43 coming back to the ancient sages, and as far as they have done so, 44 there is perfect agreement. They admit that each man and each 45 animal is born with a fund of experience, and that all these actions 46 in the mind are the result of past experience. "But what," they ask, 47 "is the use of saying that that experience belongs to the soul? Why 48 not say it belongs to the body, and the body alone? Why not say it is 49 hereditary transmission?" This is the last question. Why not say that 50 all the experience with which I am born is the resultant effect of all 51 the past experience of my ancestors? The sum total of the 52 experience from the little protoplasm up to the highest human 53 being is in me, but it has come from body to body in the course of 1 hereditary transmission. Where will the difficulty be? This question 2 is very nice, and we admit some part of this hereditary 3 transmission. How far? As far as furnishing the material. We, by our 4 past actions, conform ourselves to a certain birth in a certain body, 5 and the only suitable material for that body comes from the parents 6 who have made themselves fit to have that soul as their offspring.

7 The simple hereditary theory takes for granted the most 8 astonishing proposition without any proof, that mental experience 9 can be recorded in matters, that mental experience can be involved 10 in matter. When I look at you, in the lake of my mind there is a 11 wave. That wave subsides, but it remains in fine form, as an 12 impression. We understand a physical impression remaining in the 13 body. But what proof is there for assuming that the mental 14 impression can remain in the body, since the body goes to pieces?
15 What carries it? Even granting it were possible for each mental 16 impression to remain in the body, that every impression, beginning 17 from the first man down to my father, was in my father's body, how 18 could it be transmitted to me? Through the bioplasmic cell? How 19 could that be? Because the father's body does not come to the child 20 in toto. The same parents may have a number of children; then, 21 from this theory of hereditary transmission, where the impression 22 and the impressed (that is to say, material) are one, it rigorously 23 follows that by the birth of every child the parents must lose a part 24 of their own impressions, or, if the parents should transmit the 25 whole of their impressions, then, after the birth of the first child, 26 their minds would be a vacuum.

27 Again, if in the bioplasmic cell the infinite amount of 28 impressions from all time has entered, where and how is it? This is 29 a most impossible position, and until these physiologists can prove 30 how and where those impressions live in that cell, and what they 31 mean by a mental impression sleeping in the physical cell, their 32 position cannot be taken for granted. So far it is clear then, that this 33 impression is in the mind, that the mind comes to take its birth and 34 rebirth, and uses the material which is most proper for it, and that 35 the mind which has made itself fit for only a particular kind of body 36 will have to wait until it gets that material. This we understand. The 37 theory then comes to this, that there is hereditary transmission so 38 far as furnishing the material to the soul is concerned. But the soul 39 migrates and manufactures body after body, and each thought we 40 think, and each deed we do, is stored in it in fine forms, ready to 41 spring up again and take a new shape. When I look at you a wave 42 rises in my mind. It dives down, as it were, and becomes finer and 43 finer, but it does not die. It is ready to start up again as a wave in 44 the shape of memory. So all these impressions are in my mind, and 45 when I die the resultant force of them will be upon me. A ball is 46 here, and each one of us takes a mallet in his hands and strikes the 47 ball from all sides; the ball goes from point to point in the room, and 48 when it reaches the door it flies out. What does it carry out with it?
49 The resultant of all these blows. That will give it its direction. So, 50 what directs the soul when the body dies? The resultant, the sum 51 total of all the works it has done, of the thoughts it has thought. If 52 the resultant is such that it has to manufacture a new body for

1 further experience, it will go to those parents who are ready to 2 supply it with suitable material for that body. Thus, from body to 3 body it will go, sometimes to a heaven, and back again to earth,
4 becoming man, or some lower animal. This way it will go on until it
5 has finished its experience, and completed the circle. It then knows 6 its own nature, knows what it is, and ignorance vanishes, its powers 7 become manifest, it becomes perfect; no more is there any 8 necessity for the soul to work through physical bodies, nor is there 9 any necessity for it to work through finer, or mental bodies. It 10 shines in its own light, and is free, no more to be born, no more to 11 die.

12 We will not go now into the particulars of this. But I will bring 13 before you one more point with regard to this theory of 14 reincarnation. It is the theory that advances the freedom of the 15 human soul. It is the one theory that does not lay the blame of all 16 our weakness upon somebody else, which is a common human 17 fallacy. We do not look at our own faults; the eyes do not see 18 themselves, they see the eyes of everybody else. We human beings 19 are very slow to recognise our own weakness, our own faults, so 20 long as we can lay the blame upon somebody else. Men in general 21 lay all the blame of life upon their fellow-men, or, failing that, on 22 God, or they conjure up a ghost, and say it is fate. Where is fate, 23 and who is fate? We reap what we sow. We are the makers of our 24 own fate. None else has the blame, none has the praise. The wind is 25 blowing; those vessels whose sails are unfurled catch it, and go 26 forward on their way, but those which have their sails furled do not 27 catch the wind. Is that the fault of the wind? Is it the fault of the 28 merciful Father, whose wind of mercy is blowing without ceasing, 29 day and night, whose mercy knows no decay, is it His fault that 30 some of us are happy and some unhappy? We make our own 31 destiny. His sun shines for the weak as well as for the strong. His 32 wind blows for saint and sinner alike. He is the Lord of all, the 33 Father of all, merciful, and impartial. Do you mean to say that He, 34 the Lord of creation, looks upon the petty things of our life in the 35 same light as we do? What a degenerate idea of God that would be!
36 We are like little puppies, making life-and-death struggles here and 37 foolishly thinking that even God Himself will take it as seriously as 38 we do. He knows what the puppies' play means. Our attempts to lay 39 the blame on Him, making Him the punisher, and the rewarder, are 40 only foolish. He neither punishes, nor rewards any. His infinite 41 mercy is open to every one, at all times, in all places, under all 42 conditions, unfailing, unswerving. Upon us depends how we use it.
43 Upon us depends how we utilise it. Blame neither man, nor God, 44 nor anyone in the world. When you find yourselves suffering, blame 45 yourselves, and try to do better.

46 This is the only solution of the problem. Those that blame 47 others--and, alas! the number of them is increasing every day--are 48 generally miserable with helpless brains; they have brought 49 themselves to that pass through their own mistakes and blame
50 others, but this does not alter their position. It does not serve them 51 in any way. This attempt to throw the blame upon others only 52 weakens them the more. Therefore, blame none for your own faults,

1 stand upon your own feet, and take the whole responsibility upon 2 yourselves. Say, "This misery that I am suffering is of my own doing, 3 and that very thing proves that it will have to be undone by me
4 alone." That which I created, I can demolish; that which is created 5 by some one else I shall never be able to destroy. Therefore, stand 6 up, be bold, be strong. Take the whole responsibility on your own 7 shoulders, and know that you are the creator of your own destiny.
8 All the strength and succour you want is within yourselves.
9 Therefore, make your own future. "Let the dead past bury its dead."
10 The infinite future is before you, and you must always remember 11 that each word, thought, and deed, lays up a store for you and that 12 as the bad thoughts and bad works are ready to spring upon you 13 like tigers, so also there is the inspiring hope that the good 14 thoughts and good deeds are ready with the power of a hundred 15 thousand angels to defend you always and for ever.

IMMORTALITY

What question has been asked a greater number of times, what idea has led men more to search the universe for an answer, what question is nearer and dearer to the human heart, what question is more inseparably connected with our existence, than this one, the immortality of the human soul? It has been the theme of poets and sages, of priests and prophets; kings on the throne have discussed it, beggars on the street have dreamt of it. The best of humanity have approached it, and the worst of men have not hoped for it. The interest in the theme has not died, yet, nor will it die so long as human nature exists. Various answers have been presented to the world by various minds. Thousands, again, in every period of history have given up the discussion, and yet the question remains fresh as ever. Often in the turmoil and struggle of our lives we seem to forget it, but suddenly some one dies--one, perhaps, whom we loved, one near and dear to our hearts, is snatched away from us--and the struggle, the din and turmoil of the world around us, cease for a moment, and the soul asks the old question, "What after this?" "What becomes of the soul?"

All human knowledge proceeds out of experience; we cannot know anything except by experience. All our reasoning is based upon generalised experience, all our knowledge is but harmonised experience. Looking around us, what do we find? A continuous change. The plant comes out of the seed, grows into the tree, completes the circles, and comes back to the seed. The animal comes, lives a certain time, dies, and completes the circle. So does man. The mountains slowly but surely crumble away, the rivers slowly but surely dry up, rains come out of the sea, and go back to the sea. Everywhere circles are being completed, birth, growth, development, and decay following each other with mathematical precision. This is our everyday experience. Inside of it all, behind all this vast mass of what we call life, of millions of forms and shapes, millions upon millions of varieties, beginning from the lowest atom to the highest spiritualised man, we find existing a certain unity. Every day we find that the wall that was thought to be dividing one thing and another is being broken down, and all matter is coming to be recognised by modern science as one substance, manifesting in different ways and in various forms; the one life that runs through all like a continuous chain, of which all these various forms represent the links, link after link, extending almost infinitely, but of the same one chain. This is what is called evolution. It is an old, old idea, as old as human society, only it is getting fresher and fresher as human knowledge is progressing. There is one thing more, which the ancients perceived, but which in modern times is not yet so clearly perceived, and that is involution. The seed is becoming the plant; a grain of sand never becomes a plant. It is the father that becomes a child; a lump of clay never becomes the child. From what does this evolution come, is the question. What was the seed? It was the same as the tree. All the possibilities of a future tree are in that seed; all the possibilities of a future man are in the little baby; all the possibilities of any future life are in the germ. What is this? The ancient philosophers of India called it involution. We find

1 then, that every evolution presupposes an involution. Nothing can 2 be evolved which is not already there. Here, again, modern science 3 comes to our help. You know by mathematical reasoning that the 4 sum total of the energy that is displayed in the universe is the same 5 throughout. You cannot take away one atom of matter or one foot-
6 pound of force. You cannot add to the universe one atom of matter 7 or one foot-pound of force. As such, evolution does not come out of 8 zero; then, where does it come from? From previous involution. The 9 child is the man involved, and the man is the child evolved. The 10 seed is the tree involved, and the tree is the seed evolved. All the 11 possibilities of life are in the germ. The problem becomes a little 12 clearer. Add to it the first idea of continuation of life. From the 13 lowest protoplasm to the most perfect human being there is really 14 but one life. Just as in one life we have so many various phases of 15 expression, the protoplasm developing into the baby, the child, the 16 young man, the old man, so, from that protoplasm up to the most 17 perfect man we get one continuous life, one chain. This is evolution, 18 but we have seen that each evolution presupposes an involution.
19 The whole of this life which slowly manifests itself evolves itself 20 from the protoplasm to the perfected human being--the Incarnation 21 of God on earth--the whole of this series is but one life, and the 22 whole of this manifestation must have been involved in that very 23 protoplasm. This whole life, this very God on earth, was involved in 24 it and slowly came out, manifesting itself slowly, slowly, slowly. The 25 highest expression must have been there in the germ state in 26 minute form; therefore this one force, this whole chain, is the 27 involution of that cosmic life which is everywhere. It is this one 28 mass of intelligence which, from the protoplasm up to the most 29 perfected man, is slowly and slowly uncoiling itself. Not that it 30 grows. Take off all ideas of growth from your mind. With the idea of 31 growth is associated something coming from outside, something 32 extraneous, which would give the lie to the truth that the Infinite 33 which lies latent in every life is independent of all external 34 conditions. It can never grow; It was always there, and only 35 manifests Itself.

36 The effect is the cause manifested. There is no essential 37 difference between the effect and the cause. Take this glass, for 38 instance. There was the material, and that material plus the will of 39 the manufacturer made the glass; and these two were its causes 40 and are present in it. In what form is the will present? As adhesion.
41 If the force were not here, each particle would fall away. What is 42 the effect then? It is the same as the cause, only taking a different 43 form, a different composition. When the cause is changed and 44 limited for a time, it becomes the effect. We must remember this.
45 Applying it to our idea of life, the whole of the manifestation of this 46 one series, from the protoplasm up to the most perfect man, must 47 be the very same thing as cosmic life. First it got involved and 48 became finer; and out of that fine something, which was the cause, 49 it has gone on evolving, manifesting itself, and becoming grosser.

50 But the question of immortality is not yet settled. We have 51 seen that everything in this universe is indestructible. There is 52 nothing new; there will be nothing new. The same series of 1 manifestations are presenting themselves alternately like a wheel, 2 coming up and going down. All motion in this universe is in the form 3 of waves, successively rising and falling. Systems after systems are 4 coming out of fine forms, evolving themselves, and taking grosser

5 forms, again melting down, as it were, and going back to the fine 6 forms. Again they rise out of that, evolving for a certain period and 7 slowly going back to the cause. So with all life. Each manifestation 8 of life is coming up and then going back again. What goes down?
9 The form. The form breaks to pieces, but it comes up again. In one 10 sense bodies and forms even are eternal. How? Suppose we take a 11 number of dice and throw them, and they fall in this ratio--6--5--3--4.
12 We take the dice up and throw them again and again; there must be 13 a time when the same numbers will come again; the same 14 combination must come. Now each particle, each atom, that is in 15 this universe, I take for such a die, and these are being thrown out 16 and combined again and again. All these forms before you are one 17 combination. Here are the forms of a glass, a table, a pitcher of 18 water, and so forth. This is one combination; in time, it will all 19 break. But there must come a time when exactly the same 20 combination comes again, when you will be here, and this form will 21 be here, this subject will be talked, and this pitcher will be here. An 22 infinite number of times this has been, and an infinite number of 23 times this will be repeated. Thus far with the physical forms. What 24 do we find? That even the combination of physical forms is eternally 25 repeated.

26 A most interesting conclusion that follows from this theory is 27 the explanation of facts such as these: Some of you, perhaps, have 28 seen a man who can read the past life of others and foretell the 29 future. How is it possible for any one to see what the future will be, 30 unless there is a regulated future? Effects of the past will recur in 31 the future, and we see that it is so. You have seen the big Ferris 32 Wheel² in Chicago. The wheel revolves, and the little rooms in the 33 wheel are regularly coming one after another; one set of persons 34 gets into these, and after they have gone round the circle, they get 35 out, and a fresh batch of people gets in. Each one of these batches 36 is like one of these manifestations, from the lowest animals to the 37 highest man. Nature is like the chain of the Ferris Wheel, endless 38 and infinite, and these little carriages are the bodies or forms in 39 which fresh batches of souls are riding, going up higher and higher 40 until they become perfect and come out of the wheel. But the wheel 41 goes on. And so long as the bodies are in the wheel, it can be 42 absolutely and mathematically foretold where they will go, but not 43 so of the souls. Thus it is possible to read the past and the future of 44 nature with precision. We see, then, that there is recurrence of the 45 same material phenomena at certain periods, and that the same 46 combinations have been taking place through eternity. But that is 47 not the immortality of the soul. No force can die, no matter can be

1 annihilated. What becomes of it? It goes on changing, backwards 2 and forwards, until it returns to the source from which it came.
3 There is no motion in a straight line. Everything moves in a circle; a 4 straight line, infinitely produced, becomes a circle. If that is the 5 case, there cannot be eternal degeneration for any soul. It cannot 6 be. Everything must complete the circle, and come back to its 7 source. What are you and I and all these souls? In our discussion of 8 evolution and involution, we have seen that you and I must be part 9 of the cosmic consciousness, cosmic life, cosmic mind, which got 10 involved and we must complete the circle and go back to this 11 cosmic intelligence which is God. This cosmic intelligence is what 12 people call Lord, or God, or Christ, or Buddha, or Brahman, what 13 the materialists perceive as force, and the agnostics as that infinite, 14 inexpressible beyond; and we are all part of that.

15 This is the second idea, yet this is not sufficient; there will be 16 still more doubts. It is very good to say that there is no destruction 17 for any force. But all the forces and forms that we see are 18 combinations. This form before us is a composition of several 19 component parts, and so every force that we see is similarly 20 composite. If you take the scientific idea of force, and call it the sum 21 total, the resultant of several forces, what becomes of your 22 individuality? Everything that is a compound must sooner or later 23 go back to its component parts. Whatever in this universe is the 24 result of the combination of matter or force must sooner or later go 25 back to its components. Whatever is the result of certain causes 26 must die, must be destroyed. It gets broken up, dispersed, and 27 resolved back into its components. Soul is not a force; neither is it 28 thought. It is the manufacturer of thought, but not thought itself; it 29 is the manufacturer of the body, but not the body. Why so? We see 30 that the body cannot be the soul. Why not? Because it is not 31 intelligent. A corpse is not intelligent, nor a piece of meat in a 32 butcher's shop. What do we mean by intelligence? Reactive power.
33 We want to go a little more deeply into this. Here is a pitcher; I see 34 it. How? Rays of light from the pitcher enter my eyes, and make a 35 picture in my retina, which is carried to the brain. Yet there is no 36 vision. What the physiologists call the sensory nerves carry this 37 impression inwards. But up to this there is no reaction. The nerve 38 centre in the brain carries the impression to the mind, and the mind 39 reacts, and as soon as this reaction comes, the pitcher flashes 40 before it. Take a more commonplace example. Suppose you are 41 listening to me intently and a mosquito is sitting on the tip of your 42 nose and giving you that pleasant sensation which mosquitos can 43 give; but you are so intent on hearing me that you do not feel the 44 mosquito at all. What has happened? The mosquito has bitten a 45 certain part of your skin, and certain nerves are there. They have 46 carried a certain sensation to the brain, and the impression is there, 47 but the mind, being otherwise occupied, does not react, so you are 48 not aware of the presence of the mosquito. When a new impression 49 comes, if the mind does not react, we shall not be conscious of it, 50 but when the reaction comes we feel, we see, we hear, and so forth.
51 With this reaction comes illumination, as the Samkhya philosophers 52 call it. We see that the body cannot illuminate, because in the 53 absence of attention no sensation is possible. Cases have been

1 known where, under peculiar conditions, a man who had never 2 learnt a particular language was found able to speak it. Subsequent 3 inquiries proved that the man had, when a child, lived among 4 people who spoke that language and the impressions were left in 5 the brain.

6 These impressions remained stored up there, until through 7 some cause the mind reacted, and illumination came, and then the 8 man was able to speak the language. This shows that the mind 9 alone is not sufficient, that the mind itself is an instrument in the 10 hands of someone. In the case of that boy the mind contained that 11 language, yet he did not know it, but later there came a time when 12 he did. It shows that there is someone besides the mind; and when 13 the boy was a baby, that someone did not use the power; but when 14 the boy grew up, he took advantage of it, and used it. First, here is 15 the body, second, the mind, or instrument of thought, and third 16 behind this mind is the Self of man. The Sanskrit word is Atman. As 17 modern philosophers have identified thought with molecular 18 changes in the brain, they do not know how to explain such a case, 19 and generally deny it. The mind is intimately connected with the 20 brain which dies every time the body changes. The Self is the 21 illuminator, and the mind is the instrument in Its hands, and 22 through that instrument It gets hold of the external instrument, and 23 thus comes perception. The external instruments get hold of the 24 impressions and carry them to the organs, for you must remember 25 always, that the eyes and ears are only receivers--it is the internal 26 organs, the brain centres, which act. In Sanskrit these centres are 27 called Indriyas, and they carry sensations to the mind, and the mind 28 presents them further back to another state of the mind, which in 29 Sanskrit is called Chitta, and there they are organised into will, and 30 all these present them to the King of kings inside, the Ruler on His 31 throne, the Self of man. He then sees and gives His orders. Then 32 the mind immediately acts on the organs, and the organs on the 33 external body. The real Perceiver, the real Ruler, the Governor, the 34 Creator, the Manipulator of all this is the Self of man.

35 We see, then, that the Self of man is not the body, neither is It 36 thought. It cannot be a compound. Why not? Because everything 37 that is a compound can be seen or imagined. That which we cannot 38 imagine or perceive, which we cannot bind together, is not force or 39 matter, cause or effect, and cannot be a compound. The domain of 40 compounds is only so far as our mental universe, our thought 41 universe extends. Beyond this it does not hold good; it is as far as 42 law reigns, and if there is anything beyond law, it cannot be a 43 compound at all. The Self of man being beyond the law of causation, 44 is not a compound. It is ever free and is the Ruler of everything that 45 is within law. It will never die, because death means going back to 46 the component parts, and that which was never a compound can 47 never die. It is sheer nonsense to say It dies.

48 We are now treading on finer and finer ground, and some of 49 you, perhaps, will be frightened. We have seen that this Self, being 50 beyond the little universe of matter and force and thought, is a 51 simple; and as a simple It cannot die. That which does not die 52 cannot live. For life and death are the obverse and reverse of the 1 same coin. Life is another name for death, and death for life. One 2 particular mode of manifestation is what we call life; another 3 particular mode of manifestation of the same thing is what we call 4 death. When the wave rises on the top it is life; and when it falls

5 into the hollow it is death. If anything is beyond death, we naturally 6 see it must also be beyond life. I must remind you of the first 7 conclusion that the soul of man is part of the cosmic energy that 8 exists, which is God. We now find that it is beyond life and death.
9 You were never born, and you will never die. What is this birth and 10 death that we see around us? This belongs to the body only because 11 the soul is omnipresent. "How can that be?" you may ask. "So many 12 people are sitting here, and you say the soul is omnipresent?" What 13 is there, I ask, to limit anything that is beyond law, beyond 14 causation? This glass is limited; it is not omnipresent, because the 15 surrounding matter forces it to take that form, does not allow it to 16 expand. It is conditioned by everything around it, and is, therefore, 17 limited. But that which is beyond law, where there is nothing to act 18 upon it, how can that be limited? It must be omnipresent. You are 19 everywhere in this universe. How is it then that I am born and I am 20 going to die, and all that? That is the talk of ignorance, 21 hallucination of the brain. You were neither born, nor will you die.
22 You have had neither birth, nor will have rebirth, nor life, nor 23 incarnation, nor anything. What do you mean by coming and going?
24 All shallow nonsense. You are everywhere. Then what is this coming 25 and going? It is the hallucination produced by the change of this 26 fine body which you call the mind. That is going on. Just a little 27 speck of cloud passing before the sky. As it moves on and on, it may 28 create the delusion that the sky moves. Sometimes you see a cloud 29 moving before the moon, and you think that the moon is moving.
30 When you are in a train you think the land is flying, or when you are 31 in a boat, you think the water moves. In reality you are neither 32 going nor coming, you are not being born, nor going to be reborn; 33 you are infinite, ever-present, beyond all causation, and ever-free.
34 Such a question is out of place, it is arrant nonsense. How could 35 there be mortality when there was no birth?

36 One step more we will have to take to come to a logical 37 conclusion There is no half-way house. You are metaphysicians, and 38 there is no crying quarter. If then we are beyond all law, we must be 39 omniscient, ever-blessed; all knowledge must be in us and all power 40 and blessedness. Certainly. You are the omniscient, omnipresent 41 being of the universe. But of such beings can there be many? Can 42 there be a hundred thousand millions of the omnipresent being?
43 Certainly not. Then, what becomes of us all? You are only one; there 44 is only one such Self, and that One Self is you. Standing behind this 45 little nature is what we call the Soul. There is only One Being, One 46 Existence, the ever-blessed, the omnipresent, the omniscient, the 47 birthless, the deathless. "Through His control the sky expands, 48 through His control the air breathes, through His control the sun 49 shines, and through His control all live. He is the Reality in nature, 50 He is the Soul of your soul, nay, more, you are He, you are one with 51 Him." Wherever there are two, there is fear, there is danger, there 52 is conflict, there is strife. When it is all One, who is there to hate, 53 who is there to struggle with? When it is all He, with whom can you

1 fight? This explains the true nature of life; this explains the true
2 nature of being. This is perfection, and this is God. As long as you 3 see the many, you are under delusion. "In this world of many he 4 who sees the One, in this ever-changing world he who sees Him 5 who never changes, as the Soul of his own soul, as his own Self, he 6 is free, he is blessed, he has reached the goal." Therefore know that 7 thou art He; thou art the God of this universe, "Tat Tvam Asi" (That 8 thou art). All these various ideas that I am a man or a woman, or 9 sick or healthy, or strong or weak, or that I hate or I love, or have a 10 little power, are but hallucinations. Away with them! What makes 11 you weak? What makes you fear? You are the One Being in the 12 universe. What frightens you? Stand up then and be free. Know that 13 every thought and word that weakens you in this world is the only 14 evil that exists. Whatever makes men weak and fear is the only evil 15 that should be shunned. What can frighten you? If the suns come 16 down, and the moons crumble into dust, and systems after systems 17 are hurled into annihilation, what is that to you? Stand as a rock; 18 you are indestructible. You are the Self, the God of the universe.
19 Say--"I am Existence Absolute, Bliss Absolute, Knowledge Absolute, 20 I am He," and like a lion breaking its cage, break your chain and be 21 free for ever. What frightens you, what holds you down?

22 Only ignorance and delusion; nothing else can bind you. You 23 are the Pure One, the Ever-blessed.

24 Silly fools tell you that you are sinners, and you sit down in a 25 corner and weep. It is foolishness, wickedness, downright rascality 26 to say that you are sinners! You are all God. See you not God and 27 call Him man? Therefore, if you dare, stand on that--mould your 28 whole life on that. If a man cuts your throat, do not say no, for you 29 are cutting your own throat. When you help a poor man, do not feel 30 the least pride. That is worship for you, and not the cause of pride.
31 Is not the whole universe you? Where is there any one that is not 32 you? You are the Soul of this universe. You are the sun, moon, and 33 stars, it is you that are shining everywhere. The whole universe is 34 you. Whom are you going to hate or to fight? Know, then, that thou 35 art He, and model your whole life accordingly; and he who knows 36 this and models his life accordingly will no more grovel in darkness.

THE ATMAN

(Delivered in America)

Many of you have read Max Muller's celebrated book, Three Lectures on the Vedanta Philosophy, and some of you may, perhaps, have read, in German, Professor Deussen's book on the same philosophy. In what is being written and taught in the West about the religious thought of India, one school of Indian thought is principally represented, that which is called Advaitism, the monistic side of Indian religion; and sometimes it is thought that all the teachings of the Vedas are comprised in that one system of philosophy. There are, however, various phases of Indian thought; and, perhaps this non-dualistic form is in the minority as compared with the other phases. From the most ancient times there have been various sects of thought in India, and as there never was a formulated or recognised church or any body of men to designate the doctrines which should be believed by each school, people were very free to choose their own form, make their own philosophy and establish their own sects. We, therefore, find that from the most ancient times India was full of religious sects. At the present time, I do not know how many hundreds of sects we have in India, and several fresh ones are coming into existence every year. It seems that the religious activity of that nation is simply inexhaustible.

Of these various sects, in the first place, there can be made two main divisions, the orthodox and the unorthodox. Those that believe in the Hindu scriptures, the Vedas, as eternal revelations of truth, are called orthodox, and those that stand on the other authorities, rejecting the Vedas, are the heterodox in India. The chief modern unorthodox Hindu sects are the Jains and the Buddhists. Among the orthodox some declare that the scriptures are of a much higher authority than reason; others again say that only that portion of the scriptures which is rational should be taken and the rest rejected.

Of the three orthodox divisions, the Sankhyas, the Naiyayikas, and the Mimamsakas, the former two, although they existed as philosophical schools, failed to form any sect. The one sect that now really covers India is that of the later Mimamsakas or the Vedantists. Their philosophy is called Vedantism. All the schools of Hindu philosophy start from the Vedanta or Upanishads, but the monists took the name to themselves as a specialty, because they wanted to base the whole of their theology and philosophy upon the Vedanta and nothing else. In the course of time the Vedanta prevailed, and all the various sects of India that now exist can be referred to one or other of its schools. Yet these schools are not unanimous in their opinions.

We find that there are three principal variations among the Vedantists. On one point they all agree, that is that they all believe in God. All these Vedantists also believe the Vedas to be the revealed word of God, not exactly in the same sense, perhaps, as the Christians or Mohammedans believe, but in a very peculiar sense. Their idea is that the Vedas are an expression of the knowledge of God, and as God is eternal, His knowledge is eternally

1 with Him, and so are the Vedas eternal. There is another common 2 ground of belief: that of creation in cycles, that the whole of 3 creation appears and disappears; that it is projected and becomes 4 grosser and grosser, and at the end of an incalculable period of 5 time it becomes finer and finer, when it dissolves and subsides, and 6 then comes a period of rest. Again it begins to appear and goes 7 through the same process. They postulate the existence of a 8 material which they call Akasha, which is something like the ether 9 of the scientists, and a power which they call Prana. About this 10 Prana they declare that by its vibration the universe is produced.
11 When a cycle ends, all this manifestation of nature becomes finer 12 and finer and dissolves into that Akasha which cannot be seen or 13 felt, yet out of which everything is manufactured. All the forces that 14 we see in nature, such as gravitation, attraction, and repulsion, or 15 as thought, feeling, and nervous motion--all these various forces 16 resolve into that Prana, and the vibration of the Prana ceases. In 17 that state it remains until the beginning of the next cycle. Prana 18 then begins to vibrate, and that vibration acts upon the Akasha, and 19 all these forms are thrown out in regular succession.

20 The first school I will tell you about is styled the dualistic 21 school. The dualists believe that God, who is the creator of the 22 universe and its ruler, is eternally separate from nature, eternally 23 separate from the human soul. God is eternal; nature is eternal; so 24 are all souls. Nature and the souls become manifested and change, 25 but God remains the same. According to the dualists, again, this 26 God is personal in that He has qualities, not that He has a body. He 27 has human attributes; He is merciful, He is just, He is powerful, He 28 is almighty, He can be approached, He can be prayed to, He can be 29 loved, He loves in return, and so forth. In one word, He is a human 30 God, only infinitely greater than man; He has none of the evil 31 qualities which men have. "He is the repository of an infinite 32 number of blessed qualities"--that is their definition. He cannot 33 create without materials, and nature is the material out of which He 34 creates the whole universe. There are some non-Vedantic dualists, 35 called "Atomists", who believe that nature is nothing but an infinite 36 number of atoms, and God's will, acting upon these atoms, creates.
37 The Vedantists deny the atomic theory; they say it is perfectly 38 illogical. The indivisible atoms are like geometrical points without 39 parts or magnitude; but something without parts or magnitude, if 40 multiplied an infinite number of times, will remain the same.
41 Anything that has no parts will never make something that has 42 parts; any number of zeros added together will not make one single 43 whole number. So, if these atoms are such that they have no parts 44 or magnitude, the creation of the universe is simply impossible out 45 of such atoms. Therefore, according to the Vedantic dualists, there 46 is what they call indiscrete or undifferentiated nature, and out of 47 that God creates the universe. The vast mass of Indian people are 48 dualists. Human nature ordinarily cannot conceive of anything 49 higher. We find that ninety per cent of the population of the earth 50 who believe in any religion are dualists. All the religions of Europe 51 and Western Asia are dualistic; they have to be. The ordinary man 52 cannot think of anything which is not concrete. He naturally likes to 53 cling to that which his intellect can grasp. That is to say, he can only 1 conceive of higher spiritual ideas by bringing them down to his own

2 level. He can only grasp abstract thoughts by making them 3 concrete. This is the religion of the masses all over the world. They 4 believe in a God who is entirely separate from them, a great king, a 5 high, mighty monarch, as it were. At the same time they make Him
6 purer than the monarchs of the earth; they give Him all good 7 qualities and remove the evil qualities from Him. As if it were ever 8 possible for good to exist without evil; as if there could be any 9 conception of light without a conception of darkness!

10 With all the dualistic theories the first difficulty is, how is it 11 possible that under the rule of a just and merciful God, the 12 repository of an infinite number of good qualities, there can be so 13 many evils in this world? This question arose in all dualistic 14 religions, but the Hindus never invented a Satan as an answer to it.
15 The Hindus with one accord laid the blame on man, and it was easy 16 for them to do so. Why? Because, as I have just now told you, they 17 did not believe that souls were created out of nothing. We see in 18 this life that we can shape and form our future; every one of us, 19 every day, is trying to shape the morrow. Today we fix the fate of the 20 morrow; tomorrow we shall fix the fate of the day after, and so on.
21 It is quite logical that this reasoning can be pushed backward too. If 22 by our own deeds we shape our destiny in the future, why not apply 23 the same rule to the past? If, in an infinite chain, a certain number 24 of links are alternately repeated, then, if one of these groups of 25 links be explained, we can explain the whole chain. So, in this 26 infinite length of time, if we can cut off one portion and explain that 27 portion and understand it, then, if it be true that nature is uniform, 28 the same explanation must apply to the whole chain of time. If it be 29 true that we are working out our own destiny here within this short 30 space of time, if it be true that everything must have a cause as we 31 see it now, it must also be true that that which we are now is the 32 effect of the whole of our past; therefore, no other person is 33 necessary to shape the destiny of mankind but man himself. The 34 evils that are in the world are caused by none else but ourselves.
35 We have caused all this evil; and just as we constantly see misery 36 resulting from evil actions, so can we also see that much of the 37 existing misery in the world is the effect of the past wickedness of 38 man. Man alone, therefore, according to this theory, is responsible.
39 God is not to blame, He, the eternally merciful Father, is not to 40 blame at all. "We reap what we sow."

41 Another peculiar doctrine of the dualists, is, that every soul 42 must eventually come to salvation. No one will be left out. Through 43 various vicissitudes, through various sufferings and enjoyments, 44 each one of them will come out in the end. Come out of what? The 45 one common idea of all Hindu sects is that all souls have to get out 46 of this universe. Neither the universe which we see and feel, nor 47 even an imaginary one, can be right, the real one, because both are 48 mixed up with good and evil. According to the dualists, there is 49 beyond this universe a place full of happiness and good only; and 50 when that place is reached, there will be no more necessity of being 51 born and reborn, of living and dying; and this idea is very dear to 52 them. No more disease there, and no more death. There will be

1 eternal happiness, and they will be in the presence of God for all 2 time and enjoy Him for ever. They believe that all beings, from the 3 lowest worm up to the highest angels and gods, will all, sooner or 4 later, attain to that world where there will be no more misery. But 5 our world will never end; it goes on infinitely, although moving in 6 waves. Although moving in cycles it never ends. The number of 7 souls that are to be saved, that are to be perfected, is infinite. Some 8 are in plants, some are in the lower animals, some are in men, some 9 are in gods, but all of them, even in the highest gods, are imperfect, 10 are in bondage. What is the bondage? The necessity of being born 11 and the necessity of dying. Even the highest gods die. What are 12 these gods? They mean certain states, certain offices. For instance, 13 Indra the king of gods, means a certain office; some soul which was 14 very high has gone to fill that post in this cycle, and after this cycle 15 he will be born again as man and come down to this earth, and the 16 man who is very good in this cycle will go and fill that post in the 17 next cycle. So with all these gods; they are certain offices which 18 have been filled alternately by millions and millions of souls, who, 19 after filling those offices, came down and become men. Those who 20 do good works in this world and help others, but with an eye to 21 reward, hoping to reach heaven or to get the praise of their fellow-22 men, must when they die, reap the benefit of those good works-- 23 they become these gods. But that is not salvation; salvation never 24 will come through hope of reward. Whatever man desires the Lord 25 gives him. Men desire power, they desire prestige, they desire 26 enjoyments as gods, and they get these desires fulfilled, but no 27 effect of work can be eternal. The effect will be exhausted after a 28 certain length of time; it may be aeons, but after that it will be 29 gone, and these gods must come down again and become men and 30 get another chance for liberation. The lower animals will come up 31 and become men, become gods, perhaps, then become men again, 32 or go back to animals, until the time when they will get rid of all 33 desire for enjoyment, the thirst for life, this clinging on to the "me 34 and mine". This "me and mine" is the very root of all the evil in the 35 world. If you ask a dualist, "Is your child yours?" he will say, "It is 36 God's. My property is not mine, it is God's." Everything should be 37 held as God's.

38 Now, these dualist sects in India are great vegetarians, great 39 preachers of non-killing of animals. But their ideas about it is quite 40 different from that of the Buddhist. If you ask a Buddhist, "Why do 41 you preach against killing any animal?" he will answer, "We have no 42 right to take any life;" and if you ask a dualist, "Why do you not kill 43 any animal?" he says, "Because it is the Lord's." So the dualist says 44 that this "me and mine" is to be applied to God and God alone; He is 45 the only "me" and everything is His. When a man has come to the 46 state when he has no "me and mine," when everything is given up 47 to the Lord, when he loves everybody and is ready even to give up 48 his life for an animal, without any desire for reward, then his heart 49 will be purified, and when the heart has been purified, into that 50 heart will come the love of God. God is the centre of attraction for 51 every soul, and the dualist says, "A needle covered up with clay will 52 not be attracted by a magnet, but as soon as the clay is washed off, 53 it will be attracted." God is the magnet and human soul is the 1 needle, and its evil works, the dirt and dust that cover it. As soon as 2 the soul is pure it will by natural attraction come to God and remain 3 with Him for ever, but remain eternally separate. The perfected 4 soul, if it wishes, can take any form; it is able to take a hundred 5 bodies, if it wishes, or have none at all, if it so desires. It becomes 6 almost almighty, except that it cannot create; that power belongs to 7 God alone. None, however perfect, can manage the affairs of the 8 universe; that function belongs to God. But all souls, when they 9 become perfect, become happy for ever and live eternally with God.

10 This is the dualistic statement.

11 One other idea the dualists preach. They protest against the 12 idea of praying to God, "Lord, give me this and give me that." They 13 think that should not be done. If a man must ask some material gift, 14 he should ask inferior beings for it; ask one of these gods, or angels 15 or a perfected being for temporal things. God is only to be loved. It 16 is almost a blasphemy to pray to God, "Lord, give me this, and give 17 me that." According to the dualists, therefore, what a man wants, 18 he will get sooner or later, by praying to one of the gods; but if he 19 wants salvation, he must worship God. This is the religion of the 20 masses of India.

21 The real Vedanta philosophy begins with those known as the 22 qualified non-dualists. They make the statement that the effect is 23 never different from the cause; the effect is but the cause 24 reproduced in another form. If the universe is the effect and God 25 the cause, it must be God Himself--it cannot be anything but that.
26 They start with the assertion that God is both the efficient and the 27 material cause of the universe; that He Himself is the creator, and 28 He Himself is the material out of which the whole of nature is 29 projected. The word "creation" in your language has no equivalent 30 in Sanskrit, because there is no sect in India which believes in 31 creation, as it is regarded in the West, as something coming out of 32 nothing. It seems that at one time there were a few that had some 33 such idea, but they were very quickly silenced. At the present time I 34 do not know of any sect that believes this. What we mean by 35 creation is projection of that which already existed. Now, the whole 36 universe, according to this sect, is God Himself. He is the material 37 of the universe. We read in the Vedas, "As the Urnanabhi (spider) 38 spins the thread out of its own body,...even so the whole universe 39 has come out of the Being."

40 If the effect is the cause reproduced, the question is: "How is 41 it that we find this material, dull, unintelligent universe produced 42 from a God, who is not material, but who is eternal intelligence?
43 How, if the cause is pure and perfect, can the effect be quite 44 different?" What do these qualified non-dualists say? Theirs is a 45 very peculiar theory. They say that these three existences, God, 46 nature, and the soul, are one. God is, as it were, the Soul, and 47 nature and souls are the body of God. Just as I have a body and I
48 have a soul, so the whole universe and all souls are the body of God, 49 and God is the Soul of souls. Thus, God is the material cause of the 50 universe. The body may be changed--may be young or old, strong or 51 weak--but that does not affect the soul at all. It is the same eternal 52 existence, manifesting through the body. Bodies come and go, but

1 the soul does not change. Even so the whole universe is the body of 2 God, and in that sense it is God. But the change in the universe
3 does not affect God. Out of this material He creates the universe, 4 and at the end of a cycle His body becomes finer, it contracts; at the 5 beginning of another cycle it becomes expanded again, and out of it 6 evolve all these different worlds.

7 Now both the dualists and qualified non-dualists admit that 8 the soul is by its nature pure, but through its own deeds it becomes 9 impure. The qualified non-dualists express it more beautifully than 10 the dualists, by saying that the soul's purity and perfection become 11 contracted and again become manifest, and what we are now trying 12 to do is to remanifest the intelligence, the purity, the power which is 13 natural to the soul. Souls have a multitude of qualities, but not that 14 of almightiness or all-knowingness. Every wicked deed contracts 15 the nature of the soul, and every good deed expands it, and these 16 souls, are all parts of God. "As from a blazing fire fly millions of 17 sparks of the same nature, even so from this Infinite Being, God, 18 these souls have come." Each has the same goal. The God of the 19 qualified non-dualists is also a Personal God, the repository of an 20 infinite number of blessed qualities, only He is interpenetrating 21 everything in the universe. He is immanent in everything and 22 everywhere; and when the scriptures say that God is everything, it 23 means that God is interpenetrating everything, not that God has 24 become the wall, but that God is in the wall. There is not a particle, 25 not an atom in the universe where He is not. Souls are all limited; 26 they are not omnipresent. When they get expansion of their powers 27 and become perfect, there is no more birth and death for them;
28 they live with God for ever.

29 Now we come to Advaitism, the last and, what we think, the 30 fairest flower of philosophy and religion that any country in any age 31 has produced, where human thought attains its highest expression 32 and even goes beyond the mystery which seems to be impenetrable.
33 This is the non-dualistic Vedantism. It is too abstruse, too elevated 34 to be the religion of the masses. Even in India, its birthplace, where 35 it has been ruling supreme for the last three thousand years, it has 36 not been able to permeate the masses. As we go on we shall find 37 that it is difficult for even the most thoughtful man and woman in 38 any country to understand Advaitism. We have made ourselves so 39 weak; we have made ourselves so low. We may make great claims, 40 but naturally we want to lean on somebody else. We are little, weak 41 plants, always wanting a support. How many times I have been 42 asked for a "comfortable religion!" Very few men ask for the truth, 43 fewer dare to learn the truth, and fewest of all dare to follow it in 44 all its practical bearings. It is not their fault; it is all weakness of 45 the brain. Any new thought, especially of a high kind, creates a 46 disturbance, tries to make a new channel, as it were, in the brain 47 matter, and that unhinges the system, throws men off their balance.
48 They are used to certain surroundings, and have to overcome a 49 huge mass of ancient superstitions, ancestral superstition, class 50 superstition, city superstition, country superstition, and behind all, 51 the vast mass of superstition that is innate in every human being.
52 Yet there are a few brave souls in the world who dare to conceive

1 the truth, who dare to take it up, and who dare to follow it to the 2 end.

3 What does the Advaitist declare? He says, if there is a God, 4 that God must be both the material and the efficient cause of the 5 universe. Not only is He the creator, but He is also the created. He 6 Himself is this universe. How can that be? God, the pure, the spirit, 7 has become the universe? Yes, apparently so. That which all 8 ignorant people see as the universe does not really exist. What are 9 you and I and all these things we see? Mere self-hypnotism; there is 10 but one Existence, the Infinite, the Ever-blessed One. In that 11 Existence we dream all these various dreams. It is the Atman, 12 beyond all, the Infinite, beyond the known, beyond the knowable; in 13 and through That we see the universe. It is the only Reality. It is 14 this table; It is the audience before me; It is the wall; It is 15 everything, minus the name and form. Take away the form of the 16 table, take away the name; what remains is It. The Vedantist does 17 not call It either He or She--these are fictions, delusions of the 18 human brain--there is no sex in the soul. People who are under 19 illusion, who have become like animals, see a woman or a man; 20 living gods do not see men or women. How can they who are 21 beyond everything have any sex idea? Everyone and everything is 22 the Atman--the Self--the sexless, the pure, the ever-blessed. It is the 23 name, the form, the body, which are material, and they make all this 24 difference. If you take away these two differences of name and 25 form, the whole universe is one; there are no two, but one 26 everywhere. You and I are one. There is neither nature, nor God, 27 nor the universe, only that one Infinite Existence, out of which, 28 through name and form, all these are manufactured. How to know 29 the Knower? It cannot be known. How can you see your own Self?
30 You can only reflect yourself. So all this universe is the reflection of 31 that One Eternal Being, the Atman, and as the reflection falls upon 32 good or bad reflectors, so good or bad images are cast up. Thus in 33 the murderer, the reflector is bad and not the Self. In the saint the 34 reflector is pure. The Self--the Atman--is by Its own nature pure. It 35 is the same, the one Existence of the universe that is reflecting 36 Itself from the lowest worm to the highest and most perfect being.
37 The whole of this universe is one Unity, one Existence, physically, 38 mentally, morally and spiritually. We are looking upon this one 39 Existence in different forms and creating all these images upon It.
40 To the being who has limited himself to the condition of man, It 41 appears as the world of man. To the being who is on a higher plane 42 of existence, It may seem like heaven. There is but one Soul in the 43 universe, not two. It neither comes nor goes. It is neither born, nor 44 dies, nor reincarnates. How can It die? Where can It go? All these 45 heavens, all these earths, and all these places are vain imaginations 46 of the mind. They do not exist, never existed in the past, and never 47 will exist in the future.

48 I am omnipresent, eternal. Where can I go? Where am I not 49 already? I am reading this book of nature. Page after page I am 50 finishing and turning over, and one dream of life after another goes 51 away. Another page of life is turned over; another dream of life 52 comes, and it goes away, rolling and rolling, and when I have

1 finished my reading, I let it go and stand aside, I throw away the 2 book, and the whole thing is finished. What does the Advaitist
3 preach? He dethrones all the gods that ever existed, or ever will 4 exist in the universe and places on that throne the Self of man, the 5 Atman, higher than the sun and the moon, higher than the heavens, 6 greater than this great universe itself. No books, no scriptures, no 7 science can ever imagine the glory of the Self that appears as man, 8 the most glorious God that ever was, the only God that ever existed, 9 exists, or ever will exist. I am to worship, therefore, none but 10 myself. "I worship my Self," says the Advaitist. To whom shall I bow 11 down? I salute my Self. To whom shall I go for help? Who can help 12 me, the Infinite Being of the universe? These are foolish dreams, 13 hallucinations; who ever helped any one? None. Wherever you see a 14 weak man, a dualist, weeping and wailing for help from somewhere 15 above the skies, it is because he does not know that the skies also 16 are in him. He wants help from the skies, and the help comes. We 17 see that it comes; but it comes from within himself, and he mistakes 18 it as coming from without. Sometimes a sick man lying on his bed 19 may hear a tap on the door. He gets up and opens it and finds no 20 one there. He goes back to bed, and again he hears a tap. He gets 21 up and opens the door. Nobody is there. At last he finds that it was 22 his own heartbeat which he fancied was a knock at the door. Thus 23 man, after this vain search after various gods outside himself, 24 completes the circle, and comes back to the point from which he 25 started --the human soul, and he finds that the God whom he was 26 searching in hill and dale, whom he was seeking in every brook, in 27 every temple, in churches and heavens, that God whom he was 28 even imagining as sitting in heaven and ruling the world, is his own 29 Self. I am He, and He is I. None but I was God, and this little I 30 never existed.

31 Yet, how could that perfect God have been deluded? He never 32 was. How could a perfect God have been dreaming? He never 33 dreamed. Truth never dreams. The very question as to whence this 34 illusion arose is absurd. Illusion arises from illusion alone. There 35 will be no illusion as soon as the truth is seen. Illusion always rests 36 upon illusion; it never rests upon God, the Truth, the Atman. You 37 are never in illusion; it is illusion that is in you, before you. A cloud 38 is here; another comes and pushes it aside and takes its place. Still 39 another comes and pushes that one away. As before the eternal 40 blue sky, clouds of various hue and colour come, remain for a short 41 time and disappear, leaving it the same eternal blue, even so are 42 you, eternally pure, eternally perfect. You are the veritable Gods of 43 the universe; nay, there are not two--there is but One. It is a 44 mistake to say, "you and I"; say "I". It is I who am eating in millions 45 of mouths; how can I be hungry? It is I who am working through an 46 infinite number of hands; how can I be inactive? It is I who am 47 living the life of the whole universe; where is death for me? I am 48 beyond all life, beyond all death. Where shall I seek for freedom? I 49 am free by my nature. Who can bind me--the God of this universe?
50 The scriptures of the world are but little maps, wanting to delineate 51 my glory, who am the only existence of the universe. Then what are 52 these books to me? Thus says the Advaitist.

1 "Know the truth and be free in a moment." All the darkness
2 will then vanish. When man has seen himself as one with the 3 Infinite Being of the universe, when all separateness has ceased, 4 when all men and women, all gods and angels, all animals and 5 plants, and the whole universe have melted into that Oneness, then 6 all fear disappears. Can I hurt myself? Can I kill myself? Can I
7 injure myself? Whom to fear? Can you fear yourself? Then will all 8 sorrow disappear. What can cause me sorrow? I am the One 9 Existence of the universe. Then all jealousies will disappear; of 10 whom to be jealous? Of myself? Then all bad feelings disappear.
11 Against whom can I have bad feeling? Against myself? There is 12 none in the universe but I. And this is the one way, says the 13 Vedantist, to Knowledge. Kill out this differentiation, kill out this 14 superstition that there are many. "He who in this world of many 15 sees that One, he who in this mass of insentiency sees that one 16 Sentient Being, he who in this world of shadows catches that 17 Reality, unto him belongs eternal peace, unto none else, unto none 18 else."

19 These are the salient points of the three steps which Indian 20 religious thought has taken in regard to God. We have seen that it 21 began with the Personal, the extra-cosmic God. It went from the 22 external to the internal cosmic body, God immanent in the universe, 23 and ended in identifying the soul itself with that God, and making 24 one Soul, a unit of all these various manifestations in the universe.
25 This is the last word of the Vedas. It begins with dualism, goes 26 through a qualified monism and ends in perfect monism. We know 27 how very few in this world can come to the last, or even dare 28 believe in it, and fewer still dare act according to it. Yet we know 29 that therein lies the explanation of all ethics, of all morality and all 30 spirituality in the universe. Why is it that everyone says, "Do good 31 to others?" Where is the explanation? Why is it that all great men 32 have preached the brotherhood of mankind, and greater men the 33 brotherhood of all lives? Because whether they were conscious of it 34 or not, behind all that, through all their irrational and personal 35 superstitions, was peering forth the eternal light of the Self denying 36 all manifoldness, and asserting that the whole universe is but one.

37 Again, the last word gave us one universe, which through the 38 senses we see as matter, through the intellect as souls, and through 39 the spirit as God. To the man who throws upon himself veils, which 40 the world calls wickedness and evil, this very universe will change 41 and become a hideous place; to another man, who wants 42 enjoyments, this very universe will change its appearance and 43 become a heaven, and to the perfect man the whole thing will 44 vanish and become his own Self.

45 Now, as society exists at the present time, all these three 46 stages are necessary; the one does not deny the other, one is simply 47 the fulfilment of the other. The Advaitist or the qualified Advaitist 48 does not say that dualism is wrong; it is a right view, but a lower 49 one. It is on the way to truth; therefore let everybody work out his 50 own vision of this universe, according to his own ideas. Injure none, 51 deny the position of none; take man where he stands and, if you 52 can, lend him a helping hand and put him on a higher platform, but

1 do not injure and do not destroy. All will come to truth in the long 2 run. "When all the desires of the heart will be vanquished, then this 3 very mortal will become immortal"--then the very man will become 4 God.

THE ATMAN: ITS BONDAGE AND FREEDOM

(Delivered in America)

According to the Advaita philosophy, there is only one thing real in the universe, which it calls Brahman; everything else is unreal, manifested and manufactured out of Brahman by the power of Maya. To reach back to that Brahman is our goal. We are, each one of us, that Brahman, that Reality, plus this Maya. If we can get rid of this Maya or ignorance, then we become what we really are. According to this philosophy, each man consists of three parts--the body, the internal organ or the mind, and behind that, what is called the Atman, the Self. The body is the external coating and the mind is the internal coating of the Atman who is the real perceiver, the real enjoyer, the being in the body who is working the body by means of the internal organ or the mind.

The Atman is the only existence in the human body which is immaterial. Because it is immaterial, it cannot be a compound, and because it is not a compound, it does not obey the law of cause and effect, and so it is immortal. That which is immortal can have no beginning because everything with a beginning must have an end. It also follows that it must be formless; there cannot be any form without matter. Everything that has form must have a beginning and an end. We have none of us seen a form which had not a beginning and will not have an end. A form comes out of a combination of force and matter. This chair has a peculiar form, that is to say a certain quantity of matter is acted upon by a certain amount of force and made to assume a particular shape. The shape is the result of a combination of matter and force. The combination cannot be eternal; there must come to every combination a time when it will dissolve. So all forms have a beginning and an end. We know our body will perish; it had a beginning and it will have an end. But the Self having no form, cannot be bound by the law of beginning and end. It is existing from infinite time; just as time is eternal, so is the Self of man eternal. Secondly, it must be all-pervading. It is only form that is conditioned and limited by space; that which is formless cannot be confined in space. So, according to Advaita Vedanta, the Self, the Atman, in you, in me, in every one, is omnipresent. You are as much in the sun now as in this earth, as much in England as in America. But the Self acts through the mind and the body, and where they are, its action is visible.

Each work we do, each thought we think, produces an impression, called in Sanskrit Samskara, upon the mind and the sum total of these impressions becomes the tremendous force which is called "character". The character of a man is what he has created for himself; it is the result of the mental and physical actions that he has done in his life. The sum total of the Samskaras is the force which gives a man the next direction after death. A man dies; the body falls away and goes back to the elements; but the Samskaras remain, adhering to the mind which, being made of fine material, does not dissolve, because the finer the material, the more persistent it is. But the mind also dissolves in the long run, and that is what we are struggling for. In this connection, the best

1 illustration that comes to my mind is that of the whirlwind. Different 2 currents of air coming from different directions meet and at the 3 meeting-point become united and go on rotating; as they rotate, 4 they form a body of dust, drawing in bits of paper, straw, etc., at one 5 place, only to drop them and go on to another, and so go on 6 rotating, raising and forming bodies out of the materials which are 7 before them.

8 Even so the forces, called Prana in Sanskrit, come together 9 and form the body and the mind out of matter, and move on until 10 the body falls down, when they raise other materials to make 11 another body, and when this falls, another rises, and thus the 12 process goes on. Force cannot travel without matter. So when the 13 body falls down, the mind-stuff remains, Prana in the form of 14 Samskaras acting on it; and then it goes on to another point, raises 15 up another whirl from fresh materials, and begins another motion; 16 and so it travels from place to place until the force is all spent; and 17 then it falls down, ended. So when the mind will end, be broken to 18 pieces entirely, without leaving any Samskara, we shall be entirely 19 free, and until that time we are in bondage; until then the Atman is 20 covered by the whirl of the mind, and imagines it is being taken 21 from place to place. When the whirl falls down, the Atman finds that 22 It is all-pervading. It can go where It likes, is entirely free, and is 23 able to manufacture any number of minds or bodies It likes; but 24 until then It can go only with the whirl. This freedom is the goal 25 towards which we are all moving.

26 Suppose there is a ball in this room, and we each have a 27 mallet in our hands and begin to strike the ball, giving it hundreds 28 of blows, driving it from point to point, until at last it flies out of the 29 room. With what force and in what direction will it go out? These 30 will be determined by the forces that have been acting upon it all 31 through the room. All the different blows that have been given will 32 have their effects. Each one of our actions, mental and physical, is 33 such a blow. The human mind is a ball which is being hit. We are 34 being hit about this room of the world all the time, and our passage 35 out of it is determined by the force of all these blows. In each case, 36 the speed and direction of the ball is determined by the hits it has 37 received; so all our actions in this world will determine our future 38 birth. Our present birth, therefore, is the result of our past. This is 39 one case: suppose I give you an endless chain, in which there is a 40 black link and a white link alternately, without beginning and 41 without end, and suppose I ask you the nature of the chain. At first 42 you will find a difficulty in determining its nature, the chain being 43 infinite at both ends, but slowly you find out it is a chain. You soon 44 discovered that this infinite chain is a repetition of the two links, 45 black and white, and these multiplied infinitely become a whole 46 chain. If you know the nature of one of these links, you know the 47 nature of the whole chain, because it is a perfect repetition. All our 48 lives, past, present, and future, form, as it were, an infinite chain, 49 without beginning and without end, each link of which is one life, 50 with two ends, birth and death. What we are and do here is being 51 repeated again and again, with but little variation. So if we know 52 these two links, we shall know all the passages we shall have to 1 pass through in this world. We see, therefore, that our passage into 2 this world has been exactly determined by our previous passages.

3 Similarly we are in this world by our own actions. Just as we go out 4 with the sum total of our present actions upon us, so we see that we 5 come into it with the sum total of our past actions upon us; that 6 which takes us out is the very same thing that brings us in. What 7 brings us in? Our past deeds. What takes us out? Our own deeds 8 here, and so on and on we go. Like the caterpillar that takes the 9 thread from its own mouth and builds its cocoon and at last finds 10 itself caught inside the cocoon, we have bound ourselves by our 11 own actions, we have thrown the network of our actions around 12 ourselves. We have set the law of causation in motion, and we find it 13 hard to get ourselves out of it. We have set the wheel in motion, and 14 we are being crushed under it. So this philosophy teaches us that 15 we are uniformly being bound by our own actions, good or bad.

16 The Atman never comes nor goes, is never born nor dies. It is 17 nature moving before the Atman, and the reflection of this motion is 18 on the Atman; and the Atman ignorantly thinks it is moving, and not 19 nature. When the Atman thinks that, it is in bondage; but when it 20 comes to find it never moves, that it is omnipresent, then freedom 21 comes. The Atman in bondage is called Jiva. Thus you see that when 22 it is said that the Atman comes and goes, it is said only for facility of 23 understanding, just as for convenience in studying astronomy you 24 are asked to suppose that the sun moves round the earth, though 25 such is not the case. So the Jiva, the soul, comes to higher or lower 26 states. This is the well-known law of reincarnation; and this law 27 binds all creation.

28 People in this country think it too horrible that man should 29 come up from an animal. Why? What will be the end of these 30 millions of animals? Are they nothing? If we have a soul, so have 31 they, and if they have none, neither have we. It is absurd to say that 32 man alone has a soul, and the animals none. I have seen men worse 33 than animals.

34 The human soul has sojourned in lower and higher forms, 35 migrating from one to another, according to the Samskaras or 36 impressions, but it is only in the highest form as man that it attains 37 to freedom. The man form is higher than even the angel form, and 38 of all forms it is the highest; man is the highest being in creation, 39 because he attains to freedom.

40 All this universe was in Brahman, and it was, as it were, 41 projected out of Him, and has been moving on to go back to the 42 source from which it was projected, like the electricity which comes 43 out of the dynamo, completes the circuit, and returns to it. The 44 same is the case with the soul. Projected from Brahman, it passed 45 through all sorts of vegetable and animal forms, and at last it is in 46 man, and man is the nearest approach to Brahman. To go back to 47 Brahman from which we have been projected is the great struggle 48 of life. Whether people know it or not does not matter. In the 49 universe, whatever we see of motion, or struggles in mineral or 50 plants or animals is an effort to come back to the centre and be at 51 rest. There was an equilibrium, and that has been destroyed; and 52 all parts and atoms and molecules are struggling to find their lost

1 equilibrium again. In this struggle they are combining and re-
2 forming, giving rise to all the wonderful phenomena of nature. All 3 struggles and competitions in animal life, plant life, and everywhere 4 else, all social struggles and wars are but expressions of that 5 eternal struggle to get back to that equilibrium.

6 The going from birth to death, this travelling, is what is called 7 Samsara in Sanskrit, the round of birth and death literally. All 8 creation, passing through this round, will sooner or later become 9 free. The question may be raised that if we all shall come to 10 freedom, why should we struggle to attain it? If every one is going 11 to be free, we will sit down and wait. It is true that every being will 12 become free, sooner or later; no one can be lost. Nothing can come 13 to destruction; everything must come up. If that is so, what is the 14 use of our struggling? In the first place, the struggle is the only 15 means that will bring us to the centre, and in the second place, we 16 do not know why we struggle. We have to. "Of thousands of men 17 some are awakened to the idea that they will become free." The 18 vast masses of mankind are content with material things, but there 19 are some who awake, and want to get back, who have had enough 20 of this playing, down here. These struggle consciously, while the 21 rest do it unconsciously.

22 The alpha and omega of Vedanta philosophy is to "give up the 23 world," giving up the unreal and taking the real. Those who are 24 enamoured of the world may ask, "Why should we attempt to get 25 out of it, to go back to the centre? Suppose we have all come from 26 God, but we find this world is pleasurable and nice; then why 27 should we not rather try to get more and more of the world? Why 28 should we try to get out of it?" They say, look at the wonderful 29 improvements going on in the world every day, how much luxury is 30 being manufactured for it. This is very enjoyable. Why should we go 31 away, and strive for something which is not this? The answer is that 32 the world is certain to die, to be broken into pieces and that many 33 times we have had the same enjoyments. All the forms which we 34 are seeing now have been manifested again and again, and the 35 world in which we live has been here many times before. I have 36 been here and talked to you many times before. You will know that 37 it must be so, and the very words that you have been listening to 38 now, you have heard many times before. And many times more it 39 will be the same. Souls were never different, the bodies have been 40 constantly dissolving and recurring. Secondly, these things 41 periodically occur. Suppose here are three or four dice, and when 42 we throw them, one come up five, another four, another three, and 43 another two. If you keep on throwing, there must come times when 44 those very same numbers will recur. Go on throwing, and no matter 45 how long may be the interval, those numbers must come again. It 46 cannot be asserted in how many throws they will come again; this is 47 the law of chance. So with souls and their associations. However 48 distant may be the periods, the same combinations and dissolutions 49 will happen again and again. The same birth, eating and drinking, 50 and then death, come round again and again. Some never find 51 anything higher than the enjoyments of the world, but those who 52 want to soar higher find that these enjoyments are never final, are 1 only by the way.

2 Every form, let us say, beginning from the little worm and 3 ending in man, is like one of the cars of the Chicago Ferris Wheel
4 which is in motion all the time, but the occupants change. A man
5 goes into a car, moves with the wheel, and comes out. The wheel
6 goes on and on. A soul enters one form, resides in it for a time, then 7 leaves it and goes into another and quits that again for a third. Thus 8 the round goes on till it comes out of the wheel and becomes free.

9 Astonishing powers of reading the past and the future of a 10 man's life have been known in every country and every age. The 11 explanation is that so long as the Atman is within the realm of 12 causation--though its inherent freedom is not entirely lost and can 13 assert itself, even to the extent of taking the soul out of the causal 14 chain, as it does in the case of men who become free--its actions are 15 greatly influenced by the causal law and thus make it possible for 16 men, possessed with the insight to trace the sequence of effects, to 17 tell the past and the future.

18 So long as there is desire or want, it is a sure sign that there 19 is imperfection. A perfect, free being cannot have any desire. God 20 cannot want anything. If He desires, He cannot be God. He will be 21 imperfect. So all the talk about God desiring this and that, and 22 becoming angry and pleased by turns is babies' talk, but means 23 nothing. Therefore it has been taught by all teachers, "Desire 24 nothing, give up all desires and be perfectly satisfied."

25 A child comes into the world crawling and without teeth, and 26 the old man gets out without teeth and crawling. The extremes are 27 alike, but the one has no experience of the life before him, while the 28 other has gone through it all. When the vibrations of ether are very 29 low, we do not see light, it is darkness; when very high, the result is 30 also darkness. The extremes generally appear to be the same, 31 though one is as distant from the other as the poles. The wall has 32 no desires, so neither has the perfect man. But the wall is not 33 sentient enough to desire, while for the perfect man there is 34 nothing to desire. There are idiots who have no desires in this 35 world, because their brain is imperfect. At the same time, the 36 highest state is when we have no desires, but the two are opposite 37 poles of the same existence. One is near the animal, and the other 38 near to God.

THE REAL AND THE APPARENT MAN

(Delivered in New York)

Here we stand, and our eyes look forward sometimes miles ahead. Man has been doing that since he began to think. He is always looking forward, looking ahead. He wants to know where he goes even after the dissolution of his body. Various theories have been propounded, system after system has been brought forward to suggest explanations. Some have been rejected, while others have been accepted, and thus it will go on, so long as man is here, so long as man thinks. There is some truth in each of these systems. There is a good deal of what is not truth in all of them. I shall try to place before you the sum and substance, the result, of the inquiries in this line that have been made in India. I shall try to harmonise the various thoughts on this subject, as they have come up from time to time among the Indian philosophers. I shall try to harmonise the psychologists and the metaphysicians, and, if possible, I shall harmonise them with modern scientific thinkers also.

The one theme of Vedanta philosophy is the search after unity. The Hindu mind does not care for the particular; it is always after the general, nay, the universal. "What is that, by knowing which everything else is to be known?" That is the one theme. "As through the knowledge of one lump of clay all that is of clay is known, so, what is that, by knowing which this whole universe itself will be known?" That is the one search. The whole of this universe, according to the Hindu philosophers, can be resolved into one material, which they call Akasha. Everything that we see around us, feel, touch, taste, is simply a differentiated manifestation of this Akasha. It is all-pervading, fine. All that we call solids, liquids, or gases, figures, forms, or bodies, the earth, sun, moon, and stars--everything is composed of this Akasha.

What force is it which acts upon this Akasha and manufactures this universe out of it? Along with Akasha exists universal power; all that is power in the universe, manifesting as force or attraction--nay, even as thought--is but a different manifestation of that one power which the Hindus call Prana. This Prana, acting on Akasha, is creating the whole of this universe. In the beginning of a cycle, this Prana, as it were, sleeps in the infinite ocean of Akasha. It existed motionless in the beginning. Then arises motion in this ocean of Akasha by the action of this Prana, and as this Prana begins to move, to vibrate, out of this ocean come the various celestial systems, suns, moons, stars, earth, human beings, animals, plants, and the manifestations of all the various forces and phenomena. Every manifestation of power, therefore, according to them, is this Prana. Every material manifestation is Akasha. When this cycle will end, all that we call solid will melt away into the next form, the next finer or the liquid form; that will melt into the gaseous, and that into finer and more uniform heat vibrations, and all will melt back into the original Akasha, and what we now call attraction, repulsion, and motion, will slowly resolve into the original Prana. Then this Prana is said to sleep for a period, again to emerge and to throw out all those forms; and when this period will

1 end, the whole thing will subside again. Thus this process of 2 creation is going down, and coming up, oscillating backwards and 3 forwards. In the language of modern science, it is becoming static 4 during one period, and during another period it is becoming 5 dynamic. At one time it becomes potential, and at the next period it 6 becomes active. This alteration has gone on through eternity.

7 Yet, this analysis is only partial. This much has been known 8 even to modern physical science. Beyond that, the research of 9 physical science cannot reach. But the inquiry does not stop in 10 consequence. We have not yet found that one, by knowing which 11 everything else will be known. We have resolved the whole universe 12 into two components, into what are called matter and energy, or 13 what the ancient philosophers of India called Akasha and Prana.
14 The next step is to resolve this Akasha and the Prana into their 15 origin. Both can be resolved into the still higher entity which is 16 called mind. It is out of mind, the Mahat, the universally existing 17 thought-power, that these two have been produced. Thought is a 18 still finer manifestation of being than either Akasha or Prana. It is 19 thought that splits itself into these two. The universal thought 20 existed in the beginning, and that manifested, changed, evolved 21 itself into these two Akasha and Prana: and by the combination of 22 these two the whole universe has been produced.

23 We next come to psychology. I am looking at you. The external 24 sensations are brought to me by the eyes; they are carried by the 25 sensory nerves to the brain. The eyes are not the organs of vision.
26 They are but the external instruments, because if the real organ 27 behind, that which carries the sensation to the brain, is destroyed, I 28 may have twenty eyes, yet I cannot see you. The picture on the 29 retina may be as complete as possible, yet I shall not see you.
30 Therefore, the organ is different from its instruments; behind the 31 instruments, the eyes, there must be the organ. So it is with all the 32 sensations. The nose is not the sense of smell; it is but the 33 instrument, and behind it is the organ. With every sense we have, 34 there is first the external instrument in the physical body; behind 35 that, in the same physical body, there is the organ; yet these are not 36 sufficient. Suppose I am talking to you, and you are listening to me 37 with close attention. Something happens, say, a bell rings; you will 38 not, perhaps, hear the bell ring. The pulsations of that sound came 39 to your ear, struck the tympanum, the impression was carried by 40 the nerve into the brain; if the whole process was complete up to 41 carrying the impulse to the brain, why did you not hear? Something 42 else was wanting--the mind was not attached to the organ. When 43 the mind detaches itself from the organ, the organ may bring any 44 news to it, but the mind will not receive it. When it attaches itself 45 to the organ, then alone is it possible for the mind to receive the news.
46 Yet, even that does not complete the whole. The instruments may 47 bring the sensation from outside, the organs may carry it inside, the 48 mind may attach itself to the organ, and yet the perception may not 49 be complete. One more factor is necessary; there must be a 50 reaction within. With this reaction comes knowledge. That which is 51 outside sends, as it were, the current of news into my brain. My 52 mind takes it up, and presents it to the intellect, which groups it in

1 relation to pre-received impressions and sends a current of 2 reaction, and with that reaction comes perception. Here, then, is 3 the will. The state of mind which reacts is called Buddhi, the 4 intellect. Yet, even this does not complete the whole. One step more 5 is required. Suppose here is a camera and there is a sheet of cloth, 6 and I try to throw a picture on that sheet. What am I to do? I am to 7 guide various rays of light through the camera to fall upon the 8 sheet and become grouped there. Something is necessary to have 9 the picture thrown upon, which does not move. I cannot form a 10 picture upon something which is moving; that something must be 11 stationary, because the rays of light which I throw on it are moving, 12 and these moving rays of light, must be gathered, unified, co-
13 ordinated, and completed upon something which is stationary.
14 Similar is the case with the sensations which these organs of ours 15 are carrying inside and presenting to the mind, and which the mind 16 in its turn is presenting to the intellect. This process will not be 17 complete unless there is something permanent in the background 18 upon which the picture, as it were, may be formed, upon which we 19 may unify all the different impressions. What is it that gives unity to 20 the changing whole of our being? What is it that keeps up the 21 identity of the moving thing moment after moment? What is it upon 22 which all our different impressions are pieced together, upon which 23 the perceptions, as it were, come together, reside, and form a 24 united whole? We have found that to serve this end there must be 25 something, and we also see that that something must be, relatively 26 to the body and mind, motionless. The sheet of cloth upon which the 27 camera throws the picture is, relatively to the rays of light, 28 motionless, else there will be no picture. That is to say, the 29 perceiver must be an individual. This something upon which the 30 mind is painting all these pictures, this something upon which our 31 sensations, carried by the mind and intellect, are placed and 32 grouped and formed into a unity, is what is called the soul of man.

33 We have seen that it is the universal cosmic mind that splits
34 itself into the Akasha and Prana, and beyond mind we have found 35 the soul in us. In the universe, behind the universal mind, there is a 36 Soul that exists, and it is called God. In the individual it is the soul 37 of man. In this universe, in the cosmos, just as the universal mind 38 becomes evolved into Akasha and Prana, even so, we may find that 39 the Universal Soul Itself becomes evolved as mind. Is it really so 40 with the individual man? Is his mind the creator of his body, and his 41 soul the creator of his mind? That is to say, are his body, his mind, 42 and his soul three different existences or are they three in one or, 43 again, are they different states of existence of the same unit being?
44 We shall gradually try to find an answer to this question. The first 45 step that we have now gained is this: here is this external body, 46 behind this external body are the organs, the mind, the intellect, 47 and behind this is the soul. At the first step, we have found, as it 48 were, that the soul is separate from the body, separate from the 49 mind itself.

50 Opinions in the religious world become divided at this point, 51 and the departure is this. All those religious views which generally 52 pass under the name of dualism hold that this soul is qualified, that 1 it is of various qualities, that all feelings of enjoyment, pleasure, 2 and pain really belong to the soul. The non-dualists deny that the 3 soul has any such qualities; they say it is unqualified.

4 Let me first take up the dualists, and try to present to you 5 their position with regard to the soul and its destiny; next, the 6 system that contradicts them; and lastly, let us try to find the 7 harmony which non-dualism will bring to us. This soul of man, 8 because it is separate from the mind and body, because it is not 9 composed of Akasha and Prana, must be immortal. Why? What do 10 we mean by mortality? Decomposition. And that is only possible for 11 things that are the result of composition; anything that is made of 12 two or three ingredients must become decomposed. That alone 13 which is not the result of composition can never become 14 decomposed, and, therefore, can never die. It is immortal. It has 15 been existing throughout eternity; it is uncreate. Every item of 16 creation is simply a composition; no one ever saw creation come out 17 of nothing. All that we know of creation is the combination of 18 already existing things into newer forms. That being so, this soul of 19 man, being simple, must have been existing for ever, and it will 20 exist for ever. When this body falls off, the soul lives on. According 21 to the Vedantists, when this body dissolves, the vital forces of the 22 man go back to his mind and the mind becomes dissolved, as it 23 were, into the Prana, and that Prana enters the soul of man, and the 24 soul of man comes out, clothed, as it were, with what they call the 25 fine body, the mental body, or spiritual body, as you may like to call 26 it. In this body are the Samskaras of the man. What are the 27 Samskaras? This mind is like a lake, and every thought is like a 28 wave upon that lake. Just as in the lake waves rise and then fall 29 down and disappear, so these thought-waves are continually rising 30 in the mind-stuff and then disappearing, but they do not disappear 31 for ever. They become finer and finer, but they are all there, ready 32 to start up at another time when called upon to do so. Memory is 33 simply calling back into wave-form some of those thoughts which 34 have gone into that finer state of existence. Thus, everything that 35 we have thought, every action that we have done, is lodged in the 36 mind; it is all there in fine form, and when a man dies, the sum total 37 of these impressions is in the mind, which again works upon a little 38 fine material as a medium. The soul, clothed as it were, with these 39 impressions and the fine body, passes out, and the destiny of the 40 soul is guided by the resultant of all the different forces 41 represented by the different impressions. According to us, there are 42 three different goals for the soul.

43 Those that are very spiritual, when they die, follow the solar 44 rays and reach what is called the solar sphere, through which they 45 reach what is called the lunar sphere and through that they reach 46 what is called the sphere of lightning, and there they meet with 47 another soul who is already blessed, and he guides the new-comer 48 forward to the highest of all spheres, which is called the 49 Brahmaloka, the sphere of Brahma. There these souls attain to 50 omniscience and omnipotence, become almost as powerful and all-51 knowing as God Himself; and they reside there for ever, according 52 to the dualists, or, according to the non-dualists, they become one

1 with the Universal at the end of the cycle. The next class of 2 persons, who have been doing good work with selfish motives, are 3 carried by the results of their good works, when they die, to what is 4 called lunar sphere, where there are various heavens, and there 5 they acquire fine bodies, the bodies of gods. They become gods and 6 live there and enjoy the blessing of heaven for a long period; and 7 after that period is finished, the old Karma is again upon them, and 8 so they fall back again to the earth; they come down through the 9 spheres of air and clouds and all these various regions, and, at last, 10 reach the earth through raindrops. There on the earth they attach 11 themselves to some cereal which is eventually eaten by some man 12 who is fit to supply them with material to make a new body. The last 13 class, namely, the wicked, when they die, become ghosts or 14 demons, and live somewhere between the lunar sphere and this 15 earth. Some try to disturb mankind, some are friendly; and after 16 living there for some time they also fall back to the earth and 17 become animals. After living for some time in an animal body they 18 get released, and come back, and become men again, and thus get 19 one more chance to work out their salvation. We see, then, that 20 those who have nearly attained to perfection, in whom only very 21 little of impurity remains, go to the Brahmaloaka through the rays of 22 the sun; those who were a middling sort of people, who did some 23 good work here with the idea of going to heaven, go to the heavens 24 in the lunar sphere and there obtain god-bodies; but they have 25 again to become men and so have one more chance to become 26 perfect. Those that are very wicked become ghosts and demons, 27 and then they may have to become animals; after that they become 28 men again and get another chance to perfect themselves. This earth 29 is called the Karma-Bhumi, the sphere of Karma. Here alone man 30 makes his good or bad Karma. When a man wants to go to heaven 31 and does good works for that purpose, he becomes as good and 32 does not as such store up any bad Karma. He just enjoys the effects 33 of the good work he did on earth; and when this good Karma is 34 exhausted, there comes upon him the resultant force of all the evil 35 Karma he had previously stored up in life, and that brings him down 36 again to this earth. In the same way, those that become ghosts 37 remain in that state, not giving rise to fresh Karma, but suffer the 38 evil results of their past misdeeds, and later on remain for a time in 39 an animal body without causing any fresh Karma. When that period 40 is finished, they too become men again. The states of reward and 41 punishment due to good and bad Karmas are devoid of the force 42 generating fresh Karma; they have only to be enjoyed or suffered. If 43 there is an extraordinarily good or an extraordinarily evil Karma, it 44 bears fruit very quickly. For instance, if a man has been doing many 45 evil things all his life, but does one good act, the result of that good 46 act will immediately appear, but when that result has been gone 47 through, all the evil acts must produce their results also. All men 48 who do certain good and great acts, but the general tenor of whose 49 lives has not been correct, will become gods; and after living for 50 some time in god-bodies, enjoying the powers of gods, they will 51 have again to become men; when the power of the good acts is thus 52 finished, the old evil comes up to be worked out. Those who do 53 extraordinarily evil acts have to put on ghost and devil bodies, and 1 when the effect of those evil actions is exhausted, the little good 2 action which remains associated with them, makes them again

3 become men. The way to Brahmaloaka, from which there is no more 4 fall or return, is called Devayana, i.e. the way to God; the way to 5 heaven is known as Pitriyana, i.e. the way to the fathers.

6 Man, therefore, according to the Vedanta philosophy, is the 7 greatest being that is in the universe, and this world of work the 8 best place in it, because only herein is the greatest and the best 9 chance for him to become perfect. Angels or gods, whatever you 10 may call them, have all to become men, if they want to become 11 perfect. This is the great centre, the wonderful poise, and the 12 wonderful opportunity--this human life.

13 We came next to the other aspect of philosophy. There are 14 Buddhists who deny the whole theory of the soul that I have just 15 now been propounding. "What use is there," says the Buddhist, "to 16 assume something as the substratum, as the background of this 17 body and mind? Why may we not allow thoughts to run on? Why 18 admit a third substance beyond this organism, composed of mind 19 and body, a third substance called the soul? What is its use? Is not 20 this organism sufficient to explain itself? Why take anew a third 21 something?" These arguments are very powerful. This reasoning is 22 very strong. So far as outside research goes, we see that this 23 organism is a sufficient explanation of itself--at least, many of us see 24 it in that light. Why then need there be a soul as substratum, as a 25 something which is neither mind nor body but stands as a 26 background for both mind and body? Let there be only mind and 27 body. Body is the name of a stream of matter continuously 28 changing. Mind is the name of a stream of consciousness or thought 29 continuously changing. What produces the apparent unity between 30 these two? This unity does not really exist, let us say. Take, for 31 instance, a lighted torch, and whirl it rapidly before you. You see a 32 circle of fire. The circle does not really exist, but because the torch 33 is continually moving, it leaves the appearance of a circle. So there 34 is no unity in this life; it is a mass of matter continually rushing 35 down, and the whole of this matter you may call one unity, but no 36 more. So is mind; each thought is separate from every other 37 thought; it is only the rushing current that leaves behind the illusion 38 of unity; there is no need of a third substance. This universal 39 phenomenon of body and mind is all that really is; do not posit 40 something behind it. You will find that this Buddhist thought has 41 been taken up by certain sects and schools in modern times, and all 42 of them claim that it is new--their own invention. This has been the 43 central idea of most of the Buddhistic philosophies, that this world 44 is itself all-sufficient; that you need not ask for any background at 45 all; all that is, is this sense-universe; what is the use of thinking of 46 something as a support to this universe? Everything is the 47 aggregate of qualities; why should there be a hypothetical 48 substance in which they should inhere? The idea of substance 49 comes from the rapid interchange of qualities, not from something 50 unchangeable which exists behind them. We see how wonderful 51 some of these arguments are, and they appeal easily to the ordinary 52 experience of humanity--in fact, not one in a million can think of 1 anything other than phenomena. To the vast majority of men nature 2 appears to be only a changing, whirling, combining, mingling mass

3 of change. Few of us every have a glimpse of the calm sea behind.
4 For us it is always lashed into waves; this universe appears to us
5 only as a tossing mass of waves. Thus we find these two opinions.
6 One is that there is something behind both body and mind which is 7 an unchangeable and immovable substance; and the other is that 8 there is no such thing as immovability or unchangeability in the 9 universe; it is all change and nothing but change. The solution of 10 this difference comes in the next step of thought, namely, the non-11 dualistic.

12 It says that the dualists are right in finding something behind 13 all, as a background which does not change; we cannot conceive 14 change without there being something unchangeable. We can only 15 conceive of anything that is changeable, by knowing something 16 which is less changeable, and this also must appear more 17 changeable in comparison with something else which is less 18 changeable, and so on and on, until we are bound to admit that 19 there must be something which never changes at all. The whole of 20 this manifestation must have been in a state of non-manifestation, 21 calm and silent, being the balance of opposing forces, so to say, 22 when no force operated, because force acts when a disturbance of 23 the equilibrium comes in. The universe is ever hurrying on to return 24 to that state of equilibrium again. If we are certain of any fact 25 whatsoever, we are certain of this. When the dualists claim that 26 there is something which does not change, they are perfectly right, 27 but their analysis that it is an underlying something which is 28 neither the body nor the mind, a something separate from both, is 29 wrong. So far as the Buddhists say that the whole universe is a 30 mass of change, they are perfectly right; so long as I am separate 31 from the universe, so long as I stand back and look at something 32 before me, so long as there are two things--the looker-on and the 33 thing looked upon--it will appear always that the universe is one of 34 change, continuously changing all the time. But the reality is that 35 there is both change and changelessness in this universe. It is not 36 that the soul and the mind and the body are three separate 37 existences, for this organism made of these three is really one. It is 38 the same thing which appears as the body, as the mind, and as the 39 thing beyond mind and body, but it is not at the same time all these.
40 He who sees the body does not see the mind even, he who sees the 41 mind does not see that which he calls the soul, and he who sees the 42 soul--for him body and mind have vanished. He who sees only 43 motion never sees absolute calm, and he who sees absolute calm-- 44 for him motion has vanished. A rope is taken for a snake. He who 45 sees the rope as the snake, for him the rope has vanished, and 46 when the delusion ceases and he looks at the rope, the snake has 47 vanished.

48 There is then but one all-comprehending existence, and that 49 one appears as manifold. This Self or Soul or Substance is all that 50 exists in the universe. That Self or Substance or Soul is, in the 51 language of non-dualism, the Brahman appearing to be manifold by 52 the interposition of name and form. Look at the waves in the sea.

1 Not one wave is really different from the sea, but what makes the 2 wave apparently different? Name and form; the form of the wave
3 and the name which we give to it, "wave". This is what makes it 4 different from the sea. When name and form go, it is the same sea.
5 Who can make any real difference between the wave and the sea?
6 So this whole universe is that one Unit Existence; name and form 7 have created all these various differences. As when the sun shines 8 upon millions of globules of water, upon each particle is seen a most 9 perfect representation of the sun, so the one Soul, the one Self, the 10 one Existence of the universe, being reflected on all these 11 numerous globules of varying names and forms, appears to be 12 various. But it is in reality only one. There is no "I" nor "you"; it is 13 all one. It is either all "I" or all "you". This idea of duality, of two, is 14 entirely false, and the whole universe, as we ordinarily know it, is 15 the result of this false knowledge. When discrimination comes and 16 man finds there are not two but one, he finds that he is himself this 17 universe. "It is I who am this universe as it now exists, a continuous 18 mass of change. It is I who am beyond all changes, beyond all 19 qualities, the eternally perfect, the eternally blessed."

20 There is, therefore, but one Atman, one Self, eternally pure, 21 eternally perfect, unchangeable, unchanged; it has never changed; 22 all these various changes in the universe are but appearances in 23 that one Self.

24 Upon it name and form have painted all these dreams; it is 25 the form that makes the wave different from the sea. Suppose the 26 wave subsides, will the form remain? No, it will vanish. The 27 existence of the wave was entirely dependent upon the existence of 28 the sea, but the existence of the sea was not at all dependent upon 29 the existence of the wave. The form remains so long as the wave 30 remains, but as soon as the wave leaves it, it vanishes, it cannot 31 remain. This name and form is the outcome of what is called Maya.
32 It is this Maya that is making individuals, making one appear 33 different from another. Yet it has no existence. Maya cannot be said 34 to exist. Form cannot be said to exist, because it depends upon the 35 existence of another thing. It cannot be said as not to exist, seeing 36 that it makes all this difference. According to the Advaita 37 philosophy, then, this Maya or ignorance--or name and form, or, as 38 it has been called in Europe, "time, space, and causality"--is out of 39 this one Infinite Existence showing us the manifoldness of the 40 universe; in substance, this universe is one. So long as any one 41 thinks that there are two ultimate realities, he is mistaken. When he 42 has come to know that there is but one, he is right. This is what is 43 being proved to us every day, on the physical plane, on the mental 44 plane, and also on the spiritual plane. Today it has been 45 demonstrated that you and I, the sun, the moon, and the stars are 46 but the different names of different spots in the same ocean of 47 matter, and that this matter is continuously changing in its 48 configuration. This particle of energy that was in the sun several 49 months ago may be in the human being now; tomorrow it may be in 50 an animal, the day after tomorrow it may be in a plant. It is ever 51 coming and going. It is all one unbroken, infinite mass of matter, 52 only differentiated by names and forms. One point is called the sun;

1 another, the moon; another, the stars; another, man; another,
2 animal; another, plant; and so on. And all these names are fictitious;
3 they have no reality, because the whole is a continuously changing 4 mass of matter. This very same universe, from another standpoint, 5 is an ocean of thought, where each one of us is a point called a 6 particular mind. You are a mind, I am a mind, everyone is a mind; 7 and the very same universe viewed from the standpoint of 8 knowledge, when the eyes have been cleared of delusions, when 9 the mind has become pure, appears to be the unbroken Absolute 10 Being, the ever pure, the unchangeable, the immortal.

11 What then becomes of all this threefold eschatology of the 12 dualist, that when a man dies he goes to heaven, or goes to this or 13 that sphere, and that the wicked persons become ghosts, and 14 become animals, and so forth? None comes and none goes, says the 15 non-dualist. How can you come and go? You are infinite; where is 16 the place for you to go? In a certain school a number of little 17 children were being examined. The examiner had foolishly put all 18 sorts of difficult questions to the little children. Among others there 19 was this question: "Why does not the earth fall?" His intention was 20 to bring out the idea of gravitation or some other intricate scientific 21 truth from these children. Most of them could not even understand 22 the question, and so they gave all sorts of wrong answers. But one 23 bright little girl answered it with another question: "Where shall it 24 fall?" The very question of the examiner was nonsense on the face 25 of it. There is no up and down in the universe; the idea is only 26 relative. So it is with regard to the soul; the very question of birth 27 and death in regard to it is utter nonsense. Who goes and who 28 comes? Where are you not? Where is the heaven that you are not in 29 already? Omnipresent is the Self of man. Where is it to go? Where 30 is it not to go? It is everywhere. So all this childish dream and 31 puerile illusion of birth and death, of heavens and higher heavens 32 and lower worlds, all vanish immediately for the perfect. For the 33 nearly perfect it vanishes after showing them the several scenes up 34 to Brahmaloaka. It continues for the ignorant.

35 How is it that the whole world believes in going to heaven,
36 and in dying and being born? I am studying a book, page after page 37 is being read and turned over. Another page comes and is turned 38 over. Who changes? Who comes and goes? Not I, but the book. This 39 whole nature is a book before the soul, chapter after chapter is 40 being read and turned over, and every now and then a scene opens.
41 That is read and turned over. A fresh one comes, but the soul is 42 ever the same--eternal. It is nature that is changing, not the soul of 43 man. This never changes.

44 Birth and death are in nature, not in you. Yet the ignorant are 45 deluded; just as we under delusion think that the sun is moving and 46 not the earth, in exactly the same way we think that we are dying, 47 and not nature. These are all, therefore, hallucinations. Just as it is 48 a hallucination when we think that the fields are moving and not the 49 railway train, exactly in the same manner is the hallucination of 50 birth and death. When men are in a certain frame of mind, they see 51 this very existence as the earth, as the sun, the moon, the stars; and 52 all those who are in the same state of mind see the same things.

1 Beyond you and me there may be millions of beings on different
2 planes of existence. They will never see us, nor we them; we only 3 see those who are in the same state of mind and on the same plane 4 with us. Those musical instruments respond which have the same 5 attunement of vibration, as it were; if the state of vibration, which 6 they call "man-vibration", should be changed, no longer would men 7 be seen here; the whole "man-universe" would vanish, and instead 8 of that, other scenery would come before us, perhaps gods and the 9 god-universe, or perhaps, for the wicked man, devils and the 10 diabolic world; but all would be only different views of the one 11 universe. It is this universe which, from the human plane, is seen as 12 the earth, the sun, the moon, the stars, and all such things--it is this 13 very universe which, seen from the plane of wickedness, appears as 14 a place of punishment. And this very universe is seen as heaven by 15 those who want to see it as heaven. Those who have been dreaming 16 of going to a God who is sitting on a throne, and of standing there 17 praising Him all their lives, when they die, will simply see a vision 18 of what they have in their minds; this very universe will simply 19 change into a vast heaven, with all sorts of winged beings flying 20 about and a God sitting on a throne. These heavens are all of man's 21 own making. So what the dualist says is true, says the Advaitin, but 22 it is all simply of his own making. These spheres and devils and 23 gods and reincarnations and transmigrations are all mythology; so 24 also is this human life. The great mistake that men always make is 25 to think that this life alone is true. They understand it well enough 26 when other things are called mythologies, but are never willing to 27 admit the same of their own position. The whole thing as it appears 28 is mere mythology, and the greatest of all lies is that we are bodies, 29 which we never were nor ever can be. It is the greatest of all lies 30 that we are mere men; we are the God of the universe. In 31 worshipping God we have been always worshipping our own hidden 32 Self. The worst lie that you ever tell yourself is that you were born a 33 sinner or a wicked man. He alone is a sinner who sees a sinner in 34 another man. Suppose there is a baby here, and you place a bag of 35 gold on the table. Suppose a robber comes and takes the gold away.
36 To the baby it is all the same; because there is no robber inside, 37 there is no robber outside. To sinners and vile men, there is vileness 38 outside, but not to good men. So the wicked see this universe as a 39 hell, and the partially good see it as heaven, while the perfect 40 beings realise it as God Himself. Then alone the veil falls from the 41 eyes, and the man, purified and cleansed, finds his whole vision 42 changed. The bad dreams that have been torturing him for millions 43 of years, all vanish, and he who was thinking of himself either as a 44 man, or a god, or a demon, he who was thinking of himself as living 45 in low places, in high places, on earth, in heaven, and so on, finds 46 that he is really omnipresent; that all time is in him, and that he is 47 not in time; that all the heavens are in him, that he is not in any 48 heaven; and that all the gods that man ever worshipped are in him, 49 and that he is not in any one of those gods. He was the 50 manufacturer of gods and demons, of men and plants and animals 51 and stones, and the real nature of man now stands unfolded to him 52 as being higher than heaven, more perfect than this universe of 53 ours, more infinite than infinite time, more omnipresent than the 1 omnipresent ether. Thus alone man becomes fearless, and becomes 2 free. Then all delusions cease, all miseries vanish, all fears come to 3 an end for ever. Birth goes away and with it death; pains fly, and 4 with them fly away pleasures; earths vanish, and with them vanish 5 heavens; bodies vanish, and with them vanishes the mind also. For 6 that man disappears the whole universe, as it were. This searching, 7 moving, continuous struggle of forces stops for ever, and that which 8 was manifesting itself as force and matter, as struggles of nature, 9 as nature itself, as heavens and earths and plants and animals and 10 men and angels, all that becomes transfigured into one infinite, 11 unbreakable, unchangeable existence, and the knowing man finds 12 that he is one with that existence. "Even as clouds of various 13 colours come before the sky, remain there for a second, and then 14 vanish away," even so before this soul are all these visions coming, 15 of earths and heavens, of the moon and the gods, of pleasures and 16 pains; but they all pass away leaving the one infinite, blue, 17 unchangeable sky. The sky never changes; it is the clouds that 18 change. It is a mistake to think that the sky is changed. It is a 19 mistake to think that we are impure, that we are limited, that we 20 are separate. The real man is the one Unit Existence.

21 Two questions now arise. The first is: "Is it possible to realise 22 this? So far it is doctrine, philosophy, but is it possible to realise it?" 23 It is. There are men still living in this world for whom delusion has 24 vanished for ever. Do they immediately die after such realisation?
25 Not so soon as we should think. Two wheels joined by one pole are 26 running together. If I get hold of one of the wheels and, with an axe, 27 cut the pole asunder, the wheel which I have got hold of stops, but 28 upon the other wheel is its past momentum, so it runs on a little and 29 then falls down.

30 This pure and perfect being, the soul, is one wheel, and this 31 external hallucination of body and mind is the other wheel, joined 32 together by the pole of work, of Karma. Knowledge is the axe which 33 will sever the bond between the two, and the wheel of the soul will 34 stop--stop thinking that it is coming and going, living and dying, 35 stop thinking that it is nature and has wants and desires, and will 36 find that it is perfect, desireless. But upon the other wheel, that of 37 the body and mind, will be the momentum of past acts; so it will live 38 for some time, until that momentum of past work is exhausted, until 39 that momentum is worked away, and then the body and mind fall, 40 and the soul becomes free. No more is there any going to heaven 41 and coming back, not even any going to the Brahmaloaka, or to any 42 of the highest of the spheres, for where is he to come from, or to go 43 to? The man who has in this life attained to this state, for whom, for 44 a minute at least, the ordinary vision of the world has changed and 45 the reality has been apparent, he is called the "Living Free". This is 46 the goal of the Vedantin, to attain freedom while living.

47 Once in Western India I was travelling in the desert country
48 on the coast of the Indian Ocean. For days and days I used to travel 49 on foot through the desert, but it was to my surprise that I saw 50 every day beautiful lakes, with trees all around them, and the 51 shadows of the trees upside down and vibrating there. "How 52 wonderful it looks and they call this a desert country!" I said to 1 myself. Nearly a month I travelled, seeing these wonderful lakes

2 and trees and plants. One day I was very thirsty and wanted to have 3 a drink of water, so I started to go to one of these clear, beautiful 4 lakes, and as I approached, it vanished. And with a flash it came to 5 my brain, "This is the mirage about which I have read all my life," 6 and with that came also the idea that throughout the whole of this 7 month, every day, I had been seeing the mirage and did not know it.
8 The next morning I began my march. There was again the lake, but 9 with it came also the idea that it was the mirage and not a true 10 lake. So is it with this universe. We are all travelling in this mirage 11 of the world day after day, month after month, year after year, not 12 knowing that it is a mirage. One day it will break up, but it will 13 come back again; the body has to remain under the power of past 14 Karma, and so the mirage will come back. This world will come 15 back upon us so long as we are bound by Karma: men, women, 16 animals, plants, our attachments and duties, all will come back to 17 us, but not with the same power. Under the influence of the new 18 knowledge the strength of Karma will be broken, its poison will be 19 lost. It becomes transformed, for along with it there comes the idea 20 that we know it now, that the sharp distinction between the reality 21 and the mirage has been known.

22 This world will not then be the same world as before. There 23 is, however, a danger here. We see in every country people taking 24 up this philosophy and saying, "I am beyond all virtue and vice; so I 25 am not bound by any moral laws; I may do anything I like." You may 26 find many fools in this country at the present time, saying, "I am not 27 bound; I am God Himself; let me do anything I like." This is not 28 right, although it is true that the soul is beyond all laws, physical, 29 mental, or moral. Within law is bondage; beyond law is freedom. It 30 is also true that freedom is of the nature of the soul, it is its 31 birthright: that real freedom of the soul shines through veils of 32 matter in the form of the apparent freedom of man. Every moment 33 of your life you feel that you are free. We cannot live, talk, or 34 breathe for a moment without feeling that we are free; but, at the 35 same time, a little thought shows us that we are like machines and 36 not free. What is true then? Is this idea of freedom a delusion? One 37 party holds that the idea of freedom is a delusion; another says that 38 the idea of bondage is a delusion. How does this happen? Man is 39 really free, the real man cannot but be free. It is when he comes 40 into the world of Maya, into name and form, that he becomes 41 bound. Free will is a misnomer. Will can never be free. How can it 42 be? It is only when the real man has become bound that his will 43 comes into existence, and not before. The will of man is bound, but 44 that which is the foundation of that will is eternally free. So, even in 45 the state of bondage which we call human life or god-life, on earth 46 or in heaven, there yet remains to us that recollection of the 47 freedom which is ours by divine right. And consciously or 48 unconsciously we are all struggling towards it. When a man has 49 attained his own freedom, how can he be bound by any law? No law 50 in this universe can bind him, for this universe itself is his.

51 He is the whole universe. Either say he is the whole universe 52 or say that to him there is no universe. How can he have then all

1 these little ideas about sex and about country? How can he say, I
2 am a man, I am a woman, I am a child? Are they not lies? He knows 3 that they are. How can he say that these are man's rights, and 4 these others are woman's rights? Nobody has rights; nobody 5 separately exists. There is neither man nor woman; the soul is 6 sexless, eternally pure. It is a lie to say that I am a man or a woman, 7 or to say that I belong to this country or that. All the world is my 8 country, the whole universe is mine, because I have clothed myself 9 with it as my body. Yet we see that there are people in this world 10 who are ready to assert these doctrines, and at the same time do 11 things which we should call filthy; and if we ask them why they do 12 so, they tell us that it is our delusion and that they can do nothing 13 wrong. What is the test by which they are to be judged? The test is 14 here.

15 Though evil and good are both conditioned manifestations of 16 the soul, yet evil is the most external coating, and good is the 17 nearer coating of the real man, the Self.

18 And unless a man cuts through the layer of evil he cannot 19 reach the layer of good, and unless he has passed through both the 20 layers of good and evil he cannot reach the Self. He who reaches 21 the Self, what remains attached to him? A little Karma, a little bit of 22 the momentum of past life, but it is all good momentum. Until the 23 bad momentum is entirely worked out and past impurities are 24 entirely burnt, it is impossible for any man to see and realise truth.
25 So, what is left attached to the man who has reached the Self and 26 seen the truth is the remnant of the good impressions of past life, 27 the good momentum. Even if he lives in a body and works 28 incessantly, he works only to do good; his lips speak only 29 benediction to all; his hands do only good works; his mind can only 30 think good thoughts; his presence is a blessing wherever he goes.
31 He is himself a living blessing. Such a man will, by his very 32 presence, change even the most wicked persons into saints. Even if 33 he does not speak, his very presence will be a blessing to mankind.
34 Can such men do any evil; can they do wicked deeds? There is, you 35 must remember, all the difference of pole to pole between 36 realisation and mere talking. Any fool can talk. Even parrots talk.
37 Talking is one thing, and realising is another. Philosophies, and 38 doctrines, and arguments, and books, and theories, and churches, 39 and sects, and all these things are good in their own way; but when 40 that realisation comes, these things drop away. For instance, maps 41 are good, but when you see the country itself, and look again at the 42 maps, what a great difference you find! So those that have realised 43 truth do not require the ratiocinations of logic and all other 44 gymnastics of the intellect to make them understand the truth; it is 45 to them the life of their lives, concretised, made more than tangible.
46 It is, as the sages of the Vedanta say, "even as a fruit in your hand"; 47 you can stand up and say, it is here. So those that have realised the 48 truth will stand up and say, "Here is the Self". You may argue with 49 them by the year, but they will smile at you; they will regard it all as 50 a child's prattle; they will let the child prattle on. They have realised 51 the truth and are full. Suppose you have seen a country, and 52 another man comes to you and tries to argue with you that that

1 country never existed, he may go on arguing indefinitely, but your 2 only attitude of mind towards him must be to hold that the man is fit 3 for a lunatic asylum. So the man of realisation says, "All this talk in 4 the world about its little religions is but prattle; realisation is the 5 soul, the very essence of religion." Religion can be realised. Are you 6 ready? Do you want it? You will get the realisation if you do, and 7 then you will be truly religious. Until you have attained realisation 8 there is no difference between you and atheists. The atheists are 9 sincere, but the man who says that he believes in religion and never 10 attempts to realise it is not sincere.

11 The next question is to know what comes after realisation.
12 Suppose we have realised this oneness of the universe, that we are 13 that one Infinite Being, and suppose we have realised that this Self 14 is the only Existence and that it is the same Self which is 15 manifesting in all these various phenomenal forms, what becomes 16 of us after that? Shall we become inactive, get into a corner and sit 17 down there and die away? "What good will it do to the world?" That 18 old question! In the first place, why should it do good to the world?
19 Is there any reason why it should? What right has any one to ask 20 the question, "What good will it do to the world?" What is meant by 21 that? A baby likes candies. Suppose you are conducting 22 investigations in connection with some subject of electricity and the 23 baby asks you, "Does it buy candies?" "No" you answer. "Then what 24 good will it do?" says the baby. So men stand up and say, "What 25 good will this do to the world; will it give us money?" "No." "Then 26 what good is there in it?" That is what men mean by doing good to 27 the world. Yet religious realisation does all the good to the world.
28 People are afraid that when they attain to it, when they realise that 29 there is but one, the fountains of love will be dried up, that 30 everything in life will go away, and that all they love will vanish for 31 them, as it were, in this life and in the life to come. People never 32 stop to think that those who bestowed the least thought on their 33 own individualities have been the greatest workers in the world.
34 Then alone a man loves when he finds that the object of his love is 35 not any low, little, mortal thing. Then alone a man loves when he 36 finds that the object of his love is not a clod of earth, but it is the 37 veritable God Himself. The wife will love the husband the more 38 when she thinks that the husband is God Himself. The husband will 39 love the wife the more when he knows that the wife is God Himself.
40 That mother will love the children more who thinks that the 41 children are God Himself. That man will love his greatest enemy
42 who knows that that very enemy is God Himself. That man will love 43 a holy man who knows that the holy man is God Himself, and that 44 very man will also love the unholyest of men because he knows the 45 background of that unholyest of men is even He, the Lord. Such a 46 man becomes a world-mover for whom his little self is dead and 47 God stands in its place. The whole universe will become 48 transfigured to him. That which is painful and miserable will all 49 vanish; struggles will all depart and go. Instead of being a prison-50 house, where we every day struggle and fight and compete for a 51 morsel of bread, this universe will then be to us a playground.
52 Beautiful will be this universe then! Such a man alone has the right 53 to stand up and say, "How beautiful is this world!" He alone has the 1 right to say that it is all good. This will be the great good to the 2 world resulting from such realisation, that instead of this world 3 going on with all its friction and clashing, if all mankind today 4 realise only a bit of that great truth, the aspect of the whole world 5 will be changed, and, in place of fighting and quarrelling, there 6 would be a reign of peace. This indecent and brutal hurry which 7 forces us to go ahead of every one else will then vanish from the 8 world. With it will vanish all struggle, with it will vanish all hate, 9 with it will vanish all jealousy, and all evil will vanish away for ever.

10 Gods will live then upon this earth. This very earth will then become 11 heaven, and what evil can there be when gods are playing with 12 gods, when gods are working with gods, and gods are loving gods?
13 That is the great utility of divine realisation. Everything that you see 14 in society will be changed and transfigured then. No more will you 15 think of man as evil; and that is the first great gain. No more will 16 you stand up and sneeringly cast a glance at a poor man or woman 17 who has made a mistake. No more, ladies, will you look down with 18 contempt upon the poor woman who walks the street in the night, 19 because you will see even there God Himself. No more will you 20 think of jealousy and punishments. They will all vanish; and love, 21 the great ideal of love, will be so powerful that no whip and cord 22 will be necessary to guide mankind aright.

23 If one millionth part of the men and women who live in this 24 world simply sit down and for a few minutes say, "You are all God, O 25 ye men and O ye animals and living beings, you are all the 26 manifestations of the one living Deity!" the whole world will be 27 changed in half an hour. Instead of throwing tremendous bomb-28 shells of hatred into every corner, instead of projecting currents of 29 jealousy and evil thought, in every country people will think that it 30 is all He. He is all that you see and feel. How can you see evil until 31 there is evil in you? How can you see the thief, unless he is there, 32 sitting in the heart of your heart? How can you see the murderer 33 until you are yourself the murderer? Be good, and evil will vanish 34 for you. The whole universe will thus be changed. This is the 35 greatest gain to society. This is the great gain to the human 36 organism. These thoughts were thought out, worked out amongst 37 individuals in ancient times in India. For various reasons, such as 38 the exclusiveness of the teachers and foreign conquest, those 39 thoughts were not allowed to spread. Yet they are grand truths; and 40 wherever they have been working, man has become divine. My 41 whole life has been changed by the touch of one of these divine 42 men, about whom I am going to speak to you next Sunday; and the 43 time is coming when these thoughts will be cast abroad over the 44 whole world. Instead of living in monasteries, instead of being 45 confined to books of philosophy to be studied only by the learned, 46 instead of being the exclusive possession of sects and of a few of 47 the learned, they will all be sown broadcast over the whole world, 48 so that they may become the common property of the saint and the 49 sinner, of men and women and children, of the learned and of the 50 ignorant. They will then permeate the atmosphere of the world, and 51 the very air that we breathe will say with every one of its 52 pulsations, "Thou art That". And the whole universe with its myriads 53 of suns and moons, through everything that speaks, with one voice

1 will say, "Thou art That".

PRACTICAL VEDANTA - PART I

(Delivered in London, 10th November 1896)

I have been asked to say something about the practical position of the Vedanta philosophy. As I have told you, theory is very good indeed, but how are we to carry it into practice? If it be absolutely impracticable, no theory is of any value whatever, except as intellectual gymnastics. The Vedanta, therefore, as a religion must be intensely practical. We must be able to carry it out in every part of our lives. And not only this, the fictitious differentiation between religion and the life of the world must vanish, for the Vedanta teaches oneness--one life throughout. The ideals of religion must cover the whole field of life, they must enter into all our thoughts, and more and more into practice. I will enter gradually on the practical side as we proceed. But this series of lectures is intended to be a basis, and so we must first apply ourselves to theories and understand how they are worked out, proceeding from forest caves to busy streets and cities; and one peculiar feature we find is that many of these thoughts have been the outcome, not of retirement into forests, but have emanated from persons whom we expect to lead the busiest lives--from ruling monarchs.

Shvetaketu was the son of Aruni, a sage, most probably a recluse. He was brought up in the forest, but he went to the city of the Panchalas and appeared at the court of the king, Pravahana Jaivali. The king asked him, "Do you know how beings depart hence at death?" "No, sir." "Do you know how they return hither?" "No, sir." "Do you know the way of the fathers and the way of the gods?" "No, sir." Then the king asked other questions. Shvetaketu could not answer them. So the king told him that he knew nothing. The boy went back to his father, and the father admitted that he himself could not answer these questions. It was not that he was unwilling to answer these questions. It was not that he was unwilling to teach the boy, but he did not know these things. So he went to the king and asked to be taught these secrets. The king said that these things had been hitherto known only among kings; the priests never knew them. He, however, proceeded to teach him what he desired to know. In various Upanishads we find that this Vedanta philosophy is not the outcome of meditation in the forests only, but that the very best parts of it were thought out and expressed by brains which were busiest in the everyday affairs of life. We cannot conceive any man busier than an absolute monarch, a man who is ruling over millions of people, and yet, some of these rulers were deep thinkers.

Everything goes to show that this philosophy must be very practical; and later on, when we come to the Bhagavad-Gita--most of you, perhaps, have read it, it is the best commentary we have on the Vedanta philosophy--curiously enough the scene is laid on the battlefield, where Krishna teaches this philosophy to Arjuna; and the doctrine which stands out luminously in every page of the Gita is intense activity, but in the midst of it, eternal calmness. This is the secret of work, to attain which is the goal of the Vedanta. Inactivity, as we understand it in the sense of passivity, certainly

1 cannot be the goal. Were it so, then the walls around us would be 2 the most intelligent; they are inactive. Clods of earth, stumps of 3 trees, would be the greatest sages in the world; they are inactive.
4 Nor does inactivity become activity when it is combined with 5 passion. Real activity, which is the goal of Vedanta, is combined 6 with eternal calmness, the calmness which cannot be ruffled, the 7 balance of mind which is never disturbed, whatever happens. And 8 we all know from our experience in life that that is the best attitude 9 for work.

10 I have been asked many times how we can work if we do not 11 have the passion which we generally feel for work. I also thought in 12 that way years ago, but as I am growing older, getting more 13 experience, I find it is not true. The less passion there is, the better 14 we work. The calmer we are, the better for us, and the more the 15 amount of work we can do. When we let loose our feelings, we 16 waste so much energy, shatter our nerves, disturb our minds, and 17 accomplish very little work. The energy which ought to have gone 18 out as work is spent as mere feeling, which counts for nothing. It is 19 only when the mind is very calm and collected that the whole of its 20 energy is spent in doing good work. And if you read the lives of the 21 great workers which the world has produced, you will find that they 22 were wonderfully calm men. Nothing, as it were, could throw them 23 off their balance. That is why the man who becomes angry never 24 does a great amount of work, and the man whom nothing can make 25 angry accomplishes so much. The man who gives way to anger, or 26 hatred, or any other passion, cannot work; he only breaks himself to 27 pieces, and does nothing practical. It is the calm, forgiving, 28 equable, well-balanced mind that does the greatest amount of work.

29 The Vedanta preaches the ideal; and the ideal, as we know, is 30 always far ahead of the real, of the practical, as we may call it.
31 There are two tendencies in human nature: one to harmonise the 32 ideal with the life, and the other to elevate the life to the ideal. It is 33 a great thing to understand this, for the former tendency is the 34 temptation of our lives. I think that I can only do a certain class of 35 work. Most of it, perhaps, is bad; most of it, perhaps, has a motive 36 power of passion behind it, anger, or greed, or selfishness. Now if 37 any man comes to preach to me a certain ideal, the first step 38 towards which is to give up selfishness, to give up self-enjoyment, I 39 think that is impractical. But when a man brings an ideal which can 40 be reconciled with my selfishness, I am glad at once and jump at it.
41 That is the ideal for me. As the word "orthodox" has been 42 manipulated into various forms, so has been the word "practical".
43 "My doxy is orthodoxy; your doxy is heterodoxy." So with 44 practicality. What I think is practical, is to me the only practicality 45 in the world. If I am a shopkeeper, I think shopkeeping the only 46 practical pursuit in the world. If I am a thief, I think stealing is the 47 best means of being practical; others are not practical. You see how 48 we all use this word practical for things we like and can do.
49 Therefore I will ask you to understand that Vedanta, though it is 50 intensely practical, is always so in the sense of the ideal. It does not 51 preach an impossible ideal, however high it be, and it is high 52 enough for an ideal. In one word, this ideal is that you are divine,

1 "Thou art That". This is the essence of Vedanta; after all its 2 ramifications and intellectual gymnastics, you know the human soul
3 to be pure and omniscient, you see that such superstitions as birth 4 and death would be entire nonsense when spoken of in connection
5 with the soul. The soul was never born and will never die, and all 6 these ideas that we are going to die and are afraid to die are mere 7 superstitions. And all such ideas as that we can do this or cannot do 8 that are superstitions. We can do everything. The Vedanta teaches 9 men to have faith in themselves first. As certain religions of the 10 world say that a man who does not believe in a Personal God 11 outside of himself is an atheist, so the Vedanta says, a man who 12 does not believe in himself is an atheist. Not believing in the glory 13 of our own soul is what the Vedanta calls atheism. Tomany this is, 14 no doubt, a terrible idea; and most of us think that this ideal can 15 never be reached; but the Vedanta insists that it can be realised by 16 every one. There is neither man nor woman or child, nor difference 17 of race or sex, nor anything that stands as a bar to the realisation of 18 the ideal, because Vedanta shows that it is realised already, it is 19 already there.

20 All the powers in the universe are already ours. It is we who 21 have put our hands before our eyes and cry that it is dark. Know 22 that there is no darkness around us. Take the hands away and there 23 is the light which was from the beginning. Darkness never existed, 24 weakness never existed. We who are fools cry that we are weak; we 25 who are fools cry that we are impure. Thus Vedanta not only insists 26 that the ideal is practical, but that it has been so all the time; and 27 this Ideal, this Reality, is our own nature. Everything else that you 28 see is false, untrue. As soon as you say, "I am a little mortal being," 29 you are saying something which is not true, you are giving the lie to 30 yourselves, you are hypnotising yourselves into something vile and 31 weak and wretched.

32 The Vedanta recognises no sin, it only recognises error. And 33 the greatest error, says the Vedanta, is to say that you are weak, 34 that you are a sinner, a miserable creature, and that you have no 35 power and you cannot do this and that. Every time you think in that 36 way, you, as it were, rivet one more link in the chain that binds you 37 down, you add one more layer of hypnotism on to your own soul.
38 Therefore, whosoever thinks he is weak is wrong, whosoever thinks 39 he is impure is wrong, and is throwing a bad thought into the world.
40 This we must always bear in mind that in the Vedanta there is no 41 attempt at reconciling the present life--the hypnotised life, this false 42 life which we have assumed--with the ideal; but this false life must 43 go, and the real life which is always existing must manifest itself, 44 must shine out. No man becomes purer and purer, it is a matter of 45 greater manifestation. The veil drops away, and the native purity of 46 the soul begins to manifest itself. Everything is ours already--infinite 47 purity, freedom, love, and power.

48 The Vedanta also says that not only can this be realised in the 49 depths of forests or caves, but by men in all possible conditions of 50 life. We have seen that the people who discovered these truths 51 were neither living in caves nor forests, nor following the ordinary 52 vocations of life, but men who, we have every reason to believe, led

1 the busiest of lives, men who had to command armies, to sit on 2 thrones, and look to the welfare of millions--and all these, in the 3 days of absolute monarchy, and not as in these days when a king is 4 to a great extent a mere figurehead. Yet they could find time to 5 think out all these thoughts, to realise them, and to teach them to 6 humanity. How much more then should it be practical for us whose 7 lives, compared with theirs, are lives of leisure? That we cannot 8 realise them is a shame to us, seeing that we are comparatively free 9 all the time, having very little to do. My requirements are as 10 nothing compared with those of an ancient absolute monarch. My 11 wants are as nothing compared with the demands of Arjuna on the 12 battlefield of Kurukshetra, commanding a huge army; and yet he 13 could find time in the midst of the din and turmoil of battle to talk 14 the highest philosophy and to carry it into his life also. Surely we 15 ought to be able to do as much in this life of ours--comparatively 16 free, easy, and comfortable. Most of us here have more time than 17 we think we have, if we really want to use it for good. With the 18 amount of freedom we have we can attain to two hundred ideals in 19 this life, if we will, but we must not degrade the ideal to the actual.
20 One of the most insinuating things comes to us in the shape of 21 persons who apologise for our mistakes and teach us how to make 22 special excuses for all our foolish wants and foolish desires; and we 23 think that their ideal is the only ideal we need have. But it is not so.
24 The Vedanta teaches no such thing. The actual should be reconciled 25 to the ideal, the present life should be made to coincide with life 26 eternal.

27 For you must always remember that the one central ideal of 28 Vedanta is this oneness. There are no two in anything, no two lives, 29 nor even two different kinds of life for the two worlds. You will find 30 the Vedas speaking of heavens and things like that at first; but later 31 on, when they come to the highest ideals of their philosophy, they 32 brush away all these things. There is but one life, one world, one 33 existence. Everything is that One, the difference is in degree and 34 not in kind. The Vedanta entirely denies such ideas as that animals 35 are separate from men, and that they were made and created by 36 God to be used for our food.

37 Some people have been kind enough to start an anti-38 vivisection society. I asked a member, "Why do you think, my friend, 39 that it is quite lawful to kill animals for food, and not to kill one or 40 two for scientific experiments?" He replied, "Vivisection is most 41 horrible, but animals have been given to us for food." Oneness 42 includes all animals. If man's life is immortal, so also is the animal's.
43 The difference is only in degree and not in kind. The amoeba and I 44 are the same, the difference is only in degree; and from the 45 standpoint of the highest life, all these differences vanish. A man 46 may see a great deal of difference between grass and a little tree, 47 but if you mount very high, the grass and the biggest tree will 48 appear much the same. So, from the standpoint of the highest ideal, 49 the lowest animal and the highest man are the same. If you believe 50 there is a God, the animals and the highest creatures must be the 51 same. A God who is partial to his children called men, and cruel to 52 his children called brute beasts, is worse than a demon. I would

1 rather die a hundred times than worship such a God. My whole life 2 would be a fight with such a God. But there is no difference, and 3 those who say there is, are irresponsible, heartless people who do 4 not know. Here is a case of the word practical used in a wrong
5 sense. I myself may not be a very strict vegetarian, but I
6 understand the ideal. When I eat meat I know it is wrong. Even if I
7 am bound to eat it under certain circumstances, I know it is cruel. I 8 must not drag my ideal down to the actual and apologize for my 9 weak conduct in this way. The ideal is not to eat flesh, not to injure 10 any being, for all animals are my brothers. If you can think of them 11 as your brothers, you have made a little headway towards the 12 brotherhood of all souls, not to speak of the brotherhood of man!
13 That is child's play. You generally find that this is not very 14 acceptable to many, because it teaches them to give up the actual, 15 and go higher up to the ideal. But if you bring out a theory which is 16 reconciled with their present conduct, they regard it as entirely 17 practical.

18 There is this strongly conservative tendency in human nature:
19 we do not like to move one step forward. I think of mankind just as I 20 read of persons who become frozen in snow; all such, they say, want 21 to go to sleep, and if you try to drag them up, they say, "Let me 22 sleep; it is so beautiful to sleep in the snow", and they die there in 23 that sleep. So is our nature. That is what we are doing all our life, 24 getting frozen from the feet upwards, and yet wanting to sleep.
25 Therefore you must struggle towards the ideal, and if a man comes 26 who wants to bring that ideal down to your level, and teach a 27 religion that does not carry that highest ideal, do not listen to him.
28 To me that is an impracticable religion. But if a man teaches a 29 religion which presents the highest ideal, I am ready for him.
30 Beware when anyone is trying to apologize for sense vanities and 31 sense weaknesses. If anyone wants to preach that way to us, poor, 32 sense-bound clods of earth as we have made ourselves by following 33 that teaching, we shall never progress. I have seen many of these 34 things, I have had some experience of the world, and my country is 35 the land where religious sects grow like mushrooms. Every year 36 new sects arise. But one thing I have marked, that it is only those 37 that never want to reconcile the man of flesh with the man of truth 38 that make progress. Wherever there is this false idea of reconciling 39 fleshly vanities with the highest ideals, of dragging down God to the 40 level of man, there comes decay. Man should not be degraded to 41 worldly slavery, but should be raised up to God.

42 At the same time, there is another side to the question. We 43 must not look down with contempt on others. All of us are going 44 towards the same goal. The difference between weakness and 45 strength is one of degree; the difference between virtue and vice is 46 one of degree; the difference between heaven and hell is one of 47 degree; the difference between life and death is one of degree; all 48 differences in this world are of degree, and not of kind, because 49 oneness is the secret of everything. All is One, which manifests 50 Itself, either as thought, or life, or soul, or body, and the difference 51 is only in degree. As such, we have no right to look down with 52 contempt upon those who are not developed exactly in the same

1 degree as we are. Condemn none; if you can stretch out a helping 2 hand, do so. If you cannot, fold your hands, bless your brother, and 3 let them go their own way. Dragging down and condemning is not 4 the way to work. Never is work accomplished in that way. We spend 5 our energies in condemning others. Criticism and condemnation is 6 a vain way of spending our energies, for in the long run we come to 7 learn that all are seeing the same thing, are more or less 8 approaching the same ideal, and that most of our differences are 9 merely differences of expression.

10 Take the idea of sin. I was telling you just now the Vedantic 11 idea of it, and the other idea is that man is a sinner. They are 12 practically the same, only the one takes the positive and the other 13 the negative side. One shows to man his strength and the other his 14 weakness. There may be weakness, says the Vedanta, but never 15 mind, we want to grow. Disease was found out as soon as man was 16 born. Everyone knows his disease; it requires no one to tell us what 17 our diseases are. But thinking all the time that we are diseased will 18 not cure us--medicine is necessary. We may forget anything outside, 19 we may try to become hypocrites to the external world, but in our 20 heart of hearts we all know our weaknesses. But, says the Vedanta, 21 being reminded of weakness does not help much; give strength, and 22 strength does not come by thinking of weakness all the time. The 23 remedy for weakness is not brooding over weakness, but thinking of 24 strength. Teach men of the strength that is already within them.
25 Instead of telling them they are sinners, the Vedanta takes the 26 opposite position, and says, "You are pure and perfect, and what 27 you call sin does not belong to you." Sins are very low degrees of 28 Self-manifestation; manifest your Self in a high degree. That is the 29 one thing to remember; all of us can do that. Never say, "No", never 30 say, "I cannot", for you are infinite. Even time and space are as 31 nothing compared with your nature. You can do anything and 32 everything, you are almighty.

33 These are the principles of ethics, but we shall now come 34 down lower and work out the details. We shall see how this Vedanta 35 can be carried into our everyday life, the city life, the country life, 36 the national life, and the home life of every nation. For, if a religion 37 cannot help man wherever he may be, wherever he stands, it is not 38 of much use; it will remain only a theory for the chosen few.
39 Religion, to help mankind, must be ready and able to help him in 40 whatever condition he is, in servitude or in freedom, in the depths 41 of degradation or on the heights of purity; everywhere, equally, it 42 should be able to come to his aid. The principle of Vedanta, or the 43 ideal of religion, or whatever you may call it, will be fulfilled by its 44 capacity for performing this great function.

45 The ideal of faith in ourselves is of the greatest help to us. If 46 faith in ourselves had been more extensively taught and practised, I 47 am sure a very large portion of the evils and miseries that we have 48 would have vanished. Throughout the history of mankind, if any 49 motive power has been more potent than another in the lives of all 50 great men and women, it is that of faith in themselves. Born with 51 the consciousness that they were to be great, they became great.
52 Let a man go down as low as possible; there must come a time

1 when out of sheer desperation he will take an upward curve and 2 will learn to have faith in himself. But it is better for us that we 3 should know it from the very first. Why should we have all these 4 bitter experiences in order to gain faith in ourselves? We can see 5 that all the difference between man and man is owing to the 6 existence of non-existence of faith in himself. Faith in ourselves will 7 do everything. I have experienced it in my own life, and am still 8 doing so; and as I grow older that faith is becoming stronger and 9 stronger. He is an atheist who does not believe in himself. The old 10 religion said that he was an atheist who did not believe in God. The 11 new religion says that he is the atheist who does not believe in 12 himself. But it is not selfish faith, because the Vedanta, again, is the 13 doctrine of oneness. It means faith in all, because you are all. Love 14 for yourselves means love for all, love for animals, love for 15 everything, for you are all one. It is the great faith which will make 16 the world better. I am sure of that. He is the highest man who can 17 say with truth, "I know all about myself." Do you know how much 18 energy, how many powers, how many forces are still lurking behind 19 that frame of yours? What scientist has known all that is in man?
20 Millions of years have passed since man first came here, and yet 21 but one infinitesimal part of his powers has been manifested.
22 Therefore, you must not say that you are weak. How do you know
23 what possibilities lie behind that degradation on the surface? You 24 know but little of that which is within you. For behind you is the 25 ocean of infinite power and blessedness.

26 "This Atman is first to be heard of." Hear day and night that 27 you are that Soul. Repeat it to yourselves day and night till it enters 28 into your very veins, till it tingles in every drop of blood, till it is in 29 your flesh and bone. Let the whole body be full of that one ideal, "I 30 am the birthless, the deathless, the blissful, the omniscient, the 31 omnipotent, ever-glorious Soul." Think on it day and night; think on 32 it till it becomes part and parcel of your life. Meditate upon it, and 33 out of that will come work. "Out of the fullness of the heart the 34 mouth speaketh," and out of the fullness of the heart the hand
35 worketh also. Action will come. Fill yourselves with the idea; 36 whatever you do, think well on it. All your actions will be magnified, 37 transformed, deified, by the very power of the thought. If matter is 38 powerful, thought is omnipotent. Bring this thought to bear upon 39 your life, fill yourselves with the thought of your almightiness, your 40 majesty, and your glory. Would to God no superstitions had been put 41 into your head! Would to God we had not been surrounded from our 42 birth by all these superstitious influences and paralysing ideas of 43 our weakness and vileness! Would to God that mankind had had an 44 easier path through which to attain to the noblest and highest 45 truths! But man had to pass through all this; do not make the path 46 more difficult for those who are coming after you.

47 These are sometimes terrible doctrines to teach. I know 48 people who get frightened at these ideas, but for those who want to 49 be practical, this is the first thing to learn. Never tell yourselves or 50 others that you are weak.

51 Do good if you can, but do not injure the world. You know in 52 your inmost heart that many of your limited ideas, this humbling of 1 yourself and praying and weeping to imaginary beings are 2 superstitions. Tell me one case where these prayers have been 3 answered. All the answers that came were from your own hearts.

4 You know there are no ghosts, but no sooner are you in the dark 5 than you feel a little creepy sensation. That is so because in our 6 childhood we have had all these fearful ideas put into our heads.
7 But do not teach these things to others through fear of society and 8 public opinion, through fear of incurring the hatred of friends, or 9 for fear of losing cherished superstitions. Be masters of all these.
10 What is there to be taught more in religion than the oneness of the 11 universe and faith in one's self? All the works of mankind for 12 thousands of years past have been towards this one goal, and 13 mankind is yet working it out. It is your turn now and you already 14 know the truth. For it has been taught on all sides. Not only 15 philosophy and psychology, but materialistic sciences have declared 16 it. Where is the scientific man today who fears to acknowledge the 17 truth of this oneness of the universe? Who is there who dares talk 18 of many worlds? All these are superstitions. There is only one life 19 and one world, and this one life and one world is appearing to us as 20 manifold. This manifoldness is like a dream. When you dream one 21 dream passes away and another comes. You do not live in your 22 dreams. The dreams come one after another, scene after scene 23 unfolds before you. So it is in this world of ninety per cent misery 24 and ten per cent happiness. Perhaps after a while it will appear as 25 ninety per cent happiness, and we shall call it heaven, but a time 26 comes to the sage when the whole thing vanishes, and this world 27 appears as God Himself, and his own soul as God. It is not therefore 28 that there are many worlds, it is not that there are many lives. All 29 this manifoldness is the manifestation of that One. That One is 30 manifesting Himself as many, as matter, spirit, mind, thought, and 31 everything else. It is that One, manifesting Himself as many.
32 Therefore the first step for us to take is to teach the truth to 33 ourselves and to others.

34 Let the world resound with this ideal, and let superstitions 35 vanish. Tell it to men who are weak and persist in telling it. You are 36 the Pure One; awake and arise, O mighty one, this sleep does not 37 become you. Awake and arise, it does not befit you. Think not that 38 you are weak and miserable. Almighty, arise and awake, and 39 manifest your own nature. It is not fitting that you think yourself a 40 sinner. It is not fitting that you think yourself weak. Say that to the 41 world, say it to yourselves, and see what a practical result comes, 42 see how with an electric flash everything is manifested, how 43 everything is changed. Tell that to mankind, and show them their 44 power. Then we shall learn how to apply it in our daily lives.

45 To be able to use what we call Viveka (discrimination), to 46 learn how in every moment of our lives, in every one of our actions, 47 to discriminate between what is right and wrong, true and false, we 48 shall have to know the test of truth, which is purity, oneness.
49 Everything that makes for oneness is truth. Love is truth, and 50 hatred is false, because hatred makes for multiplicity. It is hatred 51 that separates man from man; therefore it is wrong and false. It is a 52 disintegrating power; it separates and destroys.

1 Love binds, love makes for that oneness. You become one, the 2 mother with the child, families with the city, the whole world
3 becomes one with the animals. For love is Existence, God Himself;
4 and all this is the manifestation of that One Love, more or less 5 expressed. The difference is only in degree, but it is the 6 manifestation of that One Love throughout. Therefore in all our 7 actions we have to judge whether it is making for diversity or for 8 oneness. If for diversity we have to give it up, but if it makes for 9 oneness we are sure it is good. So with our thoughts; we have to 10 decide whether they make for disintegration, multiplicity, or for 11 oneness, binding soul to soul and bringing one influence to bear. If 12 they do this, we will take them up, and if not, we will throw them off 13 as criminal.

14 The whole idea of ethics is that it does not depend on 15 anything unknowable, it does not teach anything unknown, but in 16 the language of the Upanishad, "The God whom you worship as an 17 unknown God, the same I preach unto thee." It is through the Self 18 that you know anything. I see the chair; but to see the chair, I have 19 first to perceive myself and then the chair. It is in and through the 20 Self that the chair is perceived. It is in and through the Self that you 21 are known to me, that the whole world is known to me; and 22 therefore to say this Self is unknown is sheer nonsense. Take off the 23 Self and the whole universe vanishes. In and through the Self all 24 knowledge comes. Therefore it is the best known of all. It is 25 yourself, that which you call I. You may wonder how this I of me can 26 be the I of you. You may wonder how this limited I can be the 27 unlimited Infinite, but it is so. The limited is a mere fiction. The 28 Infinite has been covered up, as it were, and a little of It is 29 manifesting as the I. Limitation can never come upon the unlimited; 30 it is a fiction. The Self is known, therefore, to every one of us--man, 31 woman, or child--and even to animals. Without knowing Him we can 32 neither live nor move, nor have our being; without knowing this 33 Lord of all, we cannot breathe or live a second. The God of the 34 Vedanta is the most known of all and is not the outcome of 35 imagination.

36 If this is not preaching a practical God, how else could you 37 teach a practical God? Where is there a more practical God than He 38 whom I see before me--a God omnipresent, in every being, more 39 real than our senses? For you are He, the Omnipresent God 40 Almighty, the Soul of your souls, and if I say you are not, I tell an 41 untruth. I know it, whether at all times I realise it or not. He is the 42 Oneness, the Unity of all, the Reality of all life and all existence.

43 These ideas of the ethics of Vedanta have to be worked out in 44 detail, and, therefore, you must have patience. As I have told you, 45 we want to take the subject in detail and work it up thoroughly, to 46 see how the ideas grow from very low ideals, and how the one great 47 Ideal of oneness has developed and become shaped into the 48 universal love; and we ought to study these in order to avoid 49 dangers. The world cannot find time to work it up from the lowest 50 steps. But what is the use of our standing on higher steps if we 51 cannot give the truth to others coming afterwards? Therefore, it is 52 better to study it in all its workings; and first, it is absolutely

1 necessary to clear the intellectual portion, although we know that 2 intellectuality is almost nothing; for it is the heart that is of most 3 importance. It is through the heart that the Lord is seen, and not 4 through the intellect. The intellect is only the street-cleaner, 5 cleansing the path for us, a secondary worker, the policeman; but 6 the policeman is not a positive necessity for the workings of society.
7 He is only to stop disturbances, to check wrong-doing, and that is 8 all the work required of the intellect. When you read intellectual 9 books, you think when you have mastered them, "Bless the Lord 10 that I am out of them", because the intellect is blind and cannot 11 move of itself, it has neither hands nor feet. It is feeling that works, 12 that moves with speed infinitely superior to that of electricity or 13 anything else. Do you feel?--that is the question. If you do, you will 14 see the Lord. It is the feeling that you have today that will be 15 intensified, deified, raised to the highest platform, until it feels 16 everything, the oneness in everything, till it feels God in itself and 17 in others. The intellect can never do that. "Different methods of 18 speaking words, different methods of explaining the texts of books, 19 these are for the enjoyment of the learned, not for the salvation of 20 the soul" (Vivekachudamani, 58).

21 Those of you who have read Thomas a Kempis know how in 22 every page he insists on this, and almost every holy man in the 23 world has insisted on it. Intellect is necessary, for without it we fall 24 into crude errors and make all sorts of mistakes. Intellect checks 25 these; but beyond that, do not try to build anything upon it. It is an 26 inactive, secondary help; the real help is feeling, love. Do you feel 27 for others? If you do, you are growing in oneness. If you do not feel 28 for others, you may be the most intellectual giant ever born, but you 29 will be nothing; you are but dry intellect, and you will remain so.
30 And if you feel, even if you cannot read any book and do not know 31 any language, you are in the right way. The Lord is yours.

32 Do you not know from the history of the world where the 33 power of the prophets lay? Where was it? In the intellect? Did any 34 of them write a fine book on philosophy, on the most intricate 35 ratiocinations of logic? Not one of them. They only spoke a few 36 words. Feel like Christ and you will be a Christ; feel like Buddha 37 and you will be a Buddha. It is feeling that is the life, the strength, 38 the vitality, without which no amount of intellectual activity can 39 reach God. Intellect is like limbs without the power of locomotion. It 40 is only when feeling enters and gives them motion that they move 41 and work on others. That is so all over the world, and it is a thing 42 which you must always remember. It is one of the most practical 43 things in Vedantic morality, for it is the teaching of the Vedanta that 44 you are all prophets, and all must be prophets. The book is not the 45 proof of your conduct, but you are the proof of the book. How do 46 you know that a book teaches truth? Because you are truth and feel 47 it. That is what the Vedanta says. What is the proof of the Christs 48 and Buddhas of the world? That you and I feel like them.

49 That is how you and I understand that they were true. Our 50 prophet-soul is the proof of their prophet-soul. Your godhead is the 51 proof of God Himself. If you are not a prophet, there never has been 52 anything true of God. If you are not God, there never was any God,

1 and never will be. This, says the Vedanta, is the ideal to follow.
2 Every one of us will have to become a prophet, and you are that 3 already. Only know it. Never think there is anything impossible for 4 the soul. It is the greatest heresy to think so. If there is sin, this is 5 the only sin--to say that you are weak, or others are weak.

PRACTICAL VEDANTA - PART II

(Delivered in London, 12th November 1896)

I will relate to you a very ancient story from the Chhandogya Upanishad, which tells how knowledge came to a boy. The form of the story is very crude, but we shall find that it contains a principle. A young boy said to his mother, "I am going to study the Vedas. Tell me the name of my father and my caste." The mother was not a married woman, and in India the child of a woman who has not been married is considered an outcast; he is not recognised by society and is not entitled to study the Vedas. So the poor mother said, "My child, I do not know your family name; I was in service, and served in different places; I do not know who your father is, but my name is Jabala and your name is Satyakama." The little child went to a sage and asked to be taken as a student. The sage asked him, "What is the name of your father, and what is your caste?" The boy repeated to him what he had heard from his mother. The sage at once said, "None but a Brahmin could speak such a damaging truth about himself. You are a Brahmin and I will teach you. You have not swerved from the truth." So he kept the boy with him and educated him.

Now come some of the peculiar methods of education in ancient India. This teacher gave Satyakama four hundred lean, weak cows to take care of, and sent him to the forest. There he went and lived for some time. The teacher had told him to come back when the herd would increase to the number of one thousand. After a few years, one day Satyakama heard a big bull in the herd saying to him, "We are a thousand now; take us back to your teacher. I will teach you a little of Brahman." "Say on, sir," said Satyakama. Then the bull said, "The East is a part of the Lord, so is the West, so is the South, so is the North. The four cardinal points are the four parts of Brahman. Fire will also teach you something of Brahman." Fire was a great symbol in those days, and every student had to procure fire and make offerings. So on the following day, Satyakama started for his Guru's house, and when in the evening he had performed his oblation, and worshipped at the fire, and was sitting near it, he heard a voice come from the fire, "O Satyakama." "Speak, Lord," said Satyakama. (Perhaps you may remember a very similar story in the Old Testament, how Samuel heard a mysterious voice.) "O Satyakama, I am come to teach you a little of Brahman. This earth is a portion of that Brahman. The sky and heaven are portions of It. The ocean is a part of that Brahman." Then the fire said that a certain bird would also teach him something. Satyakama continued his journey and on the next day when he had performed his evening sacrifice a swan came to him and said, "I will teach you something about Brahman. This fire which you worship, O Satyakama, is a part of that Brahman. The sun is a part, the moon is a part, the lightning is a part of that Brahman. A bird called Madgu will tell you more about it." The next evening that bird came, and a similar voice was heard by Satyakama, "I will tell you something about Brahman. Breath is a part of Brahman, sight is a part, hearing is a part, the mind is a part." Then the boy arrived at his

1 teacher's place and presented himself before him with due 2 reverence. No sooner had the teacher seen this disciple than he 3 remarked: "Satyakama, thy face shines like that of a knower of 4 Brahman! Who then has taught thee?" "Beings other than men," 5 replied Satyakama. "But I wish that you should teach me, sir. For I 6 have heard from men like you that knowledge which is learnt from 7 a Guru alone leads to the supreme good." Then the sage taught him 8 the same knowledge which he had received from the gods. "And 9 nothing was left out, yea, nothing was left out."

10 Now, apart from the allegories of what the bull, the fire, and 11 the birds taught, we see the tendency of the thought and the 12 direction in which it was going in those days. The great idea of 13 which we here see the germ is that all these voices are inside 14 ourselves. As we understand these truths better, we find that the 15 voice is in our own heart, and the student understood that all the 16 time he was hearing the truth; but his explanation was not correct.
17 He was interpreting the voice as coming from the external world, 18 while all the time, it was within him. The second idea that we get is 19 that of making the knowledge of the Brahman practical. The world 20 is always seeking the practical possibilities of religion, and we find 21 in these stories how it was becoming more and more practical every 22 day. The truth was shown through everything with which the 23 students were familiar. The fire they were worshipping was 24 Brahman, the earth was a part of Brahman, and so on.

25 The next story belongs to Upakosala Kamalayana, a disciple 26 of this Satyakama, who went to be taught by him and dwelt with 27 him for some time. Now Satyakama went away on a journey, and 28 the student became very down-hearted; and when the teacher's 29 wife came and asked him why he was not eating, the boy said, "I am 30 too unhappy to eat." Then a voice came from the fire he was 31 worshipping, saying "This life is Brahman, Brahman is the ether, 32 and Brahman is happiness. Know Brahman." "I know, sir," the boy 33 replied, "that life is Brahman, but that It is ether and happiness I do 34 not know." Then it explained that the two words ether and 35 happiness signified one thing in reality, viz the sentient ether (pure 36 intelligence) that resides in the heart. So, it taught him Brahman as 37 life and as the ether in the heart. Then the fire taught him, "This 38 earth, food, fire, and sun whom you worship, are forms of Brahman.
39 The person that is seen in the sun, I am He. He who knows this and 40 meditates on Him, all his sins vanish and he has long life and 41 becomes happy. He who lives in the cardinal points, the moon, the 42 stars, and the water, I am He. He who lives in this life, the ether, 43 the heavens, and the lightning, I am He." Here too we see the same 44 idea of practical religion. The things which they were worshipping, 45 such as the fire, the sun, the moon, and so forth, and the voice with 46 which they were familiar, form the subject of the stories which 47 explain them and give them a higher meaning. And this is the real, 48 practical side of Vedanta. It does not destroy the world, but it 49 explains it; it does not destroy the person, but explains him; it does 50 not destroy the individuality, but explains it by showing the real 51 individuality. It does not show that this world is vain and does not 52 exist, but it says, "Understand what this world is, so that it may not

1 hurt you." The voice did not say to Upakosala that the fire which he 2 was worshipping, or the sun, or the moon, or the lightning, or 3 anything else, was all wrong, but it showed him that the same spirit 4 which was inside the sun, and the moon, and lightning, and the fire, 5 and the earth, was in him, so that everything became transformed, 6 as it were, in the eyes of Upakosala. The fire which was merely a 7 material fire before, in which to make oblations, assumed a new 8 aspect and became the Lord. The earth became transformed, life 9 became transformed, the sun, the moon, the stars, the lightning, 10 everything became transformed and deified. Their real nature was 11 known. The theme of the Vedanta is to see the Lord in everything, 12 to see things in their real nature, not as they appear to be. Then 13 another lesson is taught in the Upanishads: "He who shines through 14 the eyes is Brahman; He is the Beautiful One, He is the Shining 15 One. He shines in all these worlds." A certain peculiar light, a 16 commentator says, which comes to the pure man, is what is meant 17 by the light in the eyes, and it is said that when a man is pure such 18 a light will shine in his eyes, and that light belongs really to the 19 Soul within, which is everywhere. It is the same light which shines 20 in the planets, in the stars, and suns.

21 I will now read to you some other doctrine of these ancient 22 Upanishads, about birth and death and so on. Perhaps it will 23 interest you. Shvetaketu went to the king of the Panchalas, and the 24 king asked him, "Do you know where people go when they die? Do 25 you know how they come back? Do you know why the other world 26 does not become full?" The boy replied that he did not know. Then 27 he went to his father and asked him the same questions. The father 28 said, "I do not know," and he went to the king. The king said that 29 this knowledge was never known to the priests, it was only with the 30 kings, and that was the reason why kings ruled the world. This man 31 stayed with the king for some time, for the king said he would teach 32 him. "The other world, O Gautama, is the fire. The sun is its fuel.
33 The rays are the smoke. The day is the flame. The moon is the 34 embers. And the stars are the sparks. In this fire the gods pour 35 libation of faith and from this libation king Soma is born." So on he 36 goes. "You need not make oblation to that little fire: the whole world 37 is that fire, and this oblation, this worship, is continually going on.
38 The gods, and the angels, and everybody is worshipping it. Man is 39 the greatest symbol of fire, the body of man." Here also we see the 40 ideal becoming practical and Brahman is seen in everything. The 41 principle that underlies all these stories is that invented symbolism 42 may be good and helpful, but already better symbols exist than any 43 we can invent. You may invent an image through which to worship 44 God, but a better image already exists, the living man. You may 45 build a temple in which to worship God, and that may be good, but 46 a better one, a much higher one, already exists, the human body.

47 You remember that the Vedas have two parts, the ceremonial 48 and the knowledge portions. In time ceremonials had multiplied and 49 become so intricate that it was almost hopeless to disentangle 50 them, and so in the Upanishads we find that the ceremonials are 51 almost done away with, but gently, by explaining them. We see that 52 in old times they had these oblations and sacrifices, then the 1 philosophers came, and instead of snatching away the symbols from 2 the hands of the ignorant, instead of taking the negative position, 3 which we unfortunately find so general in modern reforms, they 4 gave them something to take their place. "Here is the symbol of 5 fire," they said. "Very good! But here is another symbol, the earth.

6 What a grand, great symbol! Here is this little temple, but the 7 whole universe is a temple; a man can worship anywhere. There are 8 the peculiar figures that men draw on the earth, and there are the 9 altars, but here is the greatest of altars, the living, conscious human 10 body, and to worship at this altar is far higher than the worship of 11 any dead symbols."

12 We now come to a peculiar doctrine. I do not understand 13 much of it myself. If you can make something out of it, I will read it 14 to you. When a man dies, who has by meditation purified himself 15 and got knowledge, he first goes to light, then from light to day, 16 from day to the light-half of the moon, from that to the six months 17 when the sun goes to the north, from that to the year, from the year 18 to the sun, from the sun to the moon, from the moon to the 19 lightning, and when he comes to the sphere of lightning, he meets a 20 person who is not human, and that person leads him to (the 21 conditioned) Brahman. This is the way of the gods. When sages and 22 wise persons die, they go that way and they do not return. What is 23 meant by this month and year, and all these things, no one 24 understands clearly. Each one gives his own meaning, and some say 25 it is all nonsense. What is meant by going to the world of the moon 26 and of the sun, and this person who comes to help the soul after it 27 has reached the sphere of lightning, no one knows. There is an idea 28 among the Hindus that the moon is a place where life exists, and 29 we shall see how life has come from there. Those that have not 30 attained to knowledge, but have done good work in this life, first go, 31 when they die, through smoke, then to night, then to the dark 32 fifteen days, then to the six months when the sun goes to the south, 33 and from that they go to the region of their forefathers, then to 34 ether, then to the region of the moon, and there become the food of 35 the gods, and later, are born as gods and live there so long as their 36 good works will permit. And when the effect of the good work has 37 been finished, they come back to earth by the same route. They first 38 become ether, and then air, and then smoke, and then mist, then 39 cloud, and then fall upon the earth as raindrops; then they get into 40 food, which is eaten up by human beings, and finally become their 41 children. Those whose works have been very good take birth in 42 good families, and those whose works have been bad take bad 43 births, even in animal bodies. Animals are continually coming to 44 and going from this earth. That is why the earth is neither full nor 45 empty.

46 Several ideas we can get also from this, and later on, 47 perhaps, we shall be able to understand it better, and we can 48 speculate a little upon what it means. The last part which deals with 49 how those who have been in heaven return, is clearer, perhaps, 50 than the first part; but the whole idea seems to be this that there is 51 no permanent heaven without realising God. Now some people who 52 have not realised God, but have done good work in this world, with

1 the view of enjoying the results, go, when they die, through this and 2 that place, until they reach heaven, and there they are born in the 3 same way as we are here, as children of the gods, and they live 4 there as long as their good works will permit. Out of this comes one 5 basic idea of the Vedanta that everything which has name and form 6 is transient. This earth is transient, because it has name and form, 7 and so the heavens must be transient, because there also name and 8 form remain. A heaven which is eternal will be contradictory in 9 terms, because everything that has name and form must begin in 10 time, exist in time, and end in time. These are settled doctrines of 11 the Vedanta, and as such the heavens are given up.

12 We have seen in the Samhita that the idea of heaven was that 13 it was eternal, much the same as is prevalent among 14 Mohammedans and Christians. The Mohammedans concretise it a 15 little more. They say it is a place where there are gardens, beneath 16 which rivers run. In the desert of Arabia water is very desirable, so 17 the Mohammedan always conceives of his heaven as containing 18 much water. I was born in a country where there are six months of 19 rain every year. I should think of heaven, I suppose, as a dry place, 20 and so also would the English people. These heavens in the Samhita 21 are eternal, and the departed have beautiful bodies and live with 22 their forefathers, and are happy ever afterwards. There they meet 23 with their parents, children, and other relatives, and lead very 24 much the same sort of life as here, only much happier. All the 25 difficulties and obstructions to happiness in this life have vanished, 26 and only its good parts and enjoyments remain. But however 27 comfortable mankind may consider this state of things, truth is one 28 thing and comfort is another. There are cases where truth is not 29 comfortable until we reach its climax. Human nature is very 30 conservative. It does something, and having once done that, finds it 31 hard to get out of it. The mind will not receive new thoughts, 32 because they bring discomfort.

33 In the Upanishads, we see a tremendous departure made. It 34 is declared that these heavens in which men live with the ancestors 35 after death cannot be permanent, seeing that everything which has 36 name and form must die.

37 If there are heavens with forms, these heavens must vanish in 38 course of time; they may last millions of years, but there must come 39 a time when they will have to go. With this idea came another that 40 these souls must come back to earth, and that heavens are places 41 where they enjoy the results of their good works, and after these 42 effects are finished they come back into this earth life again. One 43 thing is clear from this that mankind had a perception of the 44 philosophy of causation even at the early time. Later on we shall 45 see how our philosophers bring that out in the language of 46 philosophy and logic, but here it is almost in the language of 47 children. One thing you may remark in reading these books that it 48 is all internal perception. If you ask me if this can be practical, my 49 answer is, it has been practical first, and philosophical next. You 50 can see that first these things have been perceived and realised and 51 then written. This world spoke to the early thinkers. Birds spoke to 52 them, animals spoke to them, the sun and the moon spoke to them;

1 and little by little they realised things, and got into the heart of 2 nature. Not by cogitation, not by the force of logic, not by picking 3 the brains of others and making a big book, as is the fashion in 4 modern times, not even as I do, by taking up one of their writings 5 and making a long lecture, but by patient investigation and 6 discovery they found out the truth. Its essential method was 7 practice, and so it must be always. Religion is ever a practical 8 science, and there never was nor will be any theological religion. It 9 is practice first, and knowledge afterwards. The idea that souls 10 come back is already there. Those persons who do good work with 11 the idea of a result, get it, but the result is not permanent. There we 12 get the idea of causation very beautifully put forward, that the 13 effect is only commensurate with the cause. As the cause is, so the 14 effect will be. The cause being finite, the effect must be finite. If the 15 cause is eternal the effect can be eternal, but all these causes, 16 doing good work, and all other things, are only finite causes, and as 17 such cannot produce infinite result.

18 We now come to the other side of the question. As there 19 cannot be an eternal heaven, on the same grounds, there cannot be 20 an eternal hell. Suppose I am a very wicked man, doing evil every 21 minute of my life. Still, my whole life here, compared with my 22 eternal life, is nothing. If there be an eternal punishment, it will 23 mean that there is an infinite effect produced by a finite cause, 24 which cannot be. If I do good all my life, I cannot have an infinite 25 heaven; it would be making the same mistake. But there is a third 26 course which applies to those who have known the Truth, to those 27 who have realised It. This is the only way to get beyond this veil of 28 Maya--to realise what Truth is; and the Upanishads indicate what is 29 meant by realising the Truth.

30 It means recognising neither good nor bad, but knowing all as 31 coming from the Self; Self is in everything. It means denying the 32 universe; shutting your eyes to it; seeing the Lord in hell as well as 33 in heaven; seeing the Lord in death as well as in life. This is the line 34 of thought in the passage I have read to you; the earth is a symbol 35 of the Lord, the sky is the Lord, the place we fill is the Lord, 36 everything is Brahman. And this is to be seen, realised, not simply 37 talked or thought about. We can see as its logical consequence that 38 when the soul has realised that everything is full of the Lord, of 39 Brahman, it will not care whether it goes to heaven, or hell, or 40 anywhere else; whether it be born again on this earth or in heaven.
41 These things have ceased to have any meaning to that soul, because 42 every place is the same, every place is the temple of the Lord, every 43 place has become holy and the presence of the Lord is all that it 44 sees in heaven, or hell, or anywhere else. Neither good nor bad, 45 neither life nor death--only the one infinite Brahman exists.

46 According to the Vedanta, when a man has arrived at that 47 perception, he has become free, and he is the only man who is fit to 48 live in this world. Others are not. The man who sees evil, how can 49 he live in this world? His life is a mass of misery. The man who sees 50 dangers, his life is a misery; the man who sees death, his life is a 51 misery. That man alone can live in this world, he alone can say, "I 52 enjoy this life, and I am happy in this life," who has seen the Truth,

1 and the Truth in everything. By the by, I may tell you that the idea 2 of hell does not occur in the Vedas anywhere. It comes with the 3 Puranas much later. The worst punishment according to the Vedas 4 is coming back to earth, having another chance in this world. From 5 the very first we see the idea is taking the impersonal turn. The 6 ideas of punishment and reward are very material, and they are 7 only consonant with the idea of a human God, who loves one and 8 hates another, just as we do. Punishment and reward are only 9 admissible with the existence of such a God. They had such a God 10 in the Samhita, and there we find the idea of fear entering, but as 11 soon as we come to the Upanishads, the idea of fear vanishes, and 12 the impersonal idea takes its place. It is naturally the hardest thing 13 for man to understand, this impersonal idea, for he is always 14 clinging on to the person. Even people who are thought to be great 15 thinkers get disgusted at the idea of the Impersonal God. But to me 16 it seems so absurd to think of God as an embodied man. Which is 17 the higher idea, a living God, or a dead God? A God whom nobody 18 sees, nobody knows, or a God Known?

19 The Impersonal God is a living God, a principle. The 20 difference between personal and impersonal is this, that the 21 personal is only a man, and the impersonal idea is that He is the 22 angel, the man, the animal, and yet something more which we 23 cannot see, because impersonality includes all personalities, is the 24 sum total of everything in the universe, and infinitely more besides.
25 "As the one fire coming into the world is manifesting itself in so 26 many forms, and yet is infinitely more besides," so is the 27 Impersonal.

28 We want to worship a living God. I have seen nothing but God 29 all my life, nor have you. To see this chair you first see God, and 30 then the chair in and through Him. He is everywhere saying, "I am".
31 The moment you feel "I am", you are conscious of Existence. Where 32 shall we go to find God if we cannot see Him in our own hearts and 33 in every living being? "Thou art the man, Thou art the woman, Thou 34 art the girl, and Thou art the boy. Thou art the old man tottering 35 with a stick. Thou art the young man walking in the pride of his 36 strength." Thou art all that exists, a wonderful living God who is the 37 only fact in the universe. This seems to many to be a terrible 38 contradiction to the traditional God who lives behind a veil 39 somewhere and whom nobody ever sees. The priests only give us an 40 assurance that if we follow them, listen to their admonitions, and 41 walk in the way they mark out for us--then when we die, they will 42 give us a passport to enable us to see the face of God! What are all 43 these heaven ideas but simply modifications of this nonsensical 44 priestcraft?

45 Of course the impersonal idea is very destructive; it takes 46 away all trade from the priests, churches, and temples. In India 47 there is a famine now, but there are temples in each one of which 48 there are jewels worth a king's ransom! If the priests taught this 49 Impersonal idea to the people, their occupation would be gone. Yet 50 we have to teach it unselfishly, without priestcraft. You are God and 51 so am I; who obeys whom? Who worships whom? You are the 52 highest temple of God; I would rather worship you than any temple,

1 image, or Bible. Why are some people so contradictory in their 2 thought? They are like fish slipping through our fingers. They say 3 they are hard-headed practical men. Very good. But what is more 4 practical than worshipping here, worshipping you? I see you, feel 5 you, and I know you are God. The Mohammedan says, there is no
6 God but Allah. The Vedanta says, there is nothing that is not God. It 7 may frighten many of you, but you will understand it by degrees.
8 The living God is within you, and yet you are building churches and 9 temples and believing all sorts of imaginary nonsense. The only God 10 to worship is the human soul in the human body. Of course all 11 animals are temples too, but man is the highest, the Taj Mahal of 12 temples. If I cannot worship in that, no other temple will be of any 13 advantage. The moment I have realised God sitting in the temple of 14 every human body, the moment I stand in reverence before every 15 human being and see God in him--that moment I am free from 16 bondage, everything that binds vanishes, and I am free.

17 This is the most practical of all worship. It has nothing to do 18 with theorising and speculation. Yet it frightens many. They say it is 19 not right. They go on theorising about old ideals told them by their 20 grandfathers, that a God somewhere in heaven had told some one 21 that he was God. Since that time we have only theories. This is 22 practicality according to them, and our ideas are impractical! No 23 doubt, the Vedanta says that each one must have his own path, but 24 the path is not the goal. The worship of a God in heaven and all 25 these things are not bad, but they are only steps towards the Truth 26 and not the Truth itself. They are good and beautiful, and some 27 wonderful ideas are there, but the Vedanta says at every point, "My 28 friend, Him whom you are worshipping as unknown, I worship as 29 thee. He whom you are worshipping as unknown and are seeking 30 for, throughout the universe, has been with you all the time. You are 31 living through Him, and He is the Eternal Witness of the universe." 32 "He whom all the Vedas worship, nay, more, He who is always 33 present in the eternal 'I', He existing, the whole universe exists. He 34 is the light and life of the universe.

35 If the 'I' were not in you, you would not see the sun, 36 everything would be a dark mass. He shining, you see the world."

37 One question is generally asked, and it is this that this may 38 lead to a tremendous amount of difficulty. Everyone of us will think, 39 "I am God, and whatever I do or think must be good, for God can do 40 no evil." In the first place, even taking this danger of 41 misinterpretation for granted, can it be proved that on the other 42 side the same danger does not exist? They have been worshipping a 43 God in heaven separate from them, and of whom they are much 44 afraid. They have been born shaking with fear, and all their life they 45 will go on shaking. Has the world been made much better by this?
46 Those who have understood and worshipped a Personal God, and 47 those who have understood and worshipped an Impersonal God, on 48 which side have been the great workers of the world--gigantic 49 workers, gigantic moral powers? Certainly on the Impersonal. How 50 can you expect morality to be developed through fear? It can never 51 be. "Where one sees another, where one hears another, that is 52 Maya. When one does not see another, when one does not hear

1 another, when everything has become the Atman, who sees whom,
2 who perceives whom?" It is all He, and all I, at the same time. The 3 soul has become pure. Then, and then alone we understand what 4 love is. Love cannot come through fear, its basis is freedom. When 5 we really begin to love the world, then we understand what is 6 meant by brotherhood or mankind, and not before.

7 So, it is not right to say that the Impersonal idea will lead to a 8 tremendous amount of evil in the world, as if the other doctrine 9 never lent itself to works of evil, as if it did not lead to sectarianism 10 deluging the world with blood and causing men to tear each other 11 to pieces. "My God is the greatest god, let us decide it by a free 12 fight." That is the outcome of dualism all over the world. Come out 13 into the broad open light of day, come out from the little narrow 14 paths, for how can the infinite soul rest content to live and die in 15 small ruts? Come out into the universe of Light. Everything in the 16 universe is yours, stretch out your arms and embrace it with love. If 17 you ever felt you wanted to do that, you have felt God.

18 You remember that passage in the sermon of Buddha, how he 19 sent a thought of love towards the south, the north, the east, and 20 the west, above and below, until the whole universe was filled with 21 this love, so grand, great, and infinite. When you have that feeling, 22 you have true personality. The whole universe is one person; let go 23 the little things. Give up the small for the Infinite, give up small 24 enjoyments for infinite bliss. It is all yours, for the Impersonal 25 includes the Personal. So God is Personal and Impersonal at the 26 same time. And Man, the Infinite, Impersonal Man, is manifesting 27 Himself as person. We the infinite have limited ourselves, as it 28 were, into small parts. The Vedanta says that Infinity is our true 29 nature; it will never vanish, it will abide for ever. But we are 30 limiting ourselves by our Karma, which like a chain round our necks 31 has dragged us into this limitation. Break that chain and be free.
32 Trample law under your feet. There is no law in human nature, 33 there is no destiny, no fate. How can there be law in infinity?
34 Freedom is its watchword. Freedom is its nature, its birthright. Be 35 free, and then have any number of personalities you like. Then we 36 will play like the actor who comes upon the stage and plays the part 37 of a beggar. Contrast him with the actual beggar walking in the 38 streets. The scene is, perhaps, the same in both cases, the words 39 are, perhaps, the same, but yet what difference! The one enjoys his 40 beggary while the other is suffering misery from it. And what makes 41 this difference? the one is free and the other is bound. The actor 42 knows his beggary is not true, but that he has assumed it for play, 43 while the real beggar thinks that it is his too familiar state and that 44 he has to bear it whether he wills it or not. This is the law. So long 45 as we have no knowledge of our real nature, we are beggars, 46 jostled about by every force in nature; and made slaves of by 47 everything in nature; we cry all over the world for help, but help 48 never comes to us; we cry to imaginary beings, and yet it never 49 comes. But still we hope help will come, and thus in weeping, 50 wailing, and hoping, one life is passed, and the same play goes on 51 and on.

52 Be free; hope for nothing from anyone. I am sure if you look

1 back upon your lives you will find that you were always vainly trying 2 to get help from others which never came. All the help that has 3 come was from within yourselves. You only had the fruits of what 4 you yourselves worked for, and yet you were strangely hoping all
5 the time for help. A rich man's parlour is always full; but if you 6 notice, you do not find the same people there. The visitors are 7 always hoping that they will get something from those wealthy men, 8 but they never do. So are our lives spent in hoping, hoping, hoping, 9 which never comes to an end. Give up hope, says the Vedanta. Why 10 should you hope? You have everything, nay, you are everything.
11 What are you hoping for? If a king goes mad, and runs about trying 12 to find the king of his country, he will never find him, because he is 13 the king himself. He may go through every village and city in his 14 own country, seeking in every house, weeping and wailing, but he 15 will never find him, because he is the king himself. It is better that 16 we know we are God and give up this fool's search after Him; and 17 knowing that we are God we become happy and contented. Give up 18 all these mad pursuits, and then play your part in the universe, as 19 an actor on the stage.

20 The whole vision is changed, and instead of an eternal prison 21 this world has become a playground; instead of a land of 22 competition it is a land of bliss, where there is perpetual spring, 23 flowers bloom and butterflies flit about.

24 This very world becomes heaven, which formerly was hell. To 25 the eyes of the bound it is a tremendous place of torment, but to the 26 eyes of the free it is quite otherwise. This one life is the universal 27 life, heavens and all those places are here. All the gods are here, 28 the prototypes of man. The gods did not create man after their type, 29 but man created gods. And here are the prototypes, here is Indra, 30 here is Varuna, and all the gods of the universe. We have been 31 projecting our little doubles, and we are the originals of these gods, 32 we are the real, the only gods to be worshipped. This is the view of 33 the Vedanta, and this its practicality. When we have become free, 34 we need not go mad and throw up society and rush off to die in the 35 forest or the cave; we shall remain where we were, only we shall 36 understand the whole thing. The same phenomena will remain, but 37 with a new meaning. We do not know the world yet; it is only 38 through freedom that we see what it is, and understand its nature.
39 We shall see then that this so-called law, or fate, or destiny occupies 40 only an infinitesimal part of our nature. It was only one side, but on 41 the other side there was freedom all the time. We did not know this, 42 and that is why we have been trying to save ourselves from evil by 43 hiding our faces in the ground, like the hunted hare. Through 44 delusion we have been trying to forget our nature, and yet we could 45 not; it was always calling upon us, and all our search after God or 46 gods, or external freedom, was a search after our real nature. We 47 mistook the voice. We thought it was from the fire, or from a god or 48 the sun, or moon, or stars, but at last we have found that it was 49 from within ourselves. Within ourselves is this eternal voice 50 speaking of eternal freedom; its music is eternally going on. Part of 51 this music of the Soul has become the earth, the law, this universe, 52 but it was always ours and always will be. In one word, the ideal of 1 Vedanta is to know man as he really is, and this is its message, that 2 if you cannot worship your brother man, the manifested God, how 3 can you worship a God who is unmanifested?

4 Do you not remember what the Bible says, "If you cannot love
5 your brother whom you have seen, how can you love God whom you 6 have not seen?" If you cannot see God in the human face, how can 7 you see him in the clouds, or in images made of dull, dead matter, 8 or in mere fictitious stories of our brain? I shall call you religious 9 from the day you begin to see God in men and women, and then you 10 will understand what is meant by turning the left cheek to the man 11 who strikes you on the right. When you see man as God, everything, 12 even the tiger, will be welcome. Whatever comes to you is but the 13 Lord, the Eternal, the Blessed One, appearing to us in various 14 forms, as our father, and mother, and friend, and child--they are our 15 own soul playing with us.

16 As our human relationships can thus be made divine, so our 17 relationship with God may take any of these forms and we can look 18 upon Him as our father, or mother, or friend, or beloved. Calling 19 God Mother is a higher ideal than calling Him Father; and to call 20 Him Friend is still higher; but the highest is to regard Him as the 21 Beloved. The highest point of all is to see no difference between 22 lover and beloved. You may remember, perhaps, the old Persian 23 story, of how a lover came and knocked at the door of the beloved 24 and was asked, "Who are you?" He answered, "It is I", and there 25 was no response. A second time he came, and exclaimed, "I am 26 here", but the door was not opened. The third time he came, and 27 the voice asked from inside, "Who is there?" He replied, "I am 28 thyself, my beloved", and the door opened. So is the relation 29 between God and ourselves. He is in everything. He is everything.
30 Every man and woman is the palpable, blissful, living God. Who 31 says God is unknown? Who says He is to be searched after?

32 We have found God eternally. We have been living in Him
33 eternally; everywhere He is eternally known, eternally worshipped.

34 Then comes another idea, that other forms of worship are not 35 errors. This is one of the great points to be remembered, that those 36 who worship God through ceremonials and forms, however crude 37 we may think them to be, are not in error. It is the journey from 38 truth to truth, from lower truth to higher truth. Darkness is less 39 light; evil is less good; impurity is less purity. It must always be 40 borne in mind that we should see others with eyes of love, with 41 sympathy, knowing that they are going along the same path that we 42 have trodden. If you are free, you must know that all will be so 43 sooner or later, and if you are free, how can you see the 44 impermanent? If you are really pure, how do you see the impure?
45 For what is within, is without. We cannot see impurity without 46 having it inside ourselves. This is one of the practical sides of 47 Vedanta, and I hope that we shall all try to carry it into our lives.
48 Our whole life here is to carry this into practice, but the one great 49 point we gain is that we shall work with satisfaction and 50 contentment, instead of with discontent and dissatisfaction, for we 51 know that Truth is within us, we have It as our birthright, and we 52 have only to manifest It, and make It tangible.

PRACTICAL VEDANTA - PART III

(Delivered in London, 17th November 1896)

In the Chhandogya Upanishad we read that a sage called Narada came to another called Sanatkumara, and asked him various questions, of which one was, if religion was the cause of things as they are. And Sanatkumara leads him, as it were, step by step, telling him that there is something higher than this earth, and something higher than that, and so on, till he comes to Akasha, ether. Ether is higher than light, because in the ether are the sun and the moon, lightning and the stars; in ether we live, and in ether we die. Then the question arises, if there is anything higher than that, and Sanatkumara tells him of Prana. This Prana, according to the Vedanta, is the principle of life. It is like ether, an omnipresent principle; and all motion, either in the body or anywhere else, is the work of this Prana. It is greater than Akasha, and through it everything lives. Prana is in the mother, in the father, in the sister, in the teacher, Prana is the knower.

I will read another passage, where Shvetaketu asks his father about the Truth, and the father teaches him different things, and concludes by saying, "That which is the fine cause in all these things, of It are all these things made. That is the All, that is Truth, thou art That, O Shvetaketu." And then he gives various examples. "As a bee, O Shvetaketu, gathers honey from different flowers, and as the different honeys do not know that they are from various trees, and from various flowers, so all of us, having come to that Existence, know not that we have done so. Now, that which is that subtle essence, in It all that exists has its self. It is the True. It is the Self and thou, O Shvetaketu, are That." He gives another example of the rivers running down to the ocean. "As the rivers, when they are in the ocean, do not know that they have been various rivers, even so when we come out of that Existence, we do not know that we are That. O Shvetaketu, thou are That." So on he goes with his teachings.

Now there are two principles of knowledge. The one principle is that we know by referring the particular to the general, and the general to the universal; and the second is that anything of which the explanation is sought is to be explained so far as possible from its own nature. Taking up the first principle, we see that all our knowledge really consists of classifications, going higher and higher. When something happens singly, we are, as it were, dissatisfied. When it can be shown that the same thing happens again and again, we are satisfied and call it law. When we find that one apple falls, we are dissatisfied; but when we find that all apples fall, we call it the law of gravitation and are satisfied. The fact is that from the particular we deduce the general.

When we want to study religion, we should apply this scientific process. The same principle also holds good here, and as a fact we find that that has been the method all through. In reading these books from which I have been translating to you, the earliest idea that I can trace is this principle of going from the particular to

1 the general. We see how the "bright ones" became merged into one 2 principle; and likewise in the ideas of the cosmos we find the 3 ancient thinkers going higher and higher--from the fine elements 4 they go to finer and more embracing elements, and from these 5 particulars they come to one omnipresent ether, and from that even 6 they go to an all-embracing force, or Prana; and through all this 7 runs the principle, that one is not separate from the others. It is the 8 very ether that exists in the higher form of Prana, or the higher 9 form of Prana concretes, so to say, and becomes ether; and that 10 ether becomes still grosser, and so on.

11 The generalisation of the Personal God is another case in 12 point. We have seen how this generalisation was reached, and was 13 called the sum total of all consciousness. But a difficulty arises--it is 14 an incomplete generalisation. We take up only one side of the facts 15 of nature, the fact of consciousness, and upon that we generalise, 16 but the other side is left out. So, in the first place it is a defective 17 generalisation. There is another insufficiency, and that relates to 18 the second principle. Everything should be explained from its own 19 nature. There may have been people who thought that every apple 20 that fell to the ground was dragged down by a ghost, but the 21 explanation is the law of gravitation; and although we know it is not 22 a perfect explanation, yet it is much better than the other, because 23 it is derived from the nature of the thing itself, while the other 24 posits an extraneous cause. So throughout the whole range of our 25 knowledge; the explanation which is based upon the nature of the 26 thing itself is a scientific explanation, and an explanation which 27 brings in an outside agent is unscientific.

28 So the explanation of a Personal God as the creator of the 29 universe has to stand that test. If that God is outside of nature, 30 having nothing to do with nature, and this nature is the outcome of 31 the command of that God and produced from nothing, it is a very 32 unscientific theory, and this has been the weak point of every 33 Theistic religion throughout the ages. These two defects we find in 34 what is generally called the theory of monotheism, the theory of a 35 Personal God, with all the qualities of a human being multiplied 36 very much, who, by His will, created this universe out of nothing 37 and yet is separate from it. This leads us into two difficulties.

38 As we have seen, it is not a sufficient generalisation, and 39 secondly, it is not an explanation of nature from nature. It holds that 40 the effect is not the cause, that the cause is entirely separate from 41 the effect. Yet all human knowledge shows that the effect is but the 42 cause in another form. To this idea the discoveries of modern 43 science are tending every day, and the latest theory that has been 44 accepted on all sides is the theory of evolution, the principle of 45 which is that the effect is but the cause in another form, a 46 readjustment of the cause, and the cause takes the form of the 47 effect. The theory of creation out of nothing would be laughed at by 48 modern scientists.

49 Now, can religion stand these tests? If there be any religious 50 theories which can stand these two tests, they will be acceptable to 51 the modern mind, to the thinking mind. Any other theory which we 52 ask the modern man to believe, on the authority of priests, or

1 churches, or books, he is unable to accept, and the result is a 2 hideous mass of unbelief. Even in those in whom there is an 3 external display of belief, in their hearts there is a tremendous 4 amount of unbelief. The rest shrink away from religion, as it were, 5 give it up, regarding it as priestcraft only.

6 Religion has been reduced to a sort of national form. It is one 7 of our very best social remnants; let it remain. But the real 8 necessity which the grandfather of the modern man felt for it is 9 gone; he no longer finds it satisfactory to his reason. The idea of 10 such a Personal God, and such a creation, the idea which is 11 generally known as monotheism in every religion, cannot hold its 12 own any longer. In India it could not hold its own because of the 13 Buddhists, and that was the very point where they gained their 14 victory in ancient times. They showed that if we allow that nature is 15 possessed of infinite power, and that nature can work out all its 16 wants, it is simply unnecessary to insist that there is something 17 besides nature. Even the soul is unnecessary.

18 The discussion about substance and qualities is very old, and 19 you will sometimes find that the old superstition lives even at the 20 present day. Most of you have read how, during the Middle Ages, 21 and, I am sorry to say, even much later, this was one of the subjects 22 of discussion, whether qualities adhered to substance, whether 23 length, breadth, and thickness adhered to the substance which we 24 call dead matter, whether, the substance remaining, the qualities 25 are there or not. To this our Buddhist says, "You have no ground for 26 maintaining the existence of such a substance; the qualities are all 27 that exist; you do not see beyond them." This is just the position of 28 most of our modern agnostics. For it is this fight of the substance 29 and qualities that, on a higher plane, takes the form of the fight 30 between noumenon and phenomenon. There is the phenomenal 31 world, the universe of continuous change, and there is something 32 behind which does not change; and this duality of existence, 33 noumenon and phenomenon, some hold, is true, and others with 34 better reason claim that you have no right to admit the two, for 35 what we see, feel, and think is only the phenomenon. You have no 36 right to assert there is anything beyond phenomenon; and there is 37 no answer to this. The only answer we get is from the monistic 38 theory of the Vedanta. It is true that only one exists, and that one is 39 either phenomenon or noumenon. It is not true that there are two-- 40 something changing, and, in and through that, something which 41 does not change; but it is the one and the same thing which appears 42 as changing, and which is in reality unchangeable. We have come to 43 think of the body, and mind, and soul as many, but really there is 44 only one; and that one is appearing in all these various forms. Take 45 the well-known illustration of the monists, the rope appearing as 46 the snake. Some people, in the dark or through some other cause, 47 mistake the rope for the snake, but when knowledge comes, the 48 snake vanishes and it is found to be a rope. By this illustration we 49 see that when the snake exists in the mind, the rope has vanished, 50 and when the rope exists, the snake has gone. When we see 51 phenomenon, and phenomenon only, around us, the noumenon has 52 vanished, but when we see the noumenon, the unchangeable, it

1 naturally follows that the phenomenon has vanished. Now, we 2 understand better the position of both the realist and the idealist.
3 The realist sees the phenomenon only, and the idealist looks to the 4 noumenon. For the idealist, the really genuine idealist, who has 5 truly arrived at the power of perception, whereby he can get away 6 from all ideas of change, for him the changeful universe has 7 vanished, and he has the right to say it is all delusion, there is no 8 change. The realist at the same time looks at the changeful. For him 9 the unchangeable has vanished, and he has a right to say this is all 10 real.

11 What is the outcome of this philosophy? It is that the idea of 12 Personal God is not sufficient. We have to get to something higher, 13 to the Impersonal idea. It is the only logical step that we can take.
14 Not that the personal idea would be destroyed by that, not that we 15 supply proof that the Personal God does not exist, but we must go 16 to the Impersonal for the explanation of the personal, for the 17 Impersonal is a much higher generalisation than the personal. The 18 Impersonal only can be Infinite, the personal is limited. Thus we 19 preserve the personal and do not destroy it. Often the doubt comes 20 to us that if we arrive at the idea of the Impersonal God, the 21 personal will be destroyed, if we arrive at the idea of the 22 Impersonal man, the personal will be lost. But the Vedantic idea is 23 not the destruction of the individual, but its real preservation. We 24 cannot prove the individual by any other means but by referring to 25 the universal, by proving that this individual is really the universal.
26 If we think of the individual as separate from everything else in the 27 universe, it cannot stand a minute. Such a thing never existed.

28 Secondly, by the application of the second principle, that the 29 explanation of everything must come out of the nature of the thing, 30 we are led to a still bolder idea, and one more difficult to 31 understand. It is nothing less than this, that the Impersonal Being, 32 our highest generalisation, is in ourselves, and we are That. "O 33 Shvetaketu, thou art That." You are that Impersonal Being; that God 34 for whom you have been searching all over the universe is all the 35 time yourself-yourself not in the personal sense but in the 36 Impersonal. The man we know now, the manifested, is personalised, 37 but the reality of this is the Impersonal. To understand the personal 38 we have to refer it to the Impersonal, the particular must be 39 referred to the general, and that Impersonal is the Truth, the Self of 40 man.

41 There will be various questions in connection with this, and I 42 shall try to answer them as we go on. Many difficulties will arise, 43 but first let us clearly understand the position of monism. As 44 manifested beings we appear to be separate, but our reality is one, 45 and the less we think of ourselves as separate from that One, the 46 better for us. The more we think of ourselves as separate from the 47 Whole, the more miserable we become. From this monistic 48 principle we get at the basis of ethics, and I venture to say that we 49 cannot get any ethics from anywhere else. We know that the oldest 50 idea of ethics was the will of some particular being or beings, but 51 few are ready to accept that now, because it would be only a partial 52 generalisation. The Hindus say we must not do this or that because

1 the Vedas say so, but the Christian is not going to obey the 2 authority of the Vedas. The Christian says you must do this and to 3 do that because the Bible says so. That will not be binding on those 4 who do not believe in the Bible. But we must have a theory which is 5 large enough to take in all these various grounds. Just as there are 6 millions of people who are ready to believe in a Personal Creator, 7 there have also been thousands of the brightest minds in this world 8 who felt that such ideas were not sufficient for them, and wanted 9 something higher, and wherever religion was not broad enough to 10 include all these minds, the result was that the brightest minds in 11 society were always outside of religion; and never was this so 12 marked as at the present time, especially in Europe.

13 To include these minds, therefore, religion must become 14 broad enough. Everything it claims must be judged from the 15 standpoint of reason. Why religions should claim that they are not 16 bound to abide by the standpoint of reason, no one knows. If one 17 does not take the standard of reason, there cannot be any true 18 judgment, even in the case of religions. One religion may ordain 19 something very hideous. For instance, the Mohammedan religion 20 allows Mohammedans to kill all who are not of their religion. It is 21 clearly stated in the Koran, "Kill the infidels if they do not become 22 Mohammedans." They must be put to fire and sword. Now if we tell 23 a Mohammedan that this is wrong, he will naturally ask, "How do 24 you know that? How do you know it is not good? My book says it is."
25 If you say your book is older, there will come the Buddhist, and say, 26 my book is much older still. Then will come the Hindu, and say, my 27 books are the oldest of all. Therefore referring to books will not do.
28 Where is the standard by which you can compare? You will say, look 29 at the Sermon on the Mount, and the Mohammedan will reply, look 30 at the Ethics of the Koran. The Mohammedan will say, who is the 31 arbiter as to which is the better of the two? Neither the New 32 Testament nor the Koran can be the arbiter in a quarrel between 33 them. There must be some independent authority, and that cannot 34 be any book, but something which is universal; and what is more 35 universal than reason? It has been said that reason is not strong 36 enough; it does not always help us to get at the Truth; many times it 37 makes mistakes, and, therefore, the conclusion is that we must 38 believe in the authority of a church! That was said to me by a 39 Roman Catholic, but I could not see the logic of it. On the other 40 hand I should say, if reason be so weak, a body of priests would be 41 weaker, and I am not going to accept their verdict, but I will abide 42 by my reason, because with all its weakness there is some chance 43 of my getting at truth through it; while, by the other means, there is 44 no such hope at all.

45 We should, therefore, follow reason and also sympathise with 46 those who do not come to any sort of belief, following reason. For it 47 is better that mankind should become atheist by following reason 48 than blindly believe in two hundred millions of gods on the 49 authority of anybody. What we want is progress, development, 50 realisation. No theories ever made men higher. No amount of books 51 can help us to become purer. The only power is in realisation, and 52 that lies in ourselves and comes from thinking. Let men think. A

1 clod of earth never thinks; but it remains only a lump of earth. The 2 glory of man is that he is a thinking being. It is the nature of man to 3 think and therein he differs from animals. I believe in reason and 4 follow reason having seen enough of the evils of authority, for I was 5 born in a country where they have gone to the extreme of authority.

6 The Hindus believe that creation has come out of the Vedas.
7 How do you know there is a cow? Because the word cow is in the 8 Vedas. How do you know there is a man outside? Because the word 9 man is there. If it had not been, there would have been no man 10 outside. That is what they say. Authority with a vengeance! And it is 11 not studied as I have studied it, but some of the most powerful 12 minds have taken it up and spun out wonderful logical theories 13 round it. They have reasoned it out, and there it stands--a whole 14 system of philosophy; and thousands of the brightest intellects have 15 been dedicated through thousands of years to the working out of 16 this theory. Such has been the power of authority, and great are the 17 dangers thereof. It stunts the growth of humanity, and we must not 18 forget that we want growth. Even in all relative truth, more than 19 the truth itself, we want the exercise. That is our life.

20 The monistic theory has this merit that it is the most rational 21 of all the religious theories that we can conceive of. Every other 22 theory, every conception of God which is partial and little and 23 personal is not rational. And yet monism has this grandeur that it 24 embraces all these partial conceptions of God as being necessary 25 for many. Some people say that this personal explanation is 26 irrational. But it is consoling; they want a consoling religion and we 27 understand that it is necessary for them. The clear light of truth 28 very few in this life can bear, much less live up to. It is necessary, 29 therefore, that this comfortable religion should exist; it helps many 30 souls to a better one. Small minds whose circumference is very 31 limited and which require little things to build them up, never 32 venture to soar high in thought. Their conceptions are very good 33 and helpful to them, even if only of little gods and symbols. But you 34 have to understand the Impersonal, for it is in and through that 35 alone that these others can be explained. Take, for instance, the 36 idea of a Personal God. A man who understands and believes in the 37 Impersonal--John Stuart Mill, for example--may say that a Personal 38 God is impossible, and cannot be proved. I admit with him that a 39 Personal God cannot be demonstrated. But He is the highest 40 reading of the Impersonal that can be reached by the human 41 intellect, and what else is the universe but various readings of the 42 Absolute? It is like a book before us, and each one has brought his 43 intellect to read it, and each one has to read it for himself. There is 44 something which is common in the intellect of all men; therefore 45 certain things appear to be the same to the intellect of mankind.
46 That you and I see a chair proves that there is something common 47 to both our minds. Suppose a being comes with another sense, he 48 will not see the chair at all; but all beings similarly constituted will 49 see the same things. Thus this universe itself is the absolute, the 50 unchangeable, the noumenon; and the phenomenon constitutes the 51 reading thereof. For you will first find that all phenomena are finite.
52 Every phenomenon that we can see, feel, or think of, is finite,

1 limited by our knowledge, and the Personal God as we conceive of 2 Him is in fact a phenomenon. The very idea of causation exists only 3 in the phenomenal world, and God as the cause of this universe
4 must naturally be thought of as limited, and yet He is the same 5 Impersonal God. This very universe, as we have seen, is the same 6 Impersonal Being read by our intellect. Whatever is reality in the 7 universe is that Impersonal Being, and the forms and conceptions 8 are given to it by our intellects. Whatever is real in this table is that 9 Being, and the table form and all other forms are given by our 10 intellects.

11 Now, motion, for instance, which is a necessary adjunct of the 12 phenomenal, cannot be predicated of the Universal. Every little bit, 13 every atom inside the universe, is in a constant state of change and 14 motion, but the universe as a whole is unchangeable, because 15 motion or change is a relative thing; we can only think of something 16 in motion in comparison with something which is not moving. There 17 must be two things in order to understand motion. The whole mass 18 of the universe, taken as a unit, cannot move. In regard to what will 19 it move? It cannot be said to change. With regard to what will it 20 change? So the whole is the absolute; but within it every particle is 21 in a constant state of flux and change. It is unchangeable and 22 changeable at the same time, Impersonal and Personal in one. This 23 is our conception of the universe, of motion and of God, and that is 24 what is meant by "Thou art That". Thus we see that the Impersonal 25 instead of doing away with the personal, the Absolute instead of 26 pulling down the relative, only explains it to the full satisfaction of 27 our reason and heart. The Personal God and all that exists in the 28 universe are the same Impersonal Being seen through our minds.
29 When we shall be rid of our minds, our little personalities, we shall 30 become one with It. This is what is meant by "Thou art That". For 31 we must know our true nature, the Absolute.

32 The finite, manifested man forgets his source and thinks 33 himself to be entirely separate. We, as personalised, differentiated 34 beings, forget our reality, and the teaching of monism is not that we 35 shall give up these differentiations, but we must learn to 36 understand what they are. We are in reality that Infinite Being, and 37 our personalities represent so many channels through which this 38 Infinite Reality is manifesting Itself; and the whole mass of changes 39 which we call evolution is brought about by the soul trying to 40 manifest more and more of its infinite energy. We cannot stop 41 anywhere on this side of the Infinite; our power, and blessedness, 42 and wisdom, cannot but grow into the Infinite. Infinite power and 43 existence and blessedness are ours, and we have not to acquire 44 them; they are our own, and we have only to manifest them.

45 This is the central idea of monism, and one that is so hard to 46 understand. From my childhood everyone around me taught 47 weakness; I have been told ever since I was born that I was a weak 48 thing. It is very difficult for me now to realise my own strength, but 49 by analysis and reasoning I gain knowledge of my own strength, I
50 realise it. All the knowledge that we have in this world, where did it 51 come from? It was within us. What knowledge is outside? None.
52 Knowledge was not in matter; it was in man all the time. Nobody

1 ever created knowledge; man brings it from within. It is lying there.
2 The whole of that big banyan tree which covers acres of ground,
3 was in the little seed which was, perhaps, no bigger than one eighth 4 of a mustard seed; all that mass of energy was there confined. The 5 gigantic intellect, we know, lies coiled up in the protoplasmic cell, 6 and why should not the infinite energy? We know that it is so. It 7 may seem like a paradox, but is true. Each one of us has come out 8 of one protoplasmic cell, and all the powers we possess were coiled 9 up there. You cannot say they came from food; for if you heap up 10 food mountains high, what power comes out of it? The energy was 11 there, potentially no doubt, but still there. So is infinite power in the 12 soul of man, whether he knows it or not. Its manifestation is only a 13 question of being conscious of it. Slowly this infinite giant is, as it 14 were, waking up, becoming conscious of his power, and arousing 15 himself; and with his growing consciousness, more and more of his 16 bonds are breaking, chains are bursting asunder, and the day is 17 sure to come when, with the full consciousness of his infinite power 18 and wisdom, the giant will rise to his feet and stand erect. Let us all 19 help to hasten that glorious consummation.

PRACTICAL VEDANTA - PART IV

(Delivered in London, 18th November 1896)

We have been dealing more with the universal so far. This morning I shall try to place before you the Vedantic ideas of the relation of the particular to the universal. As we have seen, in the dualistic form of Vedic doctrines, the earlier forms, there was a clearly defined particular and limited soul for every being. There have been a great many theories about this particular soul in each individual, but the main discussion was between the ancient Vedantists and the ancient Buddhists, the former believing in the individual soul as complete in itself, the latter denying in toto the existence of such an individual soul. As I told you the other day, it is pretty much the same discussion you have in Europe as to substance and quality, one set holding that behind the qualities there is something as substance, in which the qualities inhere; and the other denying the existence of such a substance as being unnecessary, for the qualities may live by themselves. The most ancient theory of the soul, of course, is based upon the argument of self-identity--"I am I"--that the I of yesterday is the I of today, and the I of today will be the I of tomorrow; that in spite of all the changes that are happening to the body, I yet believe that I am the same I. This seems to have been the central argument with those who believed in a limited, and yet perfectly complete, individual soul.

On the other hand, the ancient Buddhists denied the necessity of such an assumption. They brought forward the argument that all that we know, and all that we possibly can know, are simply these changes. The positing of an unchangeable and unchanging substance is simply superfluous, and even if there were any such unchangeable thing, we could never understand it, nor should we ever be able to cognise it in any sense of the word. The same discussion you will find at the present time going on in Europe between the religionists and the idealists on the one side, and the modern positivists and agnostics on the other; one set believing there is something which does not change (of whom the latest representative is your Herbert Spencer), that we catch a glimpse of something which is unchangeable. And the other is represented by the modern Comtists and modern Agnostics. Those of you who were interested a few years ago in the discussions between Herbert Spencer and Frederick Harrison might have noticed that it was the same old difficulty, the one party standing for a substance behind the changeful, and the other party denying the necessity for such an assumption. One party says we cannot conceive of changes without conceiving of something which does not change; the other party brings out the argument that this is superfluous; we can only conceive of something which is changing, and as to the unchanging, we can neither know, feel, nor sense it.

In India this great question did not find its solution in very ancient times, because we have seen that the assumption of a substance which is behind the qualities, and which is not the

1 qualities, can never be substantiated; nay, even the argument from 2 self-identity, from memory,—that I am the I of yesterday because I
3 remember it, and therefore I have been a continuous something—4 cannot be substantiated. The other quibble that is generally put 5 forward is a mere delusion of words. For instance, a man may take 6 a long series of such sentences as "I do", "I go", "I dream", "I sleep", 7 "I move", and here you will find it claimed that the doing, going, 8 dreaming etc., have been changing, but what remained constant 9 was that "I". As such they conclude that the "I" is something which 10 is constant and an individual in itself, but all these changes belong 11 to the body. This, though apparently very convincing and clear, is 12 based upon the mere play on words. The "I" and the doing, going, 13 and dreaming may be separate in black and white, but no one can 14 separate them in his mind.

15 When I eat, I think of myself as eating—I am identified with 16 eating. When I run, I and the running are not two separate things.
17 Thus the argument from personal identity does not seem to be very 18 strong. The other argument from memory is also weak. If the 19 identity of my being is represented by my memory, many things 20 which I have forgotten are lost from that identity. And we know that 21 people under certain conditions forget their whole past. In many 22 cases of lunacy a man will think of himself as made of glass, or as 23 being an animal. If the existence of that man depends on memory, 24 he has become glass, which not being the case we cannot make the 25 identity of the Self depend on such a flimsy substance as memory.
26 Thus we see that the soul as a limited yet complete and continuing 27 identity cannot be established as separate from the qualities. We 28 cannot establish a narrowed-down, limited existence to which is 29 attached a bunch of qualities.

30 On the other hand, the argument of the ancient Buddhists 31 seems to be stronger—that we do not know, and cannot know, 32 anything that is beyond the bunch of qualities. According to them, 33 the soul consists of a bundle of qualities called sensations and 34 feelings. A mass of such is what is called the soul, and this mass is 35 continually changing.

36 The Advaitist theory of the soul reconciles both these 37 positions. The position of the Advaitist is that it is true that we 38 cannot think of the substance as separate from the qualities, we 39 cannot think of change and not-change at the same time; it would 40 be impossible. But the very thing which is the substance is the 41 quality; substance and quality are not two things. It is the 42 unchangeable that is appearing as the changeable. The 43 unchangeable substance of the universe is not something separate 44 from it. The noumenon is not something different from the 45 phenomena, but it is the very noumenon which has become the 46 phenomena. There is a soul which is unchanging, and what we call 47 feelings and perceptions, nay, even the body, are the very soul, seen 48 from another point of view. We have got into the habit of thinking 49 that we have bodies and souls and so forth, but really speaking, 50 there is only one.

51 When I think of myself as the body, I am only a body; it is 52 meaningless to say I am something else. And when I think of myself

1 as the soul, the body vanishes, and the perception of the body does 2 not remain. None can get the perception of the Self without his 3 perception of the body having vanished, none can get perception of 4 the substance without his perception of the qualities having 5 vanished.

6 The ancient illustration of Advaita, of the rope being taken for 7 a snake, may elucidate the point a little more. When a man mistakes 8 the rope for a snake, the rope has vanished, and when he takes it 9 for a rope, the snake has vanished, and the rope only remains. The 10 ideas of dual or treble existence come from reasoning on 11 insufficient data, and we read them in books or hear about them, 12 until we come under the delusion that we really have a dual 13 perception of the soul and the body; but such a perception never 14 really exists. The perception is either of the body or of the soul. It 15 requires no arguments to prove it, you can verify it in your own 16 minds.

17 Try to think of yourself as a soul, as a disembodied 18 something. You will find it to be almost impossible, and those few 19 who are able to do so will find that at the time when they realise 20 themselves as a soul they have no idea of the body. You have heard 21 of, or perhaps have seen, persons who on particular occasions had 22 been in peculiar states of mind, brought about by deep meditation, 23 self-hypnotism, hysteria, or drugs. From their experience you may 24 gather that when they were perceiving the internal something, the 25 external had vanished for them. This shows that whatever exists is 26 one. That one is appearing in these various forms, and all these 27 various forms give rise to the relation of cause and effect. The 28 relation of cause and effect is one of evolution--the one becomes the 29 other, and so on. Sometimes the cause vanishes, as it were, and in 30 its place leaves the effect. If the soul is the cause of the body, the 31 soul, as it were, vanishes for the time being, and the body remains; 32 and when the body vanishes, the soul remains. This theory fits the 33 arguments of the Buddhists that were levelled against the 34 assumption of the dualism of body and soul, by denying the duality, 35 and showing that the substance and the qualities are one and the 36 same thing appearing in various forms.

37 We have seen also that this idea of the unchangeable can be 38 established only as regards the whole, but never as regards the 39 part. The very idea of part comes from the idea of change or 40 motion. Everything that is limited we can understand and know, 41 because it is changeable; and the whole must be unchangeable, 42 because there is no other thing besides it in relation to which 43 change would be possible. Change is always in regard to something 44 which does not change, or which changes relatively less.

45 According to Advaita, therefore, the idea of the soul as 46 universal, unchangeable, and immortal can be demonstrated as far 47 as possible. The difficulty would be as regards the particular. What 48 shall we do with the old dualistic theories which have such a hold 49 upon us, and which we have all to pass through--these beliefs in 50 limited, little, individual souls?

51 We have seen that we are immortal with regard to the whole;

1 but the difficulty is, we desire so much to be immortal as parts of 2 the whole. We have seen that we are Infinite, and that that is our 3 real individuality. But we want so much to make these little souls
4 individual. What becomes of them when we find in our everyday 5 experience that these little souls are individuals, with only this 6 reservation that they are continuously growing individuals? They 7 are the same, yet not the same. The I of yesterday is the I of today, 8 and yet not so, it is changed somewhat. Now, by getting rid of the 9 dualistic conception, that in the midst of all these changes there is 10 something that does not change, and taking the most modern of 11 conception, that of evolution, we find that the "I" is a continuously 12 changing, expanding entity.

13 If it be true that man is the evolution of a mollusc, the mollusc 14 individual is the same as the man, only it has to become expanded a 15 great deal. From mollusc to man it has been a continuous expansion 16 towards infinity. Therefore the limited soul can be styled an 17 individual which is continuously expanding towards the Infinite 18 Individual. Perfect individuality will only be reached when it has 19 reached the Infinite, but on this side of the Infinite it is a 20 continuously changing, growing personality. One of the remarkable 21 features of the Advaitist system of Vedanta is to harmonise the 22 preceding systems. In many cases it helped the philosophy very 23 much; in some cases it hurt it. Our ancient philosophers knew what 24 you call the theory of evolution; that growth is gradual, step by 25 step, and the recognition of this led them to harmonise all the 26 preceding systems. Thus not one of these preceding ideas was 27 rejected. The fault of the Buddhistic faith was that it had neither 28 the faculty nor the perception of this continual, expansive growth, 29 and for this reason it never even made an attempt to harmonise 30 itself with the pre-existing steps towards the ideal. They were 31 rejected as useless and harmful.

32 This tendency in religion is most harmful. A man gets a new 33 and better idea, and then he looks back on those he has given up, 34 and forthwith decides they were mischievous and unnecessary. He 35 never thinks that, however crude they may appear from his present 36 point of view, they were very useful to him, that they were 37 necessary for him to reach his present state, and that everyone of 38 us has to grow in a similar fashion, living first on crude ideas, 39 taking benefit from them, and then arriving at a higher standard.
40 With the oldest theories, therefore, the Advaita is friendly. Dualism 41 and all systems that had preceded it are accepted by the Advaita 42 not in a patronising way, but with the conviction that they are true 43 manifestations of the same truth, and that they all lead to the same 44 conclusions as the Advaita has reached.

45 With blessing, and not with cursing, should be preserved all 46 these various steps through which humanity has to pass. Therefore 47 all these dualistic systems have never been rejected or thrown out, 48 but have been kept intact in the Vedanta; and the dualistic 49 conception of an individual soul, limited yet complete in itself, finds 50 its place in the Vedanta.

51 According to dualism, man dies and goes to other worlds, and 52 so forth; and these ideas are kept in the Vedanta in their entirety.

1 For with the recognition of growth in the Advaitist system, these 2 theories are given their proper place by admitting that they 3 represent only a partial view of the Truth.

4 From the dualistic standpoint this universe can only be looked 5 upon as a creation of matter or force, can only be looked upon as 6 the play of a certain will, and that will again can only be looked 7 upon as separate from the universe. Thus a man from such a 8 standpoint has to see himself as composed of a dual nature, body 9 and soul, and this soul, though limited, is individually complete in 10 itself. Such a man's ideas of immortality and of the future life would 11 necessarily accord with his idea of soul. These phases have been 12 kept in the Vedanta, and it is, therefore, necessary for me to 13 present to you a few of the popular ideas of dualism. According to 14 this theory, we have a body, of course, and behind the body there is 15 what they call a fine body. This fine body is also made of matter, 16 only very fine. It is the receptacle of all our Karma, of all our actions 17 and impressions, which are ready to spring up into visible forms.
18 Every thought that we think, every deed that we do, after a certain 19 time becomes fine, goes into seed form, so to speak, and lives in the 20 fine body in a potential form, and after a time it emerges again and 21 bears its results. These results condition the life of man. Thus he 22 moulds his own life. Man is not bound by any other laws excepting 23 those which he makes for himself. Our thoughts, our words and 24 deeds are the threads of the net which we throw round ourselves, 25 for good or for evil. Once we set in motion a certain power, we have 26 to take the full consequences of it. This is the law of Karma. Behind 27 the subtle body, lives Jiva or the individual soul of man. There are 28 various discussions about the form and the size of this individual 29 soul. According to some, it is very small like an atom; according to 30 others, it is not so small as that; according to others, it is very big, 31 and so on. This Jiva is a part of that universal substance, and it is 32 also eternal; without beginning it is existing, and without end it will 33 exist. It is passing through all these forms in order to manifest its 34 real nature which is purity. Every action that retards this 35 manifestation is called an evil action; so with thoughts. And every 36 action and every thought that helps the Jiva to expand, to manifest 37 its real nature, is good.

38 One theory that is held in common in India by the crudest 39 dualists as well as by the most advanced non-dualists is that all the 40 possibilities and powers of the soul are within it, and do not come 41 from any external source. They are in the soul in potential form, 42 and the whole work of life is simply directed towards manifesting 43 those potentialities.

44 They have also the theory of reincarnation which says that 45 after the dissolution of this body, the Jiva will have another, and 46 after that has been dissolved, it will again have another, and so on, 47 either here or in some other worlds; but this world is given the 48 preference, as it is considered the best of all worlds for our 49 purpose. Other worlds are conceived of as worlds where there is 50 very little misery, but for that very reason, they argue, there is less 51 chance of thinking of higher things there. As this world contains 52 some happiness and a good deal of misery, the Jiva some time or 1 other gets awakened, as it were, and thinks of freeing itself. But 2 just as very rich persons in this world have the least chance of 3 thinking of higher things, so the Jiva in heaven has little chance of 4 progress, for its condition is the same as that of a rich man, only 5 more intensified; it has a very fine body which knows no disease, 6 and is under no necessity of eating or drinking, and all its desires 7 are fulfilled. The Jiva lives there, having enjoyment after enjoyment, 8 and so forgets all about its real nature. Still there are some higher 9 worlds, where in spite of all enjoyments, its further evolution is 10 possible. Some dualists conceive of the goal as the highest heaven, 11 where souls will live with God for ever. They will have beautiful 12 bodies and will know neither disease nor death, nor any other evil, 13 and all their desires will be fulfilled. From time to time some of 14 them will come back to this earth and take another body to teach 15 human beings the way to God; and the great teachers of the world 16 have been such. They are already free, and were living with God in 17 the highest sphere; but their love and sympathy for suffering 18 humanity was so great that they came and incarnated again to 19 teach mankind the way to heaven.

20 Of course we know that the Advaita holds that this cannot be 21 the goal or the ideal; bodilessness must be the ideal. The ideal 22 cannot be finite. Anything short of the Infinite cannot be the ideal, 23 and there cannot be an infinite body. That would be impossible, as 24 body comes from limitation. There cannot be infinite thought, 25 because thought comes from limitation. We have to go beyond the 26 body, and beyond thought too, says the Advaita. And we have also 27 seen that, according to Advaita, this freedom is not to be attained, it 28 is already ours. We only forget it and deny it. Perfection is not to be 29 attained, it is already within us. Immortality and bliss are not to be 30 acquired, we possess them already; they have been ours all the 31 time.

32 If you dare declare that you are free, free you are this 33 moment. If you say you are bound, bound you will remain. This is 34 what Advaita boldly declares. I have told you the ideas of the 35 dualists. You can take whichever you like.

36 The highest ideal of the Vedanta is very difficult to 37 understand, and people are always quarrelling about it, and the 38 greatest difficulty is that when they get hold of certain ideas, they 39 deny and fight other ideas. Take up what suits you, and let others 40 take up what they need. If you are desirous of clinging to this little 41 individuality, to this limited manhood, remain in it, have all these 42 desires, and be content and pleased with them. If your experience 43 of manhood has been very good and nice, retain it as long as you 44 like; and you can do so, for you are the makers of your own 45 fortunes; none can compel you to give up your manhood. You will be 46 men as long as you like; none can prevent you. If you want to be 47 angels, you will be angels, that is the law. But there may be others 48 who do not want to be angels even. What right have you to think 49 that theirs is a horrible notion? You may be frightened to lose a 50 hundred pounds, but there may be others who would not even wink 51 if they lost all the money they had in the world. There have been 52 such men and still there are. Why do you dare to judge them

1 according to your standard? You cling on to your limitations, and 2 these little worldly ideas may be your highest ideal. You are 3 welcome to them. It will be to you as you wish. But there are others 4 who have seen the truth and cannot rest in these limitations, who 5 have done with these things and want to get beyond. The world
6 with all its enjoyments is a mere mud-puddle for them. Why do you
7 want to bind them down to your ideas? You must get rid of this 8 tendency once for all. Accord a place to everyone.

9 I once read a story about some ships that were caught in a 10 cyclone in the South Sea Islands, and there was a picture of it in the 11 Illustrated London News. All of them were wrecked except one 12 English vessel, which weathered the storm. The picture showed the 13 men who were going to be drowned, standing on the decks and 14 cheering the people who were sailing through the storm. Be brave 15 and generous like that. Do not drag others down to where you are.
16 Another foolish notion is that if we lose our little individuality, there 17 will be no morality, no hope for humanity. As if everybody had been 18 dying for humanity all the time! God bless you! If in every country 19 there were two hundred men and women really wanting to do good 20 to humanity, the millennium would come in five days. We know how 21 we are dying for humanity! These are all tall talks, and nothing else.
22 The history of the world shows that those who never thought of 23 their little individuality were the greatest benefactors of the human 24 race, and that the more men and women think of themselves, the 25 less are they able to do for others. One is unselfishness, and the 26 other selfishness. Clinging on to little enjoyments, and to desire the 27 continuation and repetition of this state of things is utter 28 selfishness. It arises not from any desire for truth, its genesis is not 29 in kindness for other beings, but in the utter selfishness of the 30 human heart, in the idea, "I will have everything, and do not care 31 for anyone else." This is as it appears to me. I would like to see 32 more moral men in the world like some of those grand old prophets 33 and sages of ancient times who would have given up a hundred 34 lives if they could by so doing benefit one little animal! Talk of 35 morality and doing good to others! Silly talk of the present time!

36 I would like to see moral men like Gautama Buddha, who did 37 not believe in a Personal God or a personal soul, never asked about 38 them, but was a perfect agnostic, and yet was ready to lay down his 39 life for anyone, and worked all his life for the good of all, and 40 thought only of the good of all. Well has it been said by his 41 biographer, in describing his birth, that he was born for the good of 42 the many, as a blessing to the many. He did not go to the forest to 43 meditate for his own salvation; he felt that the world was burning, 44 and that he must find a way out. "Why is there so much misery in 45 the world?"--was the one question that dominated his whole life. Do 46 you think we are so moral as the Buddha?

47 The more selfish a man, the more immoral he is. And so also 48 with the race. That race which is bound down to itself has been the 49 most cruel and the most wicked in the whole world. There has not 50 been a religion that has clung to this dualism more than that 51 founded by the Prophet of Arabia, and there has not been a religion 52 which has shed so much blood and been so cruel to other men. In

1 the Koran there is the doctrine that a man who does not believe 2 these teachings should be killed; it is a mercy to kill him! And the 3 surest way to get to heaven, where there are beautiful houris and 4 all sorts of sense-enjoyments, is by killing these unbelievers. Think 5 of the bloodshed there has been in consequence of such beliefs!

6 In the religion of Christ there was little of crudeness; there is 7 very little difference between the pure religion of Christ and that of 8 the Vedanta. You find there the idea of oneness; but Christ also 9 preached dualistic ideas to the people in order to give them 10 something tangible to take hold of, to lead them up to the highest 11 ideal. The same Prophet who preached, "Our Father which art in 12 heaven", also preached, "I and my Father are one", and the same 13 Prophet knew that through the "Father in heaven" lies the way to 14 the "I and my Father are one". There was only blessing and love in 15 the religion of Christ; but as soon as crudeness crept in, it was 16 degraded into something not much better than the religion of the 17 Prophet of Arabia. It was crudeness indeed--this fight for the little 18 self, this clinging on to the "I", not only in this life, but also in the 19 desire for its continuance even after death. This they declare to be 20 unselfishness; this the foundation of morality! Lord help us, if this 21 be the foundation of morality! And strangely enough, men and 22 women who ought to know better think all morality will be 23 destroyed if these little selves go and stand aghast at the idea that 24 morality can only stand upon their destruction. The watchword of 25 all well-being, of all moral good is not "I" but "thou". Who cares 26 whether there is a heaven or a hell, who cares if there is a soul or 27 not, who cares if there is an unchangeable or not? Here is the 28 world, and it is full of misery. Go out into it as Buddha did, and 29 struggle to lessen it or die in the attempt. Forget yourselves; this is 30 the first lesson to be learnt, whether you are a theist or an atheist, 31 whether you are an agnostic or a Vedantist, a Christian or a 32 Mohammedan. The one lesson obvious to all is the destruction of 33 the little self and the building up of the Real Self.

34 Two forces have been working side by side in parallel lines.
35 The one says "I", the other says "not I". Their manifestation is not 36 only in man but in animals, not only in animals but in the smallest 37 worms. The tigress that plunges her fangs into the warm blood of a 38 human being would give up her own life to protect her young. The 39 most depraved man who thinks nothing of taking the lives of his 40 brother men will, perhaps, sacrifice himself without any hesitation 41 to save his starving wife and children. Thus throughout creation 42 these two forces are working side by side; where you find the one, 43 you find the other too. The one is selfishness, the other is 44 unselfishness. The one is acquisition, the other is renunciation. The 45 one takes, the other gives. From the lowest to the highest, the 46 whole universe is the playground of these two forces. It does not 47 require any demonstration; it is obvious to all.

48 What right has any section of the community to base the 49 whole work and evolution of the universe upon one of these two 50 factors alone, upon competition and struggle? What right has it to 51 base the whole working of the universe upon passion and fight, 52 upon competition and struggle? That these exist we do not deny;

1 but what right has anyone to deny the working of the other force?
2 Can any man deny that love, this "not I", this renunciation is the 3 only positive power in the universe? That other is only the 4 misguided employment of the power of love; the power of love 5 brings competition, the real genesis of competition is in love. The 6 real genesis of evil is in unselfishness. The creator of evil is good, 7 and the end is also good. It is only misdirection of the power of 8 good. A man who murders another is, perhaps, moved to do so by 9 the love of his own child. His love has become limited to that one 10 little baby, to the exclusion of the millions of other human beings in 11 the universe. Yet, limited or unlimited, it is the same love. Thus the 12 motive power of the whole universe, in whatever way it manifests 13 itself, is that one wonderful thing, unselfishness, renunciation, love, 14 the real, the only living force in existence. Therefore the Vedantist 15 insists upon that oneness. We insist upon this explanation because 16 we cannot admit two causes of the universe. If we simply hold that 17 by limitation the same beautiful, wonderful love appears to be evil 18 or vile, we find the whole universe explained by the one force of 19 love. If not, two causes of the universe have to be taken for granted, 20 one good and the other evil, one love and the other hatred. Which is 21 more logical? Certainly the one-force theory.

22 Let us now pass on to things which do not possibly belong to 23 dualism. I cannot stay longer with the dualists, I am afraid. My idea 24 is to show that the highest ideal of morality and unselfishness goes 25 hand in hand with the highest metaphysical conception, and that 26 you need not lower your conception to get ethics and morality, but, 27 on the other hand, to reach a real basis of morality and ethics you 28 must have the highest philosophical and scientific conceptions.
29 Human knowledge is not antagonistic to human well-being. On the 30 contrary, it is knowledge alone that will save us in every 31 department of life--in knowledge is worship. The more we know the 32 better for us. The Vedantist says, the cause of all that is apparently 33 evil is the limitation of the unlimited. The love which gets limited 34 into little channels and seems to be evil eventually comes out at the 35 other end and manifests itself as God. The Vedanta also says that 36 the cause of all this apparent evil is in ourselves. Do not blame any 37 supernatural being, neither be hopeless and despondent, nor think 38 we are in a place from which we can never escape unless someone 39 comes and lends us a helping hand. That cannot be, says the 40 Vedanta. We are like silkworms; we make the thread out of our own 41 substance and spin the cocoon, and in course of time are 42 imprisoned inside. But this is not for ever. In that cocoon we shall 43 develop spiritual realisation, and like the butterfly come out free.
44 This network of Karma we have woven around ourselves; and in our 45 ignorance we feel as if we are bound, and weep and wail for help.
46 But help does not come from without; it comes from within 47 ourselves. Cry to all the gods in the universe. I cried for years, and 48 in the end I found that I was helped. But help came from within, 49 And I had to undo what I had done by mistake. That is the only way.
50 I had to cut the net which I had thrown round myself, and the 51 power to do this is within. Of this I am certain that not one 52 aspiration, well-guided or ill-guided in my life, has been in vain, but 53 that I am the resultant of all my past, both good and evil. I have

1 committed many mistakes in my life; but mark you, I am sure of this 2 that without every one of those mistakes I should not be what I am
3 today, and so am quite satisfied to have made them. I do not mean 4 that you are to go home and wilfully commit mistakes; do not 5 misunderstand me in that way. But do not mope because of the 6 mistakes you have committed, but know that in the end all will 7 come out straight. I cannot be otherwise, because goodness is our 8 nature, purity is our nature, and that nature can never be 9 destroyed. Our essential nature always remains the same.

10 What we are to understand is this, that what we call mistakes 11 or evil, we commit because we are weak, and we are weak because 12 we are ignorant. I prefer to call them mistakes. The word sin, 13 although originally a very good word, has got a certain flavour 14 about it that frightens me. Who makes us ignorant? We ourselves.
15 We put our hands over our eyes and weep that it is dark. Take the 16 hands away and there is light; the light exists always for us, the 17 self-effulgent nature of the human soul. Do you not hear what your 18 modern scientific men say? What is the cause of evolution? Desire.
19 The animal wants to do something, but does not find the 20 environment favourable, and therefore develops a new body. Who 21 develops it? The animal itself, its will. You have developed from the 22 lowest amoeba. Continue to exercise your will and it will take you 23 higher still. The will is almighty. If it is almighty, you may say, why 24 cannot I do everything? But you are thinking only of your little self.
25 Look back on yourselves from the state of the amoeba to the human 26 being; who made all that? Your own will. Can you deny then that it 27 is almighty? That which has made you come up so high can make 28 you go higher still. What you want is character, strengthening of the 29 will.

30 If I teach you, therefore, that your nature is evil, that you 31 should go home and sit in sackcloth and ashes and weep your lives 32 out because you took certain false steps, it will not help you, but 33 will weaken you all the more, and I shall be showing you the road to 34 more evil than good. If this room is full of darkness for thousands of 35 years and you come in and begin to weep and wail, "Oh the 36 darkness", will the darkness vanish? Strike a match and light comes 37 in a moment. What good will it do you to think all your lives, "Oh, I 38 have done evil, I have made many mistakes"? It requires no ghost to 39 tell us that. Bring in the light and the evil goes in a moment. Build 40 up your character, and manifest your real nature, the Effulgent, the 41 Resplendent, the Ever-Pure, and call It up in everyone that you see.
42 I wish that everyone of us had come to such a state that even in the 43 vilest of human beings we could see the Real Self within, and 44 instead of condemning them, say, "Rise thou effulgent one, rise thou 45 who art always pure, rise thou birthless and deathless, rise 46 almighty, and manifest thy true nature. These little manifestations 47 do not befit thee." This is the highest prayer that the Advaita 48 teaches. This is the one prayer, to remember our true nature, the 49 God who is always within us, thinking of it always as infinite, 50 almighty, ever-good, ever-beneficent, selfless, bereft of all 51 limitations. And because that nature is selfless, it is strong and 52 fearless; for only to selfishness comes fear. He who has nothing to 1 desire for himself, whom does he fear, and what can frighten him?

2 What fear has death for him? What fear has evil for him? So if we 3 are Advaitists, we must think from this moment that our old self is 4 dead and gone. The old Mr., Mrs., and Miss So-and-so are gone, 5 they were mere superstitions, and what remains is the ever-pure, 6 the ever-strong, the almighty, the all-knowing--that alone remains 7 for us, and then all fear vanishes from us. Who can injure us, the 8 omnipresent? All weakness has vanished from us, and our only 9 work is to arouse this knowledge in our fellow-beings. We see that 10 they too are the same pure self, only they do not know it; we must 11 teach them, we must help them to rouse up their infinite nature.
12 This is what I feel to be absolutely necessary all over the world.
13 These doctrines are old, older than many mountains possibly. All 14 truth is eternal. Truth is nobody's property; no race, no individual 15 can lay any exclusive claim to it. Truth is the nature of all souls.
16 Who can lay any special claim to it? But it has to be made practical, 17 to be made simple (for the highest truths are always simple), so 18 that it may penetrate every pore of human society, and become the 19 property of the highest intellects and the commonest minds, of the 20 man, woman, and child at the same time. All these ratiocinations of 21 logic, all these bundles of metaphysics, all these theologies and 22 ceremonies may have been good in their own time, but let us try to 23 make things simpler and bring about the golden days when every 24 man will be a worshipper, and the Reality in every man will be the 25 object of worship.

THE WAY TO THE REALISATION OF A UNIVERSAL RELIGION

(Delivered in the Universalist Church, Pasadena, California, 28th January 1900)

No search has been dearer to the human heart than that which brings to us light from God. No study has taken so much of human energy, whether in times past or present, as the study of the soul, of God, and of human destiny. However immersed we are in our daily occupations, in our ambitions, in our work, in the midst of the greatest of our struggles, sometimes there will come a pause; the mind stops and wants to know something beyond this world. Sometimes it catches glimpses of a realm beyond the senses, and a struggle to get at it is the result. Thus it has been throughout the ages, in all countries. Man has wanted to look beyond, wanted to expand himself; and all that we call progress, evolution, has been always measured by that one search, the search for human destiny, the search for God.

As our social struggles are represented amongst different nations by different social organisations, so is man's spiritual struggle represented by various religions; and as different social organisations are constantly quarrelling, are constantly at war with one another, so these spiritual organisations have been constantly at war with one another, constantly quarrelling. Men belonging to a particular social organisation claim that the right to live only belongs to them; and so long as they can, they want to exercise that right at the cost of the weak. We know that just now there is a fierce struggle of that sort going on in South Africa. Similarly, each religious sect has claimed the exclusive right to live. And thus we find that though there is nothing that has brought to man more blessings than religion, yet at the same time, there is nothing that has brought more horror than religion. Nothing has made more for peace and love than religion; nothing has engendered fiercer hatred than religion. Nothing has made the brotherhood of man more tangible than religion; nothing has bred more bitter enmity between man and man than religion. Nothing has built more charitable institutions, more hospitals for men, and even for animals, than religion; nothing has deluged the world with more blood than religion. We know, at the same time, that there has always been an undercurrent of thought; there have been always parties of men, philosophers, students of comparative religion who have tried and are still trying to bring about harmony in the midst of all these jarring and discordant sects. As regards certain countries, these attempts have succeeded, but as regards the whole world, they have failed.

There are some religions which have come down to us from the remotest antiquity, which are imbued with the idea that all sects should be allowed to live, that every sect has a meaning, a great idea, imbedded within itself, and, therefore it is necessary for the good of the world and ought to be helped. In modern times the same idea is prevailing and attempts are made from time to time to reduce it to practice. These attempts do not always come up to our

1 expectations, up to the required efficiency. Nay, to our great 2 disappointment, we sometimes find that we are quarrelling all the 3 more.

4 Now, leaving aside dogmatic study, and taking a common-5 sense view of the thing, we find at the start that there is a 6 tremendous life-power in all the great religions of the world. Some 7 may say that they are ignorant of this, but ignorance is no excuse. If 8 a man says "I do not know what is going on in the external world, 9 therefore things that are going on in the external world do not 10 exist", that man is inexcusable. Now those of you that watch the 11 movement of religious thought all over the world are perfectly 12 aware that not one of the great religions of the world has died; not 13 only so, each one of them is progressive. Christians are multiplying, 14 Mohammedans are multiplying, the Hindus are gaining ground, and 15 the Jews also are increasing, and by their spreading all over the 16 world and increasing rapidly, the fold of Judaism is constantly 17 expanding.

18 Only one religion of the world--an ancient, great religion--has 19 dwindled away, and that is the religion of Zoroastrianism, the 20 religion of the ancient Persians. Under the Mohammedan conquest 21 of Persia about a hundred thousand of these people came and took 22 shelter in India and some remained in ancient Persia. Those that 23 were in Persia, under the constant persecution of the 24 Mohammedans, dwindled down till there are at most only ten 25 thousand; in India there are about eighty thousand of them, but 26 they do not increase. Of course, there is an initial difficulty; they do 27 not convert others to their religion. And then, this handful of 28 persons living in India, with the pernicious custom of cousin 29 marriage, do not multiply. With this single exception, all the great 30 religions are living, spreading, and increasing. We must remember 31 that all the great religions of the world are very ancient, not one 32 has been formed at the present time, and that every religion of the 33 world owes its origin to the country between the Ganga and the 34 Euphrates; not one great religion has arisen in Europe, not one in 35 America, not one; every religion is of Asiatic origin and belongs to 36 that part of the world. If what the modern scientists say is true, that 37 the survival of the fittest is the test, these religions prove by their 38 still living that they are yet fit for some people. There is a reason 39 why they should live, they bring good to many. Look at the 40 Mohammedans, how they are spreading in some places in Southern 41 Asia, and spreading like fire in Africa. The Buddhists are spreading 42 all over Central Asia, all the time. The Hindus, like the Jews, do not 43 convert others; still gradually, other races are coming within 44 Hinduism and adopting the manners and customs of the Hindus and 45 falling into line with them. Christianity, you all know, is spreading-- 46 though I am not sure that the results are equal to the energy put 47 forth. The Christians' attempt at propaganda has one tremendous 48 defect--and that is the defect of all Western institutions: the 49 machine consumes ninety per cent of the energy, there is too much 50 machinery. Preaching has always been the business of the Asiatics.
51 The Western people are grand in organisation, social institutions, 52 armies, governments, etc.; but when it comes to preaching religion,

1 they cannot come near the Asiatic, whose business it has been all 2 the time, and he knows it, and he does not use too much machinery.

3 This then is a fact in the present history of the human race, 4 that all these great religions exist and are spreading and 5 multiplying. Now, there is a meaning, certainly, to this; and had it 6 been the will of an All-wise and All-merciful Creator that one of 7 these religions should exist and the rest should die, it would have 8 become a fact long, long ago. If it were a fact that only one of these 9 religions is true and all the rest are false, by this time it would have 10 covered the whole ground. But this is not so; not one has gained all 11 the ground. All religions sometimes advance--sometimes decline.
12 Now, just think of this: in your own country there are more than 13 sixty millions of people, and only twenty-one millions professing 14 religions of all sorts. So it is not always progress. In every country, 15 probably, if the statistics are taken, you would find that religions 16 are sometimes progressing and sometimes going back. Sects are 17 multiplying all the time. If the claims of a religion that it has all the 18 truth and God has given it all this truth in a certain book were true, 19 why are there so many sects? Fifty years do not pass before there 20 are twenty sects founded upon the same book. If God has put all the 21 truth in certain books, He does not give us those books in order that 22 we may quarrel over texts. That seems to be the fact. Why is it?
23 Even if a book were given by God which contained all the truth 24 about religion, it would not serve the purpose because nobody 25 could understand the book. Take the Bible, for instance, and all the 26 sects that exist amongst Christians; each one puts its own 27 interpretation upon the same text, and each says that it alone 28 understands that text and all the rest are wrong. So with every 29 religion. There are many sects among the Mohammedans and 30 among the Buddhists, and hundreds among the Hindus. Now, I 31 bring these facts before you in order to show you that any attempt 32 to bring all humanity to one method of thinking in spiritual things 33 has been a failure and always will be a failure. Every man that 34 starts a theory, even at the present day, finds that if he goes twenty 35 miles away from his followers, they will make twenty sects. You see 36 that happening all the time. You cannot make all conform to the 37 same ideas: that is a fact, and I thank God that it is so. I am not 38 against any sect. I am glad that sects exist, and I only wish they 39 may go on multiplying more and more. Why? Simply because of 40 this: If you and I and all who are present here were to think exactly 41 the same thoughts, there would be no thoughts for us to think. We 42 know that two or more forces must come into collision in order to 43 produce motion. It is the clash of thought, the differentiation of 44 thought, that awakes thought. Now, if we all thought alike, we 45 would be like Egyptian mummies in a museum looking vacantly at 46 one another's faces--no more than that! Whirls and eddies occur 47 only in a rushing, living stream. There are no whirlpools in 48 stagnant, dead water. When religions are dead, there will be no 49 more sects; it will be the perfect peace and harmony of the grave.
50 But so long as mankind thinks, there will be sects. Variation is the 51 sign of life, and it must be there. I pray that they may multiply so 52 that at last there will be as many sects as human beings, and each 53 one will have his own method, his individual method of thought in

1 religion.

2 But this thing exists already. Each one of us is thinking in his 3 own way, but his natural course has been obstructed all the time
4 and is still being obstructed. If the sword is not used directly, other 5 means will be used. Just hear what one of the best preachers in 6 New York says: he preaches that the Filipinos should be conquered 7 because that is the only way to teach Christianity to them! They are 8 already Catholics; but he wants to make them Presbyterians, and 9 for this, he is ready to lay all this terrible sin of bloodshed upon his 10 race. How terrible! And this man is one of the greatest preachers of 11 this country, one of the best informed men. Think of the state of the 12 world when a man like that is not ashamed to stand up and utter 13 such arrant nonsense; and think of the state of the world when an 14 audience cheers him! Is this civilisation? It is the old blood-15 thirstiness of the tiger, the cannibal, the savage, coming out once 16 more under new names, new circumstances. What else can it be? If 17 the state of things is such now, think of the horrors through which 18 the world passed in olden times, when every sect was trying by 19 every means in its power to tear to pieces the other sects. History 20 shows that. The tiger in us is only asleep; it is not dead. When 21 opportunities come, it jumps up and, as of old, uses its claws and 22 fangs. Apart from the sword, apart from material weapons, there 23 are weapons still more terrible--contempt, social hatred, and social 24 ostracism. Now, these are the most terrible of all inflictions that are 25 hurled against persons who do not think exactly in the same way as 26 we do.

27 And why should everybody think just as we do? I do not see 28 any reason. If I am a rational man, I should be glad they do not 29 think just as I do. I do not want to live in a grave-like land; I want to 30 be a man in a world of men. Thinking beings must differ; difference 31 is the first sign of thought. If I am a thoughtful man, certainly I 32 ought to like to live amongst thoughtful persons where there are 33 differences of opinion.

34 Then arises the question: How can all these varieties be true?
35 If one thing is true, its negation is false. How can contradictory 36 opinions be true at the same time? This is the question which I 37 intend to answer. But I will first ask you: Are all the religions of the 38 world really contradictory? I do not mean the external forms in 39 which great thoughts are clad. I do not mean the different 40 buildings, languages, rituals, books, etc. employed in various 41 religions, but I mean the internal soul of every religion. Every 42 religion has a soul behind it, and that soul may differ from the soul 43 of another religion; but are they contradictory? Do they contradict 44 or supplement each other? --that is the question. I took up the 45 question when I was quite a boy, and have been studying it all my 46 life. Thinking that my conclusion may be of some help to you, I 47 place it before you. I believe that they are not contradictory; they 48 are supplementary. Each religion, as it were, takes up one part of 49 the great universal truth, and spends its whole force in embodying 50 and typifying that part of the great truth. It is, therefore, addition, 51 not exclusion. That is the idea. System after system arises, each one 52 embodying a great idea, and ideals must be added to ideals. And

1 this is the march of humanity. Man never progresses from error to 2 truth, but from truth to truth, from lesser truth to higher truth--but 3 it is never from error to truth. The child may develop more than the 4 father, but was the father inane? The child is the father plus 5 something else. If your present state of knowledge is much greater 6 than it was when you were a child, would you look down upon that 7 stage now? Will you look back and call it inanity? Why, your present 8 stage is the knowledge of the child plus something more.

9 Then, again, we also know that there may be almost 10 contradictory points of view of the same thing, but they will all 11 indicate the same thing. Suppose a man is journeying towards the 12 sun, and as he advances he takes a photograph of the sun at every 13 stage. When he comes back, he has many photographs of the sun, 14 which he places before us. We see that not two are alike, and yet, 15 who will deny that all these are photographs of the same sun, from 16 different standpoints? Take four photographs of this church from 17 different corners: how different they would look, and yet they would 18 all represent this church. In the same way, we are all looking at 19 truth from different standpoints, which vary according to our birth, 20 education, surroundings, and so on. We are viewing truth, getting 21 as much of it as these circumstances will permit, colouring the 22 truth with our own heart, understanding it with our own intellect, 23 and grasping it with our own mind. We can only know as much of 24 truth as is related to us, as much of it as we are able to receive.
25 This makes the difference between man and man, and occasions 26 sometimes even contradictory ideas; yet we all belong to the same 27 great universal truth.

28 My idea, therefore, is that all these religions are different 29 forces in the economy of God, working for the good of mankind; and 30 that not one can become dead, not one can be killed. Just as you 31 cannot kill any force in nature, so you cannot kill any one of these 32 spiritual forces. You have seen that each religion is living. From 33 time to time it may retrograde or go forward. At one time, it may be 34 shorn of a good many of its trappings; at another time it may be 35 covered with all sorts of trappings; but all the same, the soul is ever 36 there, it can never be lost. The ideal which every religion 37 represents is never lost, and so every religion is intelligently on the 38 march.

39 And that universal religion about which philosophers and 40 others have dreamed in every country already exists. It is here. As 41 the universal brotherhood of man is already existing, so also is 42 universal religion. Which of you, that have travelled far and wide, 43 have not found brothers and sisters in every nation? I have found 44 them all over the world. Brotherhood already exists; only there are 45 numbers of persons who fail to see this and only upset it by crying 46 for new brotherhoods. Universal religion, too, is already existing. If 47 the priests and other people that have taken upon themselves the 48 task of preaching different religions simply cease preaching for a 49 few moments, we shall see it is there. They are disturbing it all the 50 time, because it is to their interest. You see that priests in every 51 country are very conservative. Why is it so? There are very few 52 priests who lead the people; most of them are led by the people and

1 are their slaves and servants. If you say it is dry, they say it is so; if 2 you say it is black, they say it is black. If the people advance, the 3 priests must advance. They cannot lag behind. So, before blaming
4 the priests--it is the fashion to blame the priest--you ought to blame 5 yourselves. You only get what you deserve. What would be the fate 6 of a priest who wants to give you new and advanced ideas and lead 7 you forward? His children would probably starve, and he would be 8 clad in rags. He is governed by the same worldly law as you are. "If 9 you go on," he says, "let us march." Of course, there are exceptional 10 souls, not cowed down by public opinion. They see the truth and 11 truth alone they value. Truth has got hold of them, has got 12 possession of them, as it were, and they cannot but march ahead.
13 They never look backward, and for them there are no people. God 14 alone exists for them, He is the Light before them, and they are 15 following that Light.

16 I met a Mormon gentleman in this country, who tried to 17 persuade me to his faith. I said, "I have great respect for your 18 opinions, but in certain points we do not agree--I belong to a 19 monastic order, and you believe in marrying many wives. But why 20 don't you go to India to preach?" Then he was astonished. he said, 21 "Why, you don't believe in any marriage at all, and we believe in 22 polygamy, and yet you ask me to go to your country!" I said, "Yes; 23 my countrymen will hear every religious thought wherever it may 24 come from. I wish you would go to India, first, because I am a great 25 believer in sects. Secondly, there are many men in India who are 26 not at all satisfied with any of the existing sects, and on account of 27 this dissatisfaction, they will not have anything to do with religion, 28 and possibly, you might get some of them." The greater the number 29 of sects, the more chance of people getting religion. In the hotel, 30 where there are all sorts of food, everyone has a chance to get his 31 appetite satisfied. So I want sects to multiply in every country, that 32 more people may have a chance to be spiritual. Do not think that 33 people do not like religion. I do not believe that. The preachers 34 cannot give them what they need. The same man that may have 35 been branded as an atheist, as a materialist, or what not, may meet 36 a man who gives him the truth needed by him, and he may turn out 37 the most spiritual man in the community. We can eat only in our 38 own way. For instance, we Hindus eat with our fingers. Our fingers 39 are suppler than yours, you cannot use your fingers the same way.
40 Not only the food should be supplied, but it should be taken in your 41 own particular way. Not only must you have the spiritual ideas, but 42 they must come to you according to your own method. They must 43 speak your own language, the language of your soul, and then alone
44 they will satisfy you. When the man comes who speaks my language 45 and gives truth in my language, I at once understand it and receive 46 it for ever. This is a great fact.

47 Now from this we see that there are various grades and types 48 of human minds and what a task religions take upon them! A man 49 brings forth two or three doctrines and claims that his religion 50 ought to satisfy all humanity. He goes out into the world, God's 51 menagerie, with a little cage in hand, and says, "God and the 52 elephant and everybody has to go into this. Even if we have to cut

1 the elephant into pieces, he must go in." Again, there may be a sect 2 with a few good ideas. Its followers say, "All men must come in!"
3 "But there is no room for them." "Never mind! Cut them to pieces; 4 get them in anyhow; if they don't get in, why, they will be damned." 5 No preacher, no sect, have I ever met that pauses and asks, "Why is 6 it that people do not listen to us?" Instead, they curse the people 7 and say, "The people are wicked." They never ask, "How is it that 8 people do not listen to my words? Why cannot I make them see the 9 truth? Why cannot I speak in their language? Why cannot I open 10 their eyes?" Surely, they ought to know better, and when they find 11 people do not listen to them, if they curse anybody, it should be 12 themselves. But it is always the people's fault! They never try to 13 make their sect large enough to embrace every one.

14 Therefore we at once see why there has been so much 15 narrow-mindedness, the part always claiming to be the whole; the 16 little, finite unit always laying claim to the infinite. Think of little 17 sects, born within a few hundred years out of fallible human brains, 18 making this arrogant claim of knowledge of the whole of God's 19 infinite truth! Think of the arrogance of it! If it shows anything, it is 20 this, how vain human beings are. And it is no wonder that such 21 claims have always failed, and, by the mercy of the Lord, are always 22 destined to fail. In this line the Mohammedans were the best off; 23 every step forward was made with the sword--the Koran in the one 24 hand and the sword in the other: "Take the Koran, or you must die; 25 there is no alternative!" You know from history how phenomenal 26 was their success; for six hundred years nothing could resist them, 27 and then there came a time when they had to cry halt. So will it be 28 with other religions if they follow the same methods. We are such 29 babes! We always forget human nature. When we begin life, we 30 think that our fate will be something extraordinary, and nothing can 31 make us disbelieve that. But when we grow old, we think 32 differently. So with religions. In their early stages, when they 33 spread a little, they get the idea that they can change the minds of 34 the whole human race in a few years, and go on killing and 35 massacring to make converts by force; then they fail, and begin to 36 understand better. We see that these sects did not succeed in what 37 they started out to do, which was a great blessing. Just think if one 38 of those fanatical sects had succeeded all over the world, where 39 would man be today? Now, the Lord be blessed that they did not 40 succeed! Yet, each one represents a great truth; each religion 41 represents a particular excellence--something which is its soul.
42 There is an old story which comes to my mind: There were some 43 ogresses who used to kill people and do all sorts of mischief; but 44 they themselves could not be killed, until someone found out that 45 their souls were in certain birds, and so long as the birds were safe 46 nothing could destroy the ogresses. So, each one of us has, as it 47 were, such a bird, where our soul is; has an ideal, a mission to 48 perform in life. Every human being is an embodiment of such an 49 ideal, such a mission. Whatever else you may lose, so long as that 50 ideal is not lost, and that mission is not hurt, nothing can kill you.
51 Wealth may come and go, misfortunes may pile mountains high, but 52 if you have kept the ideal entire, nothing can kill you. You may have 53 grown old, even a hundred years old, but if that mission is fresh and

1 young in your heart, what can kill you? But when that ideal is lost 2 and that mission is hurt, nothing can save you. All the wealth, all 3 the power of the world will not save you. And what are nations but 4 multiplied individuals? So, each nation has a mission of its own to 5 perform in this harmony of races; and so long as that nation keeps 6 to that ideal, that nation nothing can kill; but if that nation gives up 7 its mission in life and goes after something else, its life becomes 8 short, and it vanishes.

9 And so with religions. The fact that all these old religions are 10 living today proves that they must have kept that mission intact; in 11 spite of all their mistakes, in spite of all difficulties, in spite of all 12 quarrels, in spite of all the incrustation of forms and figures, the 13 heart of every one of them is sound--it is a throbbing, beating, living 14 heart. They have not lost, any one of them, the great mission they 15 came for. And it is splendid to study that mission. Take 16 Mohammedanism, for instance. Christian people hate no religion in 17 the world so much as Mohammedanism. They think it is the very 18 worst form of religion that ever existed. As soon as a man becomes 19 a Mohammedan, the whole of Islam receives him as a brother with 20 open arms, without making any distinction, which no other religion 21 does. If one of your American Indians becomes a Mohammedan, the 22 Sultan of Turkey would have no objection to dine with him. If he has 23 brains, no position is barred to him. In this country, I have never yet 24 seen a church where the white man and the negro can kneel side by 25 side to pray. Just think of that: Islam makes its followers all equal-- 26 so, that, you see, is the peculiar excellence of Mohammedanism. In 27 many places in the Koran you find very sensual ideas of life. Never 28 mind. What Mohammedanism comes to preach to the world is this 29 practical brotherhood of all belonging to their faith. That is the 30 essential part of the Mohammedan religion; and all the other ideas 31 about heaven and of life etc. are not Mohammedanism. They are 32 accretions.

33 With the Hindus you will find one national idea--spirituality. In 34 no other religion, in no other sacred books of the world, will you 35 find so much energy spent in defining the idea of God. They tried to 36 define the ideal of soul so that no earthly touch might mar it. The 37 spirit must be divine; and spirit understood as spirit must not be 38 made into a man. The same idea of unity, of the realisation of God, 39 the omnipresent, is preached throughout. They think it is all 40 nonsense to say that He lives in heaven, and all that. It is a mere 41 human, anthropomorphic idea. All the heaven that ever existed is 42 now and here. One moment in infinite time is quite as good as any 43 other moment. If you believe in a God, you can see Him even now.
44 We think religion begins when you have realised something. It is 45 not believing in doctrines, nor giving intellectual assent, nor making 46 declarations. If there is a God, have you seen Him? If you say "no", 47 then what right have you to believe in Him? If you are in doubt 48 whether there is a God, why do you not struggle to see Him? Why 49 do you not renounce the world and spend the whole of your life for 50 this one object? Renunciation and spirituality are the two great 51 ideas of India, and it is because India clings to these ideas that all 52 her mistakes count for so little.

1 With the Christians, the central idea that has been preached 2 by them is the same: "Watch and pray, for the kingdom of Heaven is 3 at hand"--which means, purify your minds and be ready! And that 4 spirit never dies. You recollect that the Christians are, even in the 5 darkest days, even in the most superstitious Christian countries, 6 always trying to prepare themselves for the coming of the Lord, by 7 trying to help others, building hospitals and so on. So long as the 8 Christians keep to that ideal, their religion lives.

9 Now an ideal presents itself to my mind. It may be only a 10 dream. I do not know whether it will ever be realised in this world, 11 but sometimes it is better to dream a dream, than die on hard facts.
12 Great truths, even in a dream are good, better than bad facts. So, 13 let us dream a dream.

14 You know that there are various grades of mind. You may be a 15 matter-of-fact, common-sense rationalist: you do not care for forms 16 and ceremonies; you want intellectual, hard, ringing facts, and they 17 alone will satisfy you. Then there are the Puritans, the 18 Mohammedans, who will not allow a picture or a statue in their 19 place of worship. Very well! But there is another man who is more 20 artistic. He wants a great deal of art--beauty of lines and curves, 21 the colours, flowers, forms; he wants candles, lights, and all the 22 insignia and paraphernalia of ritual, that he may see God. His mind 23 takes God in those forms, as yours takes Him through the intellect.
24 Then, there is the devotional man, whose soul is crying for God: he 25 has no other idea but to worship God, and to praise Him. Then 26 again, there is the philosopher, standing outside all these, mocking 27 at them. He thinks, "What nonsense they are! What ideas about 28 God!"

29 They may laugh at one another, but each one has a place in 30 this world. All these various minds, all these various types are 31 necessary. If there ever is going to be an ideal religion, it must be 32 broad and large enough to supply food for all these minds. It must 33 supply the strength of philosophy to the philosopher, the devotee's 34 heart to the worshipper; to the ritualist, it will give all that the most 35 marvellous symbolism can convey; to the poet, it will give as much 36 of heart as he can take in, and other things besides. To make such a 37 broad religion, we shall have to go back to the time when religions 38 began and take them all in.

39 Our watchword, then, will be acceptance, and not exclusion.
40 Not only toleration, for so-called toleration is often blasphemy, and I 41 do not believe in it. I believe in acceptance. Why should I tolerate?
42 Toleration means that I think that you are wrong and I am just 43 allowing you to live. Is it not a blasphemy to think that you and I are 44 allowing others to live? I accept all religions that were in the past, 45 and worship with them all; I worship God with every one of them, in 46 whatever form they worship Him. I shall go to the mosque of the 47 Mohammedan; I shall enter the Christian's church and kneel before 48 the crucifix; I shall enter the Buddhistic temple, where I shall take 49 refuge in Buddha and in his Law. I shall go into the forest and sit 50 down in meditation with the Hindu, who is trying to see the Light 51 which enlightens the heart of every one.

1 Not only shall I do all these, but I shall keep my heart open
2 for all that may come in the future. Is God's book finished? Or is it 3 still a continuous revelation going on? It is a marvellous book--these 4 spiritual revelations of the world. The Bible, the Vedas, the Koran, 5 and all other sacred books are but so many pages, and an infinite 6 number of pages remain yet to be unfolded. I would leave it open 7 for all of them. We stand in the present, but open ourselves to the 8 infinite future. We take in all that has been in the past, enjoy the 9 light of the present, and open every window of the heart for all that 10 will come in the future. Salutation to all the prophets of the past, to 11 all the great ones of the present, and to all that are to come in the 12 future!

THE IDEAL OF A UNIVERSAL RELIGION

HOW IT MUST EMBRACE DIFFERENT TYPES OF MINDS AND METHODS

Wheresoever our senses reach, or whatsoever our minds imagine, we find therein the action and reaction of two forces, the one counteracting the other and causing the constant play of the mixed phenomena that we see around us, and of those which we feel in our minds. In the external world, the action of these opposite forces is expressing itself as attraction and repulsion, or as centripetal and centrifugal forces; and in the internal, as love and hatred, good and evil. We repel some things, we attract others. We are attracted by one, we are repelled by another. Many times in our lives we find that without any reason whatsoever we are, as it were, attracted towards certain persons; at other times, similarly, we are repelled by others. This is patent to all, and the higher the field of action, the more potent, the more remarkable, are the influences of these opposite forces. Religion is the highest plane of human thought and life, and herein we find that the workings of these two forces have been most marked. The intensest love that humanity has ever known has come from religion, and the most diabolical hatred that humanity has known has also come from religion. The noblest words of peace that the world has ever heard have come from men on the religious plane, and the bitterest denunciation that the world has ever known has been uttered by religious men. The higher the object of any religion and the finer its organisation, the more remarkable are its activities. No other human motive has deluged the world with blood so much as religion; at the same time, nothing has brought into existence so many hospitals and asylums for the poor; no other human influence has taken such care, not only of humanity, but also of the lowest of animals, as religion has done. Nothing makes us so cruel as religion, and nothing makes us so tender as religion. This has been so in the past, and will also, in all probability, be so in the future. Yet out of the midst of this din and turmoil, this strife and struggle, this hatred and jealousy of religions and sects, there have arisen, from time to time, potent voices, drowning all this noise--making themselves heard from pole to pole, as it were--proclaiming peace and harmony. Will it ever come?

Is it possible that there should ever reign unbroken harmony in this plane of mighty religious struggle. The world is exercised in the latter part of this century by the question of harmony; in society, various plans are being proposed, and attempts are made to carry them into practice; but we know how difficult it is to do so. People find that it is almost impossible to mitigate the fury of the struggle of life, to tone down the tremendous nervous tension that is in man. Now, if it is so difficult to bring harmony and peace to the physical plane of life--the external, gross, and outward side of it--then a thousand times more difficult is it to bring peace and harmony to rule over the internal nature of man. I would ask you for the time being to come out of the network of words. We have all been

1 hearing from childhood of such things as love, peace, charity,
2 equality, and universal brotherhood; but they have become to us
3 mere words without meaning, words which we repeat like parrots,
4 and it has become quite natural for us to do so. We cannot help it.
5 Great souls, who first felt these great ideas in their hearts, 6 manufactured these words; and at that time many understood their 7 meaning. Later on, ignorant people have taken up those words to 8 play with them and made religion a mere play upon words, and not 9 a thing to be carried into practice. It becomes "my father's 10 religion", "our nation's religion", "our country's religion", and so 11 forth. It becomes only a phase of patriotism to profess any religion, 12 and patriotism is always partial. To bring harmony into religion 13 must always be difficult. Yet we will consider this problem of the 14 harmony of religions.

15 We see that in every religion there are three parts--I mean in 16 every great and recognised religion. First, there is the philosophy 17 which presents the whole scope of that religion, setting forth its 18 basic principles, the goal and the means of reaching it. The second 19 part is mythology, which is philosophy made concrete. It consists of 20 legends relating to the lives of men, or of supernatural beings, and 21 so forth. It is the abstractions of philosophy concretised in the more 22 or less imaginary lives of men and supernatural beings. The third 23 part is the ritual. This is still more concrete and is made up of forms 24 and ceremonies, various physical attitudes, flowers and incense, 25 and many other things, that appeal to the senses. In these consists 26 the ritual. You will find that all recognised religions have these 27 three elements. Some lay stress on one, some on another. Let us 28 now take into consideration the first part, philosophy. Is there one 29 universal philosophy? Not yet. Each religion brings out its own 30 doctrines and insists upon them as being the only true ones. And 31 not only does it do that, but it thinks that he who does not believe in 32 them must go to some horrible place. Some will even draw the 33 sword to compel others to believe as they do. This is not through 34 wickedness, but through a particular disease of the human brain 35 called fanaticism. They are very sincere, these fanatics, the most 36 sincere of human beings; but they are quite as irresponsible as 37 other lunatics in the world. This disease of fanaticism is one of the 38 most dangerous of all diseases. All the wickedness of human nature 39 is roused by it. Anger is stirred up, nerves are strung high, and 40 human beings become like tigers.

41 Is there any mythological similarity, is there any mythological 42 harmony, any universal mythology accepted by all religions?
43 Certainly not. All religions have their own mythology, only each of 44 them says, "My stories are not mere myths." Let us try to 45 understand the question by illustration. I simply mean to illustrate, 46 I do not mean criticism of any religion. The Christian believes that 47 God took the shape of a dove and came down to earth; to him this is 48 history, and not mythology. The Hindu believes that God is 49 manifested in the cow. Christians say that to believe so is mere 50 mythology, and not history, that it is superstition. The Jews think 51 that if an image be made in the form of a box, or a chest, with an 52 angel on either side, then it may be placed in the Holy of Holies; it

1 is sacred to Jehovah; but if the image be made in the form of a 2 beautiful man or woman, they say, "This is a horrible idol; break it 3 down!" This is our unity in mythology! If a man stands up and says, 4 "My prophet did such and such a wonderful thing", others will say, 5 "That is only superstition", but at the same time they say that their 6 own prophet did still more wonderful things, which they hold to be 7 historical. Nobody in the world, as far as I have seen, is able to 8 make out the fine distinction between history and mythology, as it 9 exists in the brains of these persons. All such stories, to whatever 10 religion they may belong, are really mythological, mixed up 11 occasionally, it may be with, a little history.

12 Next come the rituals. One sect has one particular form of 13 ritual and thinks that that is holy, while the rituals of another sect 14 are simply arrant superstition. If one sect worships a peculiar sort 15 of symbol, another sect says, "Oh, it is horrible!" Take, for instance, 16 a general form of symbol. The phallus symbol is certainly a sexual 17 symbol, but gradually that aspect of it has been forgotten, and it 18 stands now as a symbol of the Creator. Those nations which have 19 this as their symbol never think of it as the phallus; it is just a 20 symbol, and there it ends. But a man from another race or creed 21 sees in it nothing but the phallus, and begins to condemn it; yet at 22 the same time he may be doing something which to the so-called 23 phallic worshippers appears most horrible. Let me take two points 24 for illustration, the phallus symbol and the sacrament of the 25 Christians. To the Christians the phallus is horrible, and to the 26 Hindus the Christian sacrament is horrible. They say that the 27 Christian sacrament, the killing of a man and the eating of his flesh 28 and the drinking of his blood to get the good qualities of that man, 29 is cannibalism. This is what some of the savage tribes do; if a man 30 is brave, they kill him and eat his heart, because they think that it 31 will give them the qualities of courage and bravery possessed by 32 that man. Even such a devout Christian as Sir John Lubbock admits 33 this and says that the origin of this Christian symbol is in this 34 savage idea. The Christians, of course, do not admit this view of its 35 origin; and what it may imply never comes to their mind. It stands 36 for holy things, and that is all they want to know. So even in rituals 37 there is no universal symbol, which can command general 38 recognition and acceptance. Where then is any universality? How is 39 it possible then to have a universal form of religion? That, however, 40 already exists. And let us see what it is.

41 We all hear about universal brotherhood, and how societies 42 stand up especially to preach this. I remember an old story. In 43 India, taking wine is considered very bad. There were two brothers 44 who wished, one night, to drink wine secretly; and their uncle, who 45 was a very orthodox man, was sleeping in a room quite close to 46 theirs. So, before they began to drink, they said to each other, "We 47 must be very silent, or uncle will wake up." When they were 48 drinking, they continued repeating to each other "Silence! Uncle 49 will wake up", each trying to shout the other down. And, as the 50 shouting increased, the uncle woke up, came into the room, and 51 discovered the whole thing. Now, we all shout like these drunken 52 men, "Universal brotherhood! We are all equal, therefore let us

1 make a sect." As soon as you make a sect you protest against 2 equality, and equality is no more. Mohammedans talk of universal 3 brotherhood, but what comes out of that in reality? Why, anybody 4 who is not a Mohammedan will not be admitted into the 5 brotherhood; he will more likely have his throat cut. Christians talk 6 of universal brotherhood; but anyone who is not a Christian must go 7 to that place where he will be eternally barbecued.

8 And so we go on in this world in our search after universal 9 brotherhood and equality. When you hear such talk in the world, I 10 would ask you to be a little reticent, to take care of yourselves, for, 11 behind all this talk is often the intensest selfishness. "In the winter 12 sometimes a thunder-cloud comes up; it roars and roars, but it does 13 not rain; but in the rainy season the clouds speak not, but deluge 14 the world with water." So those who are really workers, and really 15 feel at heart the universal brotherhood of man, do not talk much, do 16 not make little sects for universal brotherhood; but their acts, their 17 movements, their whole life, show out clearly that they in truth 18 possess the feeling of brotherhood for mankind, that they have love 19 and sympathy for all. They do not speak, they do and they live. This 20 world is too full of blustering talk. We want a little more earnest 21 work, and less talk.

22 So far we see that it is hard to find any universal features in 23 regard to religion, and yet we know that they exist. We are all 24 human beings, but are we all equal? Certainly not. Who says we are 25 equal? Only the lunatic. Are we all equal in our brains, in our 26 powers, in our bodies? One man is stronger than another, one man 27 has more brain power than another. If we are all equal, why is there 28 this inequality? Who made it? We. Because we have more or less 29 powers, more or less brain, more or less physical strength, it must 30 make a difference between us. Yet we know that the doctrine of 31 equality appeals to our heart. We are all human beings; but some 32 are men, and some are women. Here is a black man, there is a 33 white man; but all are men, all belong to one humanity. Various are 34 our faces; I see no two alike, yet we are all human beings. Where is 35 this one humanity? I find a man or a woman, either dark or fair; and 36 among all these faces I know that there is an abstract humanity 37 which is common to all. I may not find it when I try to grasp it, to 38 sense it, and to actualise it, yet I know for certain that it is there. If 39 I am sure of anything, it is of this humanity which is common to us
40 all. It is through this generalised entity that I see you as a man or a 41 woman. So it is with this universal religion, which runs through all 42 the various religions of the world in the form of God; it must and 43 does exist through eternity. "I am the thread that runs through all 44 these pearls," and each pearl is a religion or even a sect thereof.
45 Such are the different pearls, and the Lord is the thread that runs 46 through all of them; only the majority of mankind are entirely 47 unconscious of it.

48 Unity in variety is the plan of the universe. We are all men, 49 and yet we are all distinct from one another. As a part of humanity I
50 am one with you, and as Mr. So-and-so I am different from you. As a 51 man you are separate from the woman; as a human being you are 52 one with the woman. As a man you are separate from the animal,

1 but as living beings, man, woman, animal, and plant are all one; and 2 as existence, you are one with the whole universe. That universal 3 existence is God, the ultimate Unity in the universe. In Him we are 4 all one. At the same time, in manifestation, these differences must 5 always remain. In our work, in our energies, as they are being 6 manifested outside, these differences must always remain. We find 7 then that if by the idea of a universal religion it is meant that one 8 set of doctrines should be believed in by all mankind, it is wholly 9 impossible. It can never be, there can never be a time when all 10 faces will be the same. Again, if we expect that there will be one 11 universal mythology, that is also impossible; it cannot be. Neither 12 can there be one universal ritual. Such a state of things can never 13 come into existence; if it ever did, the world would be destroyed, 14 because variety is the first principle of life. What makes us formed 15 beings? Differentiation. Perfect balance would be our destruction.
16 Suppose the amount of heat in this room, the tendency of which is 17 towards equal and perfect diffusion, gets that kind of diffusion, then 18 for all practical purposes that heat will cease to be. What makes 19 motion possible in this universe? Lost balance. The unity of 20 sameness can come only when this universe is destroyed, otherwise 21 such a thing is impossible. Not only so, it would be dangerous to 22 have it. We must not wish that all of us should think alike. There 23 would then be no thought to think. We should be all alike, as the 24 Egyptian mummies in a museum, looking at each other without a 25 thought to think. It is this difference, this differentiation, this losing 26 of the balance between us, which is the very soul of our progress, 27 the soul of all our thought. This must always be.

28 What then do I mean by the ideal of a universal religion? I do 29 not mean any one universal philosophy, or any one universal 30 mythology, or any one universal ritual held alike by all; for I know 31 that this world must go on working, wheel within wheel, this 32 intricate mass of machinery, most complex, most wonderful. What 33 can we do then? We can make it run smoothly, we can lessen the 34 friction, we can grease the wheels, as it were. How? By recognising 35 the natural necessity of variation. Just as we have recognised unity 36 by our very nature, so we must also recognise variation. We must 37 learn that truth may be expressed in a hundred thousand ways, and 38 that each of these ways is true as far as it goes. We must learn that 39 the same thing can be viewed from a hundred different standpoints, 40 and yet be the same thing. Take for instance the sun. Suppose a 41 man standing on the earth looks at the sun when it rises in the 42 morning; he sees a big ball. Suppose he starts on a journey towards 43 the sun and takes a camera with him, taking photographs at every 44 stage of his journey, until he reaches the sun. The photographs of 45 each stage will be seen to be different from those of the other 46 stages; in fact, when he gets back, he brings with him so many 47 photographs of so many different suns, as it would appear; and yet 48 we know that the same sun was photographed by the man at the 49 different stages of his progress. Even so is it with the Lord. Through 50 high philosophy or low, through the most exalted mythology or the 51 grossest, through the most refined ritualism or arrant fetishism, 52 every sect, every soul, every nation, every religion, consciously or 53 unconsciously, is struggling upward, towards God; every vision of 1 truth that man has, is a vision of Him and of none else. Suppose we 2 all go with vessels in our hands to fetch water from a lake. One has 3 a cup, another a jar, another a bucket, and so forth, and we all fill 4 our vessels. The water in each case naturally takes the form of the 5 vessel carried by each of us. He who brought the cup has the water 6 in the form of a cup; he who brought the jar--his water is in the 7 shape of a jar, and so forth; but, in every case, water, and nothing 8 but water, is in the vessel. So it is in the case of religion; our minds 9 are like these vessels, and each one of us is trying to arrive at the 10 realisation of God. God is like that water filling these different 11 vessels, and in each vessel the vision of God comes in the form of 12 the vessel. Yet He is One. He is God in every case. This is the only 13 recognition of universality that we can get.

14 So far it is all right theoretically. But is there any way of 15 practically working out this harmony in religions? We find that this 16 recognition that all the various views of religion are true has been 17 very very old. Hundreds of attempts have been made in India, in 18 Alexandria, in Europe, in China, in Japan, in Tibet, and lastly in 19 America, to formulate a harmonious religious creed, to make all 20 religions come together in love. They have all failed, because they 21 did not adopt any practical plan. Many have admitted that all the 22 religions of the world are right, but they show no practical way of 23 bringing them together, so as to enable each of them to maintain its 24 own individuality in the conflux. That plan alone is practical which 25 does not destroy the individuality of any man in religion and at the 26 same time shows him a point of union with all others. But so far, all 27 the plans of religious harmony that have been tried, while 28 proposing to take in all the various views of religion, have, in 29 practice, tried to bind them all down to a few doctrines, and so have 30 produced more new sects, fighting, struggling, and pushing against 31 each other.

32 I have also my little plan. I do not know whether it will work 33 or not, and I want to present it to you for discussion. What is my 34 plan? In the first place I would ask mankind to recognise this 35 maxim, "Do not destroy". Iconoclastic reformers do no good to the 36 world. Break not, pull not anything down, but build. Help, if you 37 can; if you cannot, fold your hands and stand by and see things go 38 on. Do not injure, if you cannot render help. Say not a word against 39 any man's convictions so far as they are sincere. Secondly, take man 40 where he stands, and from there give him a lift. If it be true that 41 God is the centre of all religions, and that each of us is moving 42 towards Him along one of these radii, then it is certain that all of us 43 must reach that centre. And at the centre, where all the radii meet, 44 all our differences will cease; but until we reach there, differences 45 there must be. All these radii converge to the same centre. One, 46 according to his nature, travels along one of these lines, and 47 another, along another; and if we all push onward along our own 48 lines, we shall surely come to the centre, because, "All roads lead to 49 Rome". Each of us is naturally growing and developing according to 50 his own nature; each will in time come to know the highest truth, 51 for after all, men must teach themselves. What can you and I do?
52 Do you think you can teach even a child? You cannot. The child

1 teaches himself. Your duty is to afford opportunities and to remove 2 the obstacles. A plant grows. Do you make the plant grow? Your 3 duty is to put a hedge round it and see that no animal eats up the 4 plant, and there your duty ends. The plant grows of itself. So it is in 5 regard to the spiritual growth of every man. None can teach you;
6 none can make a spiritual man of you. You have to teach yourself; 7 your growth must come from inside.

8 What can an external teacher do? He can remove the 9 obstructions a little, and there his duty ends. Therefore help, if you 10 can; but do not destroy. Give up all ideas that you can make men 11 spiritual. It is impossible. There is no other teacher to you than your 12 own soul. Recognise this. What comes of it? In society we see so 13 many different natures. There are thousands and thousands of 14 varieties of minds and inclinations. A thorough generalisation of 15 them is impossible, but for our practical purpose it is sufficient to 16 have them characterised into four classes. First, there is the active 17 man, the worker; he wants to work, and there is tremendous energy 18 in his muscles and his nerves. His aim is to work--to build hospitals, 19 do charitable deeds, make streets, to plan and to organise. Then 20 there is the emotional man who loves the sublime and the beautiful 21 to an excessive degree. He loves to think of the beautiful, to enjoy 22 the aesthetic side of nature, and adore Love and the God of Love.
23 He loves with his whole heart the great souls of all times, the 24 prophets of religions, and the Incarnations of God on earth; he does 25 not care whether reason can or cannot prove that Christ or Buddha 26 existed; he does not care for the exact date when the Sermon on 27 the Mount was preached, or for the exact moment of Krishna's 28 birth; what he cares for is their personalities, their lovable figures.
29 Such is his ideal. This is the nature of the lover, the emotional man.
30 Then, there is the mystic whose mind wants to analyse its own self, 31 to understand the workings of the human mind, what the forces are 32 that are working inside, and how to know, manipulate, and obtain 33 control over them. This is the mystical mind. Then, there is the 34 philosopher who wants to weigh everything and use his intellect 35 even beyond the possibilities of all human philosophy.

36 Now a religion, to satisfy the largest proportion of mankind, 37 must be able to supply food for all these various types of minds; and 38 where this capability is wanting, the existing sects all become one-39 sided. Suppose you go to a sect which preaches love and emotion.
40 They sing and weep, and preach love. But as soon as you say, "My 41 friend, that is all right, but I want something stronger than this--a 42 little reason and philosophy; I want to understand things step by 43 step and more rationally", they say, "Get out"; and they not only ask 44 you to get out but would send you to the other place, if they could.
45 The result is that that sect can only help people of an emotional 46 turn of mind. They not only do not help others, but try to destroy 47 them; and the most wicked part of the whole thing is that they will 48 not only not help others, but do not believe in their sincerity. Again, 49 there are philosophers who talk of the wisdom of India and the East 50 and use big psychological terms, fifty syllables long, but if an 51 ordinary man like me goes to them and says, "Can you tell me 52 anything to make me spiritual?" , the first thing they would do

1 would be to smile and say, "Oh, you are too far below us in your 2 reason. What can you understand about spirituality?" These are 3 high-up philosophers. They simply show you the door. Then there 4 are the mystical sects who speak all sorts of things about different 5 planes of existence, different states of mind, and what the power of 6 the mind can do, and so on; and if you are an ordinary man and say, 7 "Show me anything good that I can do; I am not much given to 8 speculation; can you give me anything that will suit me?", they will 9 smile and say, "Listen to that fool; he knows nothing, his existence 10 is for nothing." And this is going on everywhere in the world. I 11 would like to get extreme exponents of all these different sects, and 12 shut them up in a room, and photograph their beautiful derisive 13 smiles!

14 This is the existing condition of religion, the existing condition 15 of things. What I want to propagate is a religion that will be equally 16 acceptable to all minds; it must be equally philosophic, equally 17 emotional, equally mystic, and equally conducive to action. If 18 professors from the colleges come, scientific men and physicists, 19 they will court reason. Let them have it as much as they want.
20 There will be a point beyond which they will think they cannot go, 21 without breaking with reason. They will say, "These ideas of God 22 and salvation are superstitious, give them up!" I say, "Mr.
23 Philosopher, this body of yours is a bigger superstition. Give it up, 24 don't go home to dinner or to your philosophic chair. Give up the 25 body, and if you cannot, cry quarter and sit down." For religion must 26 be able to show how to realise the philosophy that teaches us that 27 this world is one, that there is but one Existence in the universe.
28 Similarly, if the mystic comes, we must welcome him, be ready to 29 give him the science of mental analysis, and practically 30 demonstrate it before him. And if emotional people come, we must 31 sit, laugh, and weep with them in the name of the Lord; we must 32 "drink the cup of love and become mad". If the energetic worker 33 comes, we must work with him, with all the energy that we have.
34 And this combination will be the ideal of the nearest approach to a 35 universal religion. Would to God that all men were so constituted 36 that in their minds all these elements of philosophy, mysticism, 37 emotion, and of work were equally present in full! That is the ideal, 38 my ideal of a perfect man. Everyone who has only one or two of 39 these elements of character, I consider "one-sided"; and this world 40 is almost full of such "one-sided" men, with knowledge of that one 41 road only in which they move; and anything else is dangerous and 42 horrible to them. To become harmoniously balanced in all these four 43 directions is my ideal of religion. And this religion is attained by 44 what we, in India, call Yoga-union. To the worker, it is union 45 between men and the whole of humanity; to the mystic, between his 46 lower and Higher Self; to the lover, union between himself and the 47 God of Love; and to the philosopher, it is the union of all existence.
48 This is what is meant by Yoga. This is a Sanskrit term, and these 49 four divisions of Yoga have in Sanskrit different name. The man who 50 seeks after this kind of union is called a Yogi. The worker is called 51 the Karma-Yogi. He who seeks the union through love is called the 52 Bhakti-Yogi. He who seeks it through mysticism is called the Raja-
53 Yogi. And he who seeks it through philosophy is called the Jnana-

1 Yogi. So this word Yogi comprises them all.

1 Now first of all let me take up Raja-Yoga. What is this Raja-
2 Yoga, this controlling of the mind? In this country you are 3 associating all sorts of hobgoblins with the word Yoga, I am afraid.
4 Therefore, I must start by telling you that it has nothing to do with 5 such things. No one of these Yogas gives up reason, no one of them 6 asks you to be hoodwinked, or to deliver your reason into the hands 7 of priests of any type whatsoever. No one of them asks that you
8 should give your allegiance to any superhuman messenger. Each 9 one of them tells you to cling to your reason to hold fast to it. We 10 find in all beings three sorts of instruments of knowledge. The first 11 is instinct, which you find most highly developed in animals; this is 12 the lowest instrument of knowledge. What is the second instrument 13 of knowledge? Reasoning. You find that most highly developed in 14 man. Now in the first place, instinct is an inadequate instrument; to 15 animals, the sphere of action is very limited, and within that limit 16 instinct acts. When you come to man, you see it is largely developed 17 into reason. The sphere of action also has here become enlarged.
18 Yet even reason is still very insufficient. Reason can go only a little 19 way and then it stops, it cannot go any further; and if you try to 20 push it, the result is helpless confusion, reason itself becomes 21 unreasonable. Logic becomes argument in a circle. Take, for 22 instance, the very basis of our perception, matter and force. What is 23 matter? That which is acted upon by force. And force? That which 24 acts upon matter. You see the complication, what the logicians call 25 see-saw, one idea depending on the other, and this again depending 26 on that. You find a mighty barrier before reason, beyond which
